The second section of this amendment also prescribes in what manner the Secretary of the Treasury shall use the bank notes which he may receive in payment of the public revenue. It declares his duty by law, and places this information before the whole people. It will be both his guide and his safety. It provides that our collectors and receivers shall once at least in sixty days, and as much oftener as may be necessary, to render, in the opinion of the Department, the public money secure, convert the balances of bank notes on hand into specie, and place this specie on special deposite with the selected banks. This will, at all times, render it absolutely secure. No bank of any character has, I believe, ever violated a special deposite. It would be justly considered a high crime. What you give to them to keep for you, that they will always restore on demand. The box of specie which you entrust to their care will always be forthcoming; and if another suspension of specie payments should occur, you will not again have mere bank credits, but actual coin, for the use of the Government. This system of special deposites of specie was adopted in the Sub-Treasury bill, as I have said before, every where throughout the Union, except at six points where there were mints, or were to be receivers general.

Would this system have an injurious effect upon the banks themselves? It is true it would require them to make frequent settlements with the collectors and receivers, and with each other; but this would be a great advantage to themselves, as well as a great security to the public. If the bank in which the special deposite is made should be one of sound character and credit, always redeeming its notes in specie, the holders of Treasury drafts would, under ordinary circumstances, prefer accepting payment in the notes of such bank to receiving the gold and silver. But, in the natural course of business, the banks themselves would generally obtain the possession of these drafts.

In conversing some weeks ago with one of the most distinguished financiers of this country, I was struck with the remark, that even if the Government should proceed at once to require exclusive specie payments, the banks would not be injured unless a large surplus of specie were kept on hand. He said that holders of Treasury drafts almost always kept an account with some bank, where they would deposite them; and, in a large majority of instances, they would be transmitted for collection to the very bank itself holding the special deposite, or to some other in the immediate vicinity, and that thus these drafts would be presented for payment to the collectors and receivers by the banks which had charge of the special deposites; that this would be the common course of business, and that the banks which held these special deposites would thus themselves become entitled to receive them. Does not the justice of this observation strike every mind? If any one of us held a Treasury draft, would we not at once deposite it to our credit in the bank with which we kept our account?

In the mean time, during the periods that the collectors and receivers might hold the bank notes before they were converted into specie, Treasury drafts would be paid by them in these notes, in all cases where they might be bona fide preferred. This would happen in most instances; because sound specie-paying bank notes in good credit, are generally more convenient than gold and silver. But require specie; require what you will; from the very nature of the business of the country, these Treasury drafts will, in most instances, be presented for payment by the banks.

It is only in case of a large surplus of specie that the banks would be at all affected. To prevent such an accumulation, and to limit our revenue to our necessary expenditures, would thus become the interest of all classes of society.

The proviso to the second section is in exact accordance with the late report of the Committee on Finance. At present, under the provisions of the fifth section of the Deposit law, the notes of no bank can be received in payment of the public dues which has, since the 4th of July, 1836, issued notes of a less denomination than five dollars. It was the policy of this section to restrain the circulation of small notes as much as possible. Specie and small notes of the same denomination can never circulate together. It was said in England that a one pound note and a sovereign were natural enemies of each other; and that the former always expelled the latter from circulation. In that country, therefore, the issue of one pound notes was prohibited, and sovereigns immediately came into circulation. Congress acted upon the same principle when they declared that the notes of no bank should be received in payment of the public dues which issued notes of a less denomination than five dollars. This was done to secure, as far as we could, a specie basis for our paper circulation, and promote the use of gold and silver in all the small every-day transactions of life. To this policy I would steadily adhere. Under the existing law, banks which, since the suspension of specie payments, have not issued small notes of their own, are entitled to have their notes received in payment of the public dues, although they may have used and paid out the small notes of corporations and individuals: whilst the notes of all the banks which have issued small notes themselves are excluded. There is no justice in this discrimination. Whether a bank has issued small notes of its own, or has paid out similar notes of corporations or individuals, they have equally violated the spirit, though not the letter, of the existing law; and in justice they ought all to be placed on the same footing.

Take, for example, the banks of New York and Virginia. They were authorized by their respective Legislatures to issue small notes, on the express condition that they should be redeemed in gold and silver even during the suspension of specie payments. Would it not be manifestly unjust for the Government to refuse the notes of these banks, and at the same time receive the notes of banks who had paid out, not their own notes, but the small irredeemable notes of corporations and individuals of much less intrinsic value? This discrimination ought no longer to exist. I was glad, therefore, that the Committee on Finance reported in favor of abolishing it. The amendment is in exact accordance with their report. Should it be adopted, it will take off the interdict in favor of all banks which shall, after the first day of October next, cease to issue, reissue, or pay out any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars. It does not propose a general and indefinite suspension of this restriction, as the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts has done. It forgives the past, but requires the banks to conform to the law in future, or forfeit the privilege of having their notes received in payment of the public dues.

The third section of the amendment repeals the deposite act of June, 1836, except the last three sections directing the balance in the public Treasury on the 1st of January, 1837, to be deposited with the States. This exception is so manifestly proper, that it requires no explanation. The repeal of this act, together with the adoption of the first two sections of the amendment, would establish the divorce between Bank and State, by law. It would wholly separate the public money from the business of the banks, and accomplish a purpose which I have much at heart.

I am solemnly convinced that it is both our duty and our policy to use every effort to adopt this or some other similar measure before the adjournment of Congress. The people expect, nay, they demand the settlement of this question for the present, in some form or other. As a party, the friends of the Administration have solemnly announced to the world their hostility to any future connection between the business of the banks and that of the Government. Consistently with this cardinal principle, we ought to use every effort to adopt some measure putting the Treasury Department under the regulation of law. It will not do for us to go home and tell our constituents, that, because we failed with our first and preferred measure, we had determined to try nothing else, and left every thing in confusion. If we make the attempt fairly, and should fail, the responsibility will not be with us, but with our political opponents. The country will then be convinced that we have done all we could, and will justify our conduct.

I am a party man, because I consider that the best interests of the country are identified with the principles of the party to which I belong. There is no wish nearer my heart, than that the Administration of the present President may prove prosperous and happy. He is sound in all great political principles, and I feel myself to be identified with him for weal or for wo. I shall neither look to the right hand nor to the left, nor even think of enlisting under any other banner. Some of his friends may differ from me in regard to this amendment, and my proposition may be rejected; but I shall put myself on record in its favor, under a firm conviction that we owe it to the Administration as well as to our country to make another effort to settle this perplexing question.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

SPEECH OF MR. DROMGOOLE, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, June 20, 1838—In Committee of the Whole, against the constitutionality and policy of employing State banks as fiscal agents of the Federal Government, and in favor of organizing the Treasury of the United States in conformity with the Constitution.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose and addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am aware that our session is drawing to a close, and that, consequently, our time is precious; but the recollection that I have seldom, heretofore, obtruded myself upon the House, or committee, and always with brevity, in connection with the importance of the subject now under examination, will, I trust, relieve me from the charge of asking, on this occasion, an unreasonable indulgence. No question, perhaps, since the American Revolution, and the subsequent adoption of the Federal Constitution, has arisen in the United States, involving more seriously and extensively the principles of civil liberty and free government.

Ought the financial operations of the Federal Government to be entirely and completely separated from the business and the transactions of banking institutions? Ought that "Treasury," mentioned in the Constitution, required by it, in which "all public money" is to be placed and kept, and from which "no money shall be drawn, but in consequence of appropriations made by law"—ought that "Treasury" to exist separately and distinctly organized—ought that "Treasury" to be independent of the banks of the country? Or, ought that "Treasury" to be closely connected and allied with the banks, and made essentially dependent on them? Does the Constitution require that this "Treasury" shall, in any manner, be connected with, or made dependent on banking companies? Does the Constitution require, did I ask—does it permit that money in the "Treasury" may be promiscuously blended with the funds of these companies, and used and employed in their business, so that its ultimate availibility to the Government is left to depend upon their honesty, their solvency, their success or failure in trade? And if the Constitution does not positively enjoin such connection, still is it practicable or possible to dispense with it? Is such a connection "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" any power vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof? Can the "Treasury" of the United States be properly, completely, and constitutionally organized, and made to perform its appropriate functions successfully, without the aid or interposition of bank agency?

Sir, these questions involve the great problem, are the people capable of self-government; whose solution, we had flattered ourselves, had been definitely accomplished by the establishment of our Republican and representative systems. Substantially, the momentous, the vital question, is revived of the right and the capacity of the people to govern themselves

I ask, Mr. Chairman, if the framers of the Constitution had sufficient wisdom, and did they exercise this wisdom, in forming a plan of Government capable of healthy existence, and efficient action, independent of the fact, whether companies, with the power of banking, would, or would not, be created. Can the people of the United States, through their own agents, constitutionally appointed, and constitutionally responsible, administer this Federal Government peacefully and successfully? Or, must they, with a shameful and degrading admission of their incompetency, resign the management of a portion of the affairs and business of their Government—a portion, too, vitally important; must the people of the several States confess their utter incapacity, and quietly submit the management of their finances, their entire moneyed concerns, to artificial persons—to bodies politic, irresponsible to the constituted authorities of the United States; distinguished from the mass of the community, not by their superior integrity, but by their odious monopolies and exclusive privileges; who boast of vested rights, not enjoyed by the rest of society, but inviolably secured by charters, which, in most instances, presumptuously claim to be beyond the reach of repeal or modification by the whole legislative authority of the country?

Mr. Chairman, I desire to examine this proposed union of Banks and Government according to its own intrinsic merit. I will not yield blind obedience to the opinions or dicta of any, however eminent. I will deliberate and reflect. I will draw my own conclusions. I will form my own opinions; and I will venture to express them, I hope, with becoming boldness. I will not search for precedents, scattered through the history of Federal legislation, opposite and irreconcilable in character, and borrowing their complexion from the alternate ascendancy of party. No, sir: were all such precedents collected, and congregated into a mountain's magnitude, they would not, they ought not, to preponderate over my own deliberate convictions of the true intent and purpose of the Federal Constitution. It is my duty to exercise the faculties of my own mind, however feeble, in applying the test of immutable principle, and the Constitution, to every measure presented here for adoption or rejection. A tame submission to precedents, an acknowledgment of their binding obligation, may protect error, and promote a continuance of its evils in society, whereby the development of truth is retarded, and the gradual work of improvement is impeded. On this doctrine of precedents, I beg leave to read to the committee some brief extracts from a political work, written by one of Virginia's most illustrious statesmen. I refer to the late John Taylor, of Caroline, than whom no man had more thoroughly considered the principles of the Constitution, and to whose writings Mr. Jefferson himself confessed that he was indebted for the correction of some errors of opinion into which he had fallen.

"Let us, (says he in his Construction Construed,) look at the logic which supposes that acquiescence makes precedents, and that precedents make reason. All precedents or laws are at first theory, and acquiescence alone can convert them into practice. Banking began as a theory; and political augurs differed in their prognostications of its effects. The worst precedents are often but little felt in their infancy, because they move with caution, until they gather strength; and the worse they are, the more time is often required to develope their character. Some foretold that banking would be beneficial; others, that it would be pernicious to our country. It would be an odd judgment, however honest, which should assert, that fulfilment ought to destroy, and falsehood to establish an augury, because just at the time when experience has converted the theory of banking into evidence, both felt and understood, acquiesence has also mellowed the same theory into a precedent, and a precedent deprives us of the benefit of experience; so that the time expended in ascertaining the truth or falsehood of an augury, renders it impossible to remedy its imposition, just at the moment when it is discovered."

And in another place he continues:

"Precedents would make a strange species of Constitution, according to our notions; they would be repealable by the Legislatures which made them. In those countries where the Governments are absolute, this is no objection to them; but here precedents are nothing but laws, and the question, whether they are constitutional or not must forever remain attached to them, unless it can be proved that it is a question of no importance after have obtained the title of precedents. It will then become a matter of very great importance to ascertain by whom this title is to be bestowed."

And whilst I repudiate the authority of precedents, I will not search for practices or professions of party to guide me. I will not hunt up the isolated opinions of this or that illustrious statesman, living or dead, as a rule by which my own vote is to be controlled. Much less will I rely on any hasty or detached opinions of my own, expressed or inferred, on former occasions. My freedom of thought and my right of independent deliberation, shall not be fettered with the chains of prejudgment. The illuminations of experimental truth shall not be excluded from my political path, because heretofore I may have boggled in darkness, or been misled by an imperfect light or a false glare. The friendly advances of reason and argument, with all their benign influences, shall not be obstructed by any barriers which pride and prejudice may exert in defence of primary positions. No peculiarity of position, no associations, personal or political, connected with its first occupancy, can justify, for the single purpose of holding out in its defence, an abandonment of the interests of the whole country. Whilst pride may urge selfish considerations in favor of obstinate perseverance, patriotism will strongly recommend the surrender of original prepossessions for the sake of a nation's good. Those who will, may make their boasted consistency the sole deity of their adoration, and may fall down at its shrine in blind and unthinking devotion. Those who will, may remain immovably fixed to their peculiar positions, and may spurn with scorn every change or modification which time and circumstance, and the development of principles, may suggest and invite, until their positions, by their outre and inharmonious appearance, as contrasted with the surrounding improvements, effected by a judicious application of political science to human affairs, will serve only to excite the ridicule of all intelligent and patriotic observers. For myself, I shall ever hold my anxiety for consistency in strict subordination to my love of truth. The correctness and sincerity of my present convictions, are to me a matter of much higher consideration than their conformity to opinions of a previous period on other subjects, and in a far different condition of affairs. Instead of appealing to formal precedents, to the influence of conspicuous names, or mooting the unimportant question of my own consistency, I prefer to recur to fundamental principles, and to the plain letter and spirit of the Constitution, and by these to test the correctness of my present views.

It is then, sir, a fundamental principle, that there is a division of political power between the States and the Federal Government. The powers conferred on the Government of the United States, in the language of the Federalist, "are few and defined;" whilst, without exception, "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The powers, therefore, which remain with the States respectively, and with the people of each State, "are many and undefined." These Governments having a separate and distinct organization, and having a separate and independent action of each other, in the execution of their respective powers and duties, there is necessarily a dividing line, which must be kept constantly in view. The more clearly it is marked and defined, the more certainly will each Government be restricted within its own appropriate and constitutional province; and the more effectually will confusion, embarrassment, and collision be avoided in the progress of their administrations. An obliteration of this line, an encroachment upon this boundary, mars the beauty, deranges the design, destroys the harmony, and impairs the strength of our whole political system.

Having presented to the committee this fundamental and essential principle of a separation of the powers of the States and of the Government of the United States, I beg leave to read certain express provisions of the Constitution, to which our action, to be rightful, must conform in prescribing regulations for the administration of the finances.

Section eight of article the first, vests Congress with power—

"To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States;

"To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

"To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;

"To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States;

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into exection the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

SEC 7, ART. 1. "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

SEC. 9. "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."

SEC. 10. "No State shall coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is proposed, on one hand, to organize the Treasury of the United States, so as to dispense with bank agency, and to conform strictly with the requisitions of the Constitution; on the other hand, it is proposed to engage and employ, by contract, State banks, corporations, to perform the office of fiscal agents to the Federal Government. Thus a direct issue is made up between the advocates and opponents of the two schemes, and fairly presented to the country. To the employment of the State banks, an objection, in limine, has sometimes been urged—that they are contrary to the Constitution of the United States. It is not necessary to the course of argument which I propose, to enter into the question of the constitutional power of the States to incoporate banking companies. From careful study and honest conviction, I belong to that political party who insist upon a strict and limited construction of the grants of power enumerated in the Constitution, and who, in my own State, in the early struggle waged between State rights and Federal encroachment, concurred with the General Assembly in peremptorily and explicitly declaring that "it views the powers of the Federal Government, as resulting from the compact to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no farther valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers not granted by the compact, the States, who are parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them." Holding fast to this doctrine, maintaining that the States, as sovereign parties, having no common arbiter, may interpret the compact for themselves, and may interpose to arrest its violation, as a State rights man, I cannot admit—on the contrary, I utterly deny—that Congress, or any department of the Federal Government, the mere creature or agent of the parties, can construe the powers, or define the limits of State authority. Congress is not a competent tribunal, and cannot undertake to decide whether any provision of the Federal Constitution prohibits the States from creating banking institutions. I am not to be understood as contending that such a question might not incidentally arise before the courts of the United States, or that they could not properly decide such point, arising in a case of which, under the Constitution, they had cognizance. Nor do I mean to deny that their decision, pronounced in such a case, would be of binding obligation between the parties litigant. I decline, therefore, a discussion of the constitutionality of State banks, and shall admit, for the purpose of argument, their rightful existence. On this occasion, too, I decline an examination of their expediency or utility. For the present, also, the important inquiry is waived, whether their exclusive privileges and chartered immunities are in accordance with the genius and principles of Republican government, or consistent with the equal rights of all the citizens. I will not indulge myself here to speak of the great question of bank reform—the great question of a necessary and thorough revisal of the entire system and doctrine of corporations—questions which are irresistibly forcing themselves upon public consideration both in England and America, in spite of all Conservative resistance in both countries. Waiving the discussion of these topics on this floor, I proceed to an examination, not of the provisions in detail, but of the principles of this fondly cherished scheme of selecting in the first instance, and then employing, by contract, State banks to perform the fiscal operations of the Federal Government. I arraign it before the country, and impeach it at the bar of public opinion of violating some of the express provisions of the Constitution—of tending to defeat the object designed, by the substitution of a direct power to raise revenue, in place of the indirect mode of requisitions on the States—of exercising "other powers not granted in the compact"—of disfiguring, if not obliterating, the line of distinction and separation between the authorities of the United States and of the respective States—of contradicting the settled doctrines of political economy, and grossly mistaking the nature and effect of taxation and public expenditure—and finally, upon a comprehensive view of all its purposes, promises, and designs, I accuse it of commending to our lips a rank and poisonous Federalism, worthy of the time and the school of Alexander Hamilton.

The plan of converting the State banks, by league and compact, into an adequate and uniform fiscal system for the whole United States, requires a latitudinous construction of the Constitution, and an expanded exertion of Federal power, extravagant, unprecedented, and alarming. Solemnly and deliberately convinced that such is the character of the measure, I am impelled by a sense of duty to essay its exposure to public reprehension; and although I strongly desire to indulge a peaceful temper and a conciliatory spirit; to avoid crimination, dissension, and division; and to prefer no charge against personal friends and political associates; yet, sir, this sense of duty to my constituents and my country is paramount and must be obeyed.

By reference, Mr. Chairman, it will be clearly perceived that the clauses of the Constitution which have been cited absolutely require that the revenue, and all the "public money," shall be kept in a Treasury. It is, therefore, the duty of Congress to create by law, to call into existence by legal enactment, this Treasury, in which the public money must be deposited when collected or received; and it is also the duty of Congress so to regulate and guard the custody of the revenue, that it may be ready at every moment, without contingency or delay, after its receipt into the Treasury, when required, to meet appropriations. As the revenue must be placed in the Treasury, and as no money can be drawn therefrom but in consequence of appropriations made by law, it results conclusively that no part of the public money once received into the Treasury can be intermediately withdrawn, or otherwise used and employed. Now, sir, a Treasury cannot be recognised by these essential characteristics—of being the receptacle of all public money, retaining it secure and inviolate for any purpose but for appropriations, and keeping it ever ready for these—unless it be of the entire creation, and under the separate and independent supervision and regulation, of the constituted authorities of the United States. This Treasury, to answer the wise purposes of its institution, must, of course, be entrusted to the management of human agency; and this agency, to insure its fidelity and efficiency, must be held strictly accountable and responsible, and made susceptive of coercion into a proper discharge of duty. The laws creating and organizing the Treasury may and ought to contain sanctions; they may and ought to prescribe and enforce fine and punishment for delinquency and failure. Corporations, especially those existing by State authority, cannot completely and effectually, if at all, be subjected to compulsatory and penal legislation. Hence not only the superior expediency, but, to my mind, the necessity, of selecting individual rather than corporate agency—of employing natural rather than artificial persons. If this be so, it cannot be completely and effectually accomplished unless the Treasury is wholly administered by officers of the Federal Government. Yes, sir, the officers proper of the Treasury must be appointed and commissioned, as officers of the United States, by authority of the Federal Government, must be amenable to the same authority, punishable by the same authority, and by the same authority removable from office.

According to my perception, it appears clear and indisputable that the deposite of the public money in the State banks, and the grant of its entire custody to them and their officers, are a violation of the positive provisions of the Constitution, which require that this public money shall be placed in the Treasury, and there so kept, that no part shall be withdrawn at any time, or for any purpose, "but in consequence of appropriations made by law." But the revenue, the public money, thus on deposite, although collected and received, is not actually in the Treasury of the United States. It is there only by contemplation of the law—it is there only by the magic of legal construction. The revenue is placed in the possession of these corporations; they have the same use and control of the public money, for all purposes of business, as they have of the money and funds of themselves; and, in palpable contradiction of this flagrant fact, a credulous and confiding constituency are gravely invited to believe, to take it for granted, that the money is really and bona fide in the Treasury, lying ready and capable of being drawn therefrom according to law.

Sir, this requires a force of the imagination, a transport of the fancy, utterly beyond the exertions of plain sense and common observation. It is offering an idle mockery to an honest man's reason. It cannot be that the mass of the people of this country have a love for fiction and romance so extensively cultivated, so exquisitely refined, as to require artifice and deception for its gratification, in the dull and dry concern of an account current of receipts and expenditures. It cannot be that the people are yet prepared to adopt a system, and stamp it with "a final consideration and deliberate adherence," which authorizes and requires financial inventions, instead of "a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money." An honest and confiding people cheerfully and generously discharge all their public burdens; they ungrudgingly, and without complaint, satisfy the last exactions of their Government; with an uncorrupted simplicity, they readily believe that their contributions, rendered in willing obedience to law, will be put in their own common Treasury, and drawn out only to meet legitimate and necessary appropriations; and that their servants will give them, from time to time, a plain, intelligible, and satisfactory exposition. Instead of a regular statement and account, comprehensible to an ordinary mind, they receive an elaborate dissertation upon the condition of the finances, and an abstruse explication of available and unavailable funds. The very laws are an offence to their sense of morality and their love of truth, because they require technical misrepresentations of the true state of the Treasury.

Sir, Congress is guilty of gross financia dilapidation, by surrendering the public mone yto irresponsible persons and bodies politic for their own use and benefit, instead of keeping it securely in the Treasury; and but for legal forms and technicalities, would be justly chargeable with peculation and embezzlement. The withering indignation of a betrayed and outraged communitv is prevented only by imposing on them "a fiction of law" for "a matter of fact."

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to show that the Constitution requires that the collected revenue shall be safely kept in the Treasury of the United States, and that it cannot be intermediately used or and command such duties. A palpable defect of power can be supplied only in the mode designated in the Constitution: it cannot be obviated by artful contrivance by indirection, and by circuity of legislative action. No compact, stipulation, or agreement with these corporations can confer on Congress, or the Executive, or any department of this Goverament, additional powers. The authority of Congress over the subject of finance and revenue cannot depend, in whole or in part, for its existence or its exertion, upon the assent or dissent of bodies politic. The consent of one or more States cannot empower Congress to do an act not warranted by the Constitution, nor can the dissent of one or more States prevent the exercise of a power clearly granted. This doctrine applies a fortiori to corporations created by the States, and subordinate to their sovereignty.

The conclusion is regularly reached, and is undeniable, that the State banks are not, and cannot become, the Treasury of the United States, as designed and required by the Constitution itself. The corollary from this conclusion is, that public money, placed in the banks on deposite, is not in the Treasury, safe, and ready at every moment, from the time of its receipt, to be drawn therefrom, "in consequence of appropriations made by law," and incapable of being subtracted therefrom, in consequence of any thing else. It is true, that the Secretary of the Treasury annually reports all that public money as being in the Treasury which is on deposite, and in possession of the banks; and it is also true that the acts making appropriations, regard this public money in the same point of view. But, sir, I think it has been made manifest in a previous part of my argument, that this whole proceeding rests upon delusion, and not upon reality; upon hypothesis, and not upon fact; that artificial conclusions are required by the character of our financial system, and the nature of our legislation, not warranted by the actual condition of the Treasury. Are we to be told that there is no distinction between the actual possession of money, the real cash in hand, and a debt due, a mere liability to pay money. I understood my colleague [Mr. GARLAND] as asserting that money deposited in bank was just as much in the possession of Government, as when in the hands of its own officers. Do you recognise no difference, Mr. Chairman, between drawing money out of your own chest, and paying your creditor, and giving him a check or order on your debtor, in satisfaction of his claim? The most ordinary intellect must perceive clearly the distinction in the case of individuals; and, having perceived this, must inevitably admit that there is a similar distinction between money in the Treasury, in the actual possession of the Government, which can be seen, touched, counted, and used, and a debt or liability from the banks to the Government, which may or may not be paid, according to promise and contract, on demand. Many an honest creditor, by the story of his disappointment and distress, a tale of real life without the embellishment of fiction, can readily and easily explain the difference between receiving money drawn out of the Treasury and paid to him by a responsible and authorized officer of Government, and receiving a draft upon an insolvent or suspended debtor bank employed, because there is a positive injunction against taking any money out of the Treasury but to meet appropriations made by law.

I have also endeavored to show that this Treasury, which is thus to hold the public money, must necessarily, if it accomplish its intended purposes, be wholly created and solely governed by the authority of the United States. Those who are required to place money in a Treasury, and to keep it there securely, without being used by themselves or others for any purpose, until wanted for a specific object, and are then bound to produce it, must, in the very nature of things, not only have access to this Treasury, but must also, to the entire exclusion of all others, have the entire possession and control of it. Now, sir, bank officers and directors and stockholders do not correspond with this description of persons; and the banks do not, and cannot, constitutionally, constitute such a Treasury as I have described.

A mere direction to deposite the public money in the banks does not, ipso facto, convert them into the Treasury. The act of Congress does not create them, cannot increase or diminish their powers, and cannot rightfully stipulate for the performance of any service repugnant to their charters. It will hardly be argued that Congress has power directly and peremptorily to require the banks to receive, to keep, to transfer, and to disburse the public money—to prescribe, by law, the manner in which these duties shall be performed, and to punish for refusal, failure, or neglect. Sir, I hazard nothing in expressing the opinion, that no man will maintain that Congress can compel the banks to become the depositories of the revenue. If there be no substantive power, which can be directly exercised to compel the banks to perform these duties, then the authority to accomplish the same end circuitously, by indirect means and by contrivance, must be derived by unfair interpretation. If Congress does truly possess the power under the Constitution, to devolve this duty on the banks, then it may legitimately carry it into execution, and may adopt coercive measures. Not only does the Constitution expressly authorize the passage of all necessary and proper laws to carry into execution a granted power, but it is the very essence of law to exact obedience. A law is a rule prescribed, which must be obeyed—it enjoins duty, and may compel performance—it speaks to command, and not to parley—and a want of approbation cannot render a law, enacted in pursuance of the Constitution, nugatory, or justify disobedience on the part of those to whom it is addressed. If a sanction cannot be annexed—if a penaltly cannot be enforced, then it is clear that there is a want of Legislative authority to command what it proposes to be performed. In other words, an evident and acknowledged inability to enforce compliance, to compel performance, is conclusive proof of the non-existence of the power. As then Congress cannot constitutionally impose fine and punishment on these corporations and their officers, for refusing to keep the public money, for failing to keep it safely, for declining to transfer or disburse it, for neglecting to refund it when required, or even for embezzling it, it would seem idle to discourse about the existence of any substantive or efficient power to prescribe in discharge of his claim. Such an one knows and feels the difference between the receipt of money and the receipt of a bill drawn on another for money. A debt due and unpaid, is not money in possession. This delusive idea, that money deposited in bank is in possession of the Government, is dissipated by a positive enactment of Congress at the late extra session. This act rests upon the existing facts of the case, and not upon the hypothesis of the deposite system.

[Mr. DROMGOOLE here introduced and read to the committee the act of Congress passed October 16th, 1837, and entitled "An act for adjusting the remaining claims upon the late deposite banks."]

Here, sir, is an admission of the fact, which the deposite system endeavors to conceal and mistify, that the public deposites in the banks are not public money in the Treasury. This act recognises them as debts due to the United States from those institutions; it extends indulgence to them; and it exacts interest for delaying payment. It is an utter absurdity to assert that the same identical money is in the Treasury, and at the same time an unavailable or unpaid debt. It is defaming the Constitution to charge it with giving sanction or countenance to such inexplicable contradictions—such irreconcilable inconsistencies.

Next in the order of impeachment, Mr. Chairman, I am to make good the charge, that this union of the banks with the Government tends to defeat the object designed by the framers of the Constitution in substituting a direct power to raise revenues in place of the indirect mode of making requisitions on the States. It is unnecessary to detain the committee with a history of the requisitions made by Congress, under the articles of confederation, on the different States of the Union; with an account of the delay or failure of the States, in many instances, to comply; or with explanations of the insuperable difficulties, indeed the acknowledged inability, of Congress to enforce compliance. The principles of legislation for States or Governments, in their corporate or collective capacities, as contradistinguished from the individuals of whom they consist, was pronounced by the writers of the day to be the "great and radical vice" of the existing confederation. The narrative of those times, the current essays, and the solemn debates, incontestibly prove that the correction of this radical vice was a powerful and leading inducement in the formation of the present Constitution. So thoroughly penetrated were the framers of the Constitution, and the American people, with the conviction of the necessity of delegating to Congress a power of raising revenue, separate from and independent of the States, in order that that body might preserve the public faith, comply promptly with all engagements entered into in behalf of the United States, and execute efficiently all acts requiring an appropriation of money, that they consented, in this particular, to give the Government of the Union a National instead of a Federal aspect.

Congress was, therefore, authorized to apply the revenue power directly to the persons of the citizens, relieved from any dependence on the States, as communities, in their corporate character, and exempt from the embarrassments and difficulties of their intervention. The principle introduced is that of obtaining the necessary revenue by acts of legislation operating upon individuals; the object was to secure to the Government the appropriate application or use of this revenue to its wants, without dependance on corporate bodies. The principle will have been introduced in vain, if, after the collection of the revenue, it may be returned to the States under the name of deposites, by which operation Congress is again reduced to a dependance on them, and compelled again to resort to the abandoned system of requisitions. And is not the principle violated in a twofold degree by a dependance on banks, by creating the necessity of making requisitions on corporate bodies, which are but the creatures of the corporate authority of the States? The case is too clear for argument, that in both instances the principle is violated, and in both instances the object is defeated. These corporations may delay or decline compliance with the requisitions of the Government—may refuse to pay the bills of Government drawn on them—may deny to the Government the use of its own revenue. The patriotism, the public spirit, the sense of justice which resides in corporations, is a sorry and an unsafe reliance for the support of Government. Suppose they lock up the revenue; suppose they refuse to yield it up for ever, or for a time, in peace or in war, where is the remedy against their contumacy; where is the relief from this miserable dependance? For the present, I only raise the question of remedial action—I do not go into a discussion of its feasibility.

Mr. Chairman, I am sincerely convinced that a Government made, by its organization, dependent on corporations is fundamentally defective and imbecile; if the agents, entrusted with its administration, voluntarily reduce it to such a dependance, they are faithless to their charge. Such a dependance, especially in matters of revenue, is incompatible with the very idea of government. A Government does not exist in its full constitutional health and vigor, which depends, for its supplies, on the contingent will of a corporation.*

The next count in the bill of indictment which I have preferred, charges the scheme under examination with exercising powers not granted in the compact. It usurps a power, no where granted, of loaning out the public money. The Constitution does not, and, for wise reasons, ought not, to confer on Congress the authority to lend money. "To borrow money, on the credit of the United States," is expressly authorized; but no permission of the converse operation is to be found in the enumeration of grants to Congress. To loan public money is not necessary or proper for carrying into execution any vested power, and cannot be regarded as of indispensable implication. The power to loan money implies the right to levy and collect an excess of revenue beyond the necessary and appropriate wants of the Government. Applications for loans would greatly multiply the inducements to superfluous, unjust, and oppressive taxation. A desire to negotiate loans from the Government, urged under the pretext of promoting the public good, would enlist a host of expectants and applicants, and would combine an interest in favor of surplus revenues, which would ultimately prove irresistible and overwhelming. Among the most eager and importunate in their solicitations for the use of the public money always, as at present, will be seen the corporations of the country. Deficiencies of the revenue appear to have been contemplated as of probable occurrence, and hence, very properly, the power "to borrow money" is expressly granted, and made permanent; but the idea of a surplus revenue of taxation beyond the necessary wants and consumption of Government, seems to have been cautiously excluded from any place in the Constitution. We search in vain for any semblance of the power to lend public money. The evident danger of abuse and oppression, by inordinate taxation, for the purpose of granting loans to favored individuals or associations, vindicates the wisdom of withholding such a power, and impresses, with certainty, the conclusion that none such could possibly have been contemplated. A total absence of all authority to lend the public money, in any form, ought to furnish some security that taxation would be restricted to the simple purpose of appropriation. Unless loan and appropriation are synonymous, or confounded, the restriction of the money in the Treasury to appropriations is an exclusion of its employment in the business of loans.

Having ascertained, as I think, incontrovertibly, that "to lend money" is the exercise of a power not granted in the compact, it remains, in regular order, to inquire whether the deposites of the public money with the banks are, in fact, loans. It has been previously demonstrated that these deposites are not money actually in the Treasury, but are debts due from the banks to the United States. To undertake, in addition to this, to demonstrate further that these debts are the result of moneys advanced or loaned, would be clearly to supererogate. It would be the useless employment of adducing testimony in proof of a notoriously self-evident fact. The eleventh section of the famous distribution and deposite act of the 23d of June, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposites of the public money," expressly admits that the public money placed in the banks, under the name of "deposite," is loaned to them, and requires interest for the use of it. In Committee of the Whole on that bill, I moved to strike out the part requiring interest, placing the motion distinctly on the ground that it openly recognised the right of Congress to loan out the public money. The clause requiring interest had been inserted and defended upon the principle that the banks ought to pay for the use of the public money. Thus did Congress, "a mere trustee of the public treasure," bound to make a specific application of it, assume the right to divert it, and to loan it out on interest.

* The reader is respectfully referred to Nos. 15 and 16 of the letters of Publius, in the work entitled the "Federalist;" extracts from which had been noted, but were omitted in committee for the sake of economizing time.

Mr. Chairman, this scheme of forming compacts or agreements with persons or bodies politic, not holding offices created, or appointments made, by this Government, to take possession of the revenue, with permission to use and employ it upon condition of performing certain services, rests upon a virtual assumption of the power to "farm out the revenues." There are general laws specifying and declaring what duties or taxes shall be paid. We have an estimate of the probable amount of revenue accruing from the collection. Can the Government turn over to others, be they natural or artificial, the collection of the taxes, with the right of conversion to their own use, in consideration of a promise or agreement to pay out and disburse, as may be required, an equivalent sum? Let this indebtedness, this liability, be equal to a fairly estimated amount of all duties and taxes, deducting only a reasonable compensation for the expense and trouble of collection, and making a just allowance for failures or losses; let there be ample security for strict and faithful performance, still is it competent for Congress to convey and transfer the gross uncollected revenue? I shall take it for granted that no person will undertake to defend the policy or the constitutionality of such an arrangement. And where, it may very properly be inquired, is the difference in principle between receiving an acknowledgment of a debt, as a consideration for the transfer of the revenue before and after its collection? In both cases, the custody, possession, and use, of the revenue is surrendered, given, granted, and conveyed; and, in return therefor, a promise or obligation is taken for so much money, payable and to be paid on demand; to be disbursed or doled out by the grantee according to the requisition of the grantor.

The Government, sir, is to encounter all the difficulty and expense of collecting the public money; it is to incur, as it should do, the responsibility and the odium, if any, of enforcing an unjust and oppressive system of taxation; and then is to let out, by special contract, to such banks as may be the selected objects of favor, the entire revenue, to be employed, at their unlimited discretion, in the business of trade and speculation in all its varieties. No matter how artfully this system of deposite may be disguised in its terms and stipulations; no matter by what delusive epithets it may be denominated, "to this complexion it comes at last," that the banks are the "Farmers General" of the revenues of the United States. I have characterized this proceeding as an assumption of a power not granted, but it might be adopting a more correct mode of expression to designate it a surrender of the rights and duties of Congress to corporations.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, to these charges of a violation of the Constitution, and an assumption of power not granted, make an application of a leading doctrine of the Republican party, contained in their creed, as expounded in the Kentucky resolutions, in Taylor's resolutions, and in Madison's report. In that resolution, to which the attention of the committee has been heretofore invited, it is declared: "That, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the compact, the States, who are parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them." The principle here asserted is maintained also in the Kentucky resolutions; and it is clearly explained, strongly enforced, and conclusively defended, in Madison's report. It receives my most hearty and unqualified concurrence. The purpose, at present, however, is not to inquire whether it is a case of such deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of powers not granted, as to require and justify the interposition of the States for the purpose of arresting it within their respective limits. Probably it might be so regarded, were it possible to discuss the matter in all its relations and consequences to our institutions, State and Federal, free from the influence of banks and the power of money.

The Federal Government possesses its powers, separate and distinct from the States and their Governments, and in a rightful exercise of them cannot be hindered, obstructed, or prevented by the interposition of State authority. The States cannot so exercise this right of interposition for the purpose of arresting the evil of Federal usurpation, as to violate the compact to which they are parties. Whenever, therefore, a State can successfully interpose, without violating the compact, to defeat and prevent the progress of Federal action, it would seem to show conclusively that the arrested action was not authorized by the compact. I do not mean to go into an exposition of the whole doctrine of State interposition. Let it suffice here to avow the belief that the modes are various; that the interposing act may be effected by the existing Governments of the States through the agency of one or all its departments, as may be deemed best and most appropriate; and that the mode and the manner of interposing must depend on the nature and extent of the evil to be arrested.

Now, sir, is there any mode in which the States may, rightfully and successfully, interpose to arrest and prevent the employment of their banks as fiscal agents of this Federal Government?

Surely it will not be questioned but that the States may prohibit any subscription to the stock of their banks on behalf of the United States, and may prevent the Federal Government from becoming a member of any incorporated company within their respective limits. The States, in the act of incorporation, may prescribe admissions into, and exclusions from, the company. Here, then, is one species of connection which may be avoided. The States have clearly the right to supervise, regulate, and control, the conduct of their own local institutions. They may, in their wisdom and discretion, in the progress of time, discontinue, within their respective limits, the whole banking system. They may, in virtue of their exclusive power of legislation over their own corporate bodies, interdict them from entering the service of another Government. They may inhibit or annul all contracts and agreements made by the banks, which are not in strict pursuance of a rigid interpretation of their charters. These things are manifestly within the competency of State authority, and would effectually prevent any connection between the Federal revenues and the local banks, without impeding or obstructing the rightful action of the Government; without impairing, in the least, its right "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," to place all public money in the Treasury, to provide for its being kept there exclusively and securely, and to regulate the mode and manner of drawing out the same by its own officers, in consquence of appropriations. If, however, the selection and employment of these banks rested upon any authority deducible from the terms of the compact, the States, who are parties, could not thus easily and efficiently interpose to arrest the progress of its exercise.

Mr. Chairman, I proceed next to show that this alliance with the banks tends to efface the line of partition between the States and the Federal Government. It will be borne in mind by the members of the committee, that, in the commencement of my remarks, I laid down, as part of the groundwork of my argument, the fundamental principle of a division and distribution of political power between the two Governments. I have marked several passages, both in Taylor's "Construction Construed," and his "Inquiry," demonstrating and enforcing this great principle in the structure of our political systems. It is with pleasure that I refer to the views and arguments of this pure patriot and eminent statesman, on account of their own merit and the high estimation in which they are held in my own State; but to save time, now become so valuable, I will forego my desire to read extracts from the works before me.

This primary principle teaches us that each Government has its appropriate and separate duties to perform, and that each has its separate and distinct functionaries and institutions. The conversion of those belonging to the States into the fiscal functionaries of the Federal Government, blends, mixes, and confuses the public money of the latter with the money and funds of the States, and of the local companies organized by their authority. In many instances the same banks will be in the fiscal employment of the States and of the United States at the same time. The officers and members of companies created by the States, accountable and responsible to the States, undertake, by contract, to render themselves accountable and responsible to this Government, and thus to draw over them the mantle of Federal jurisdiction. If, technically speaking, they do not become officers under Federal appointment, yet most assuredly they are contractors with the Government. How far, in virtue of this contract with the corporate body, the character of contractor attaches to each member individually, it is not material to inquire; nor is it necessary to revive a question mooted in this House in 1806, whether contractors are officers. If the president, directors, and members, are converted into contractors, and contractors are officers, then they are all ineligible to seats in either House of Congress, under the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution; and in my own State, every person holding any office or place, any commission or appointment whatsoever, whether any pay or emolument be attached thereto or not, and every person in any way accepting or receiving any emolument whatever, is entirely disqualified for holding any office therein. I will not undertake to decide here for my State a question coram non judice, and which she is fully competent to decide for herself: whether every officer and stockholder of a bank, performing, under selection and appointment by this Government, and under the terms and obligation of an express stipulation or agreement, the duties of fiscal agent, do not hold some office, place, commission, or appointment, or do not, in some way, accept or receive some pay or emolument, and are not thereby entirely disqualified for holding any office in the Commonwealth? It is a question, perhaps, novel to all, and never considered by any; but in the progress of the system, should it unfortunately be revived and continued, it may prove to be one of deep and vital importance to the rights of the State, and to the pure administration of her laws. It is no part of my purpose to discuss or decide it. My object was to bring to view such effects, to suggest such questions and doubts and difficulties, as served to show that the enlistment of State institutions into Federal employment, tended to confuse and complicate the business and the duties of the two Governments, and thereby to efface, or render less distinct, that "line of partition," which the Republican members of the General Assembly of Virginia, in their solemn address to the people, accompanying the resolutions of December, 1798, declared they were under "the strongest obligation to preserve unimpaired." I will conclude this division of the subject, by repeating and reaffirming some observations which were incidentally drawn from me on a former occasion:

"He was one of those who wished to organize the Treasury of the United States upon its true constitutional ground, and to disconnect it entirely and wholly from its union with State institutions. He believed that good policy required it; that past experience demonstrated its necessity; and he believed it to be according to the spirit of the Constitution, and the obvious intention of the framers of that instrument. He was well satisfied, from reason and reflection, as well as from the lights of former experiments, that the State banks, from their limited and local character, and from their separate and unconnected existence, under different State authorities, could never harmoniously, adequately, and efficiently perform the functions of fiscal agents to the Federal Government.

"Mr. D. observed that it was a principle long established in Virginia, that the business and operations of each Government, State and Federal, should be kept separate and distinct. That each Government should be confined to its own orbit; that each should separately exercise its own appropriate powers; that the offices and the administration of the two Governments should not be united or blended in the same persons—are, in the good old Commonwealth of Virginia, regarded as cardinal doctrines. The proposed connection between the banks and the Federal Government—the mixture of the revenues of the two Governments in the hands of a common fiscal agent—the transfusion of the moneys of the Federal Government into the business of corporations—are a palpable violation of the political creed of Virginia, which she has constantly and ardently cherished. Such was the wakeful jealousy on this subject; such the anxious desire to establish and secure this great principle of State sovereignty, (doubtless to guard effectually against any sinister influence on the part of the Federal Government)—that at the very first session after the Virginia Convention had ratified the Federal Constitution, the Legislature enacted that any person holding any office or place, any commission or appointment whatsoever, whether any pay or emolument was attached thereto or not, or if in any way accepting or receiving any emolument whatever should be entirely disqualified or holding any office in the State. And the preamble of the act, after reciting that the Convention had assented to the Federal Constitution and the creation of a Federal Government, declares, that 'it is judged expedient and necessary that all those employed in the Administration of said Government ought to be disqualified from holding or administering any office or place whatsoever under the Government of the Commonwealth.'

This was the doctrine maintained from the first by the Revolutionary fathers of the Old Dominion, and solemnly embodied into law in 1788, at the session that intervened between the act of ratification and the commencement of the Federal Government. From that period to the present it has been carefully preserved among our living statutes. And for the purpose of upholding the same principle of keeping the State, and all its institutions exempt from any improper influence or interference by the Federal Government, it is a part of our fundamental law, a provision of our amended Constitution, that certain persons in the service of the United States shall be incapable of exercising the elective franchise. Mr. D. unhesitatingly avowed that he was of those who advocated an entire separation between the revenues of the Federal Government and the State banks.

Mr. Chairman, I have also charged this scheme, of surrendering the revenues to the use and employment of the banks, with contradicting the settled doctrines of political economy, and grossly mistaking the nature and effect of taxation and public expenditure. On this branch of the subject I might detain the committee with numerous references to authors of established reputation, and with copious extracts from their erudite investigations. Admonished by the brevity of our time, and out of respect to the anxiety of others to be heard, I will content myself with a few quotations from a single writer.

On the subject of public expenditure, of consumption by Government, I will take the liberty of reading from Say's Political Economy the following:

"If I have made myself understood, in the commencement of this third book, my readers will have no difficulty in comprehending that public consumption, or that which takes place for the general utility of the whole community, is precisely analogous to that of consumption, which goes to satisfy the wants of individuals or families. In either case, there is a destruction of values, and a loss of wealth, although, perhaps, not a shilling of specie goes out of the country.

"By way of ensuring conviction of the truth of this position, let us trace, from first to last, the passage of a product towards ultimate consumption on the public account.

"The Government exacts from a tax-payer the payment of a given tax in the shape of money. To meet this demand, the tax-payer exchanges part of the products at his disposal for coin, which he pays to the tax-gatherer: a second set of Government agents are busied in buying with that coin cloth and other necessaries for the soldiery. Up to this point, there is no value lost or consumed; there has only been a gratuitous transfer of value and a subsequent act of barter: but the value contributed by the subject still exists in the shape of stores and supplies in the military depot. In the end, however, this value is consumed; and then the portion of wealth which passes from the hands of the tax-payer into those of the tax gatherer, is destroyed and annihilated.

"Yet it is not the sum of money that is destroyed: that has only passed from one hand to another, either without any return, as when it passed from the tax-payer to the tax-gatherer, or in exchange for an equivalent, as when it passed from the Government agent to the contractor for clothing and supplies. The value of the money survives the whole operation, and goes through three, four, or a dozen hands without any sensible alteration: it is the value of the clothing and necessaries that disappears, with precisely the same effect as if the tax-payer had, with the same money, purchased clothing and necessaries for his own private consumption. The sole difference is, that the individual in the one case, and the State in the other, enjoys the satisfaction resulting from that consumption.

"The same reasoning may be applied to all other kinds of public consumption. When the money of the tax-payer goes to pay the salary of a public officer, that officer sells his time, his talents, and his exertions, to the public, all which are consumed for public purposes. On the other hand, that officer consumes, instead of the tax-payer, the value he receives in lieu of his services, in the same manner as any clerk or person in the private employ of the tax-payer would do.

"There has long been a prevalent notion, that the values paid by the community for the public service, return to it again in some shape or other; in the vulgar phrase, that what Government and its agents receive, is refunded again by their expenditure. This is a gross fallacy, but one that has been productive of infinite mischief, inasmuch as it has been the pretext for a great deal of shameless waste and dilapidation. The value paid to Government by the tax-payer, is given without equivalent or return; it is expended by the Government in the purchase of personal service of objects of consumption; in one word, of products of equivalent value, which are actually transferred. Purchase or exchange is a very different thing from restitution.*

"Turn it which way you will, this operation, though often very complex in the execution, must always be reducible by analysis to this plain statement. A product consumed must always be a product lost, be the consumer who he may: lost without return, whenever no value or advantage is received in return but to the tax-payer, the advantages derived from the services of the public functionary, or from the consumption effected in the prosecution of public objects, is a positive return.

"If, then, public and private expenditure affect social wealth in the same manner, the principles of economy, by which it should be regulated, must be the same in both cases. There are not two kinds of economy, any more than two kinds of honesty, or of morality. If a Government or an individual consume in such a way as to give birth to a product larger than that consumed, a successful effort of productive industry will be made. If no product result from the act of consumption, there is a loss of value, whether to the State or to the individual; yet probably that loss of value may have been productive of all the good anticipated. Military stores and supplies, and the time and labor of civil and military functionaries, engaged in the effectual defence of the State, are well bestowed, though consumed and annihilated; it is the same with them as with the commodities and personal service that have been consumed in a private establishment. The sole benefit resulting in the latter case is, the satisfaction of a want; if the want had no existence, the expense or consumption is a positive mischief, incurred without an object. So likewise of the public consumption: systematic profusion, the creation of an office for the sole purpose of giving a salary, the destruction of an article for the mere pleasure of paying for it, are acts of extravagance either in a Government or an individual, in a small State or a large one, in a Republic or a Monarchy. Nay, there is more criminality in public than in private extravagance and profusion; inasmuch as the individual squanders only what belongs to him; but the Government has nothing of its own to squander, being, in fact, a mere trustee of the public treasure.

"What, then, are we to think of the principles laid down by those writers who have labored to draw an essential distinction between public and private wealth, to show that economy is the way to increase private fortune, but, on the contrary, that public wealth increases with the increase of public consumption; inferring thence this false and dangerous conclusion, that the rules of conduct in the management of private fortune and of public treasure, are not only different, but in direct opposition."

In relation to the character and effect of taxation, I ask indulgence whilst I read a few selected sentences from the same author:

"Taxation is the transfer of a portion of the national products from the hands of individuals to those of the Government, for the purpose of meeting the public consumption or expenditure. Whatever be the denomination it bears—whether tax, contribution, duty, excise, custom, aid, subsidy, grant, or free gift—it is virtually a burden imposed upon individuals, either in a separate or in a corporate character, by the ruling power for the time being, for the purpose of supplying the consumption it may think proper to make at their expense; in short, an impost, in the literal sense.

"It would be foreign to the plan of this work to inquire in whom the right of taxation is, or ought to be, vested. In the science of political economy, taxation must be considered as matter of fact, and not of right; and nothing further is to be regarded than its nature, the source whence it derives the values it absorbs, and its effects upon national and individual interests. The province of this science extends no further.

"The object of taxation is, not the actual commodity, but the value of the commodity given by the tax-payer to the tax-gatherer. It being paid in silver, in goods, or in personal service, is a mere accidental circumstance, which may be more or less advantageous to the subject or to the sovereign. The essential point is the value of the silver, the goods, or the service.

"The moment that value is parted with by the tax-payer, it is positively lost to him: the moment it is consumed by the Government or its agents, it is lost to all the world, and never reverts to, or re-exists in, society. This, I apprehend, has been already demonstrated, when the general effect of public consumption was under consideration. It was then shown that, however the money levied by taxation may be refunded to the nation, its value never is refunded, because it is never returned gratuitously, or refunded by the public functionaries, without receiving an equivalent in the way of barter or exchange.

"The same causes we have found to make unproductive consumption nowise favorable to reproduction, prevent taxation from at all promoting it. Taxation deprives the producer of a product, which he would otherwise have the option of deriving a personal gratification from, if consumed unproductively, or of turning to profit, if he preferred to devote it to an useful employment. One product is a means of raising another; and therefore, the subtraction of a product must needs diminish, instead of augmenting, productive power.

"It may be urged, that the pressure of taxation impels the productive classes to redouble their exertions, and thus tends to enlarge the national production. I answer that, in the first place, mere exertion cannot alone produce: there must be capital for it to work upon, and capital is but an accumulation of the very products that taxation takes from the subject; that in the second place, it is evident that the values which industry creates expressly to satisfy the demands of taxation, are no increase of wealth; for they are seized on, and devoured by, taxation. It is a glaring absurdity to pretend that taxation contributes to national wealth, by engrossing part of the national produce, and enriches the nation, by consuming part of its wealth. Indeed, it would be trifling with my readers' time to notice such a fallacy, did not most Governments act upon this principle, and had not well-intentioned and scientific writers endeavored to support and establish it."

The opportunity afforded the banks, the permission and encouragement to them, to employ the revenue in trade and business; its conversion, in fact, after collection, into banking capital, as the basis not only of commercial, but of various other operations, is a palpable violation of these plain and simple truths. The introduction of a system founded upon the hypothesis that that value which is consumed by Government is still in existence, and capable of profitable employment and reproduction, is an absurdity and a delusion little less extravagant than would be the idea, in a treatise on population, that the extinguishment of life is not a destruction of human existence—a subtraction from the numerical aggregate. It may be urged that the visible growth and prosperity of the country, the acknowledged augmentation of the grand total of national wealth, refutes the opinion that taxation and expenditure are an absolute destruction of so much value or wealth. Such reasoning is about as convincing, such logic is as conclusive, as to maintain that the continued increase of population, the constant and invariable addition to the aggregate number in a country, by natural means, proves that no death has ever occurred. It is passing strange that a fallacy so absurd, a delusion so implausible, should be attempted upon the credulity of a whole nation. And what are the necessary consequences, the unavoidable mischiefs, of this scheme of deception and folly? The employment of the revenue in business and trade inevitably tends continually to the creation of an unnatural condition of things, tends incessantly to disturb and derange the regular and ordinary course of business transactions, and tends to produce an artificial and deceitful relation between the trade of the country, and the capital actually applicable to that trade. In the intervening time, between collection and consumption, the revenue is stimulated into active employment; it becomes a moving cause in business and speculation; it is regarded and considered as the basis upon which may safely rest extended additional operations. Whenever the revenue, thus enticed or forced by the action of Government into busy employment, is withdrawn, as it must be necessarily at some time, then the public expenditure is a destruction, to that extent, of so much capital. The capital being gradually withdrawn to supply the wants of the Government, in the same ratio, and even in a much greater, must business be affected. Not only the amount of business resting on this capital, artificially multiplied, must cease and perish; but the tumbling of the superstructure, thus erected, must shake and convulse all others in any way connected with it, and must produce panic and alarm throughout the country. But the accruing revenue, in order to prevent these, otherwise certain and disastrous, consequences, must be made to supply the deficiency created, must be made to fill up the chasm. Thus we have disclosed and avowed the startling, the odious doctrine, that besides the mere support of Government, the object and purpose of taxation is to contribute to the increase, or certainly to prevent a diminution of that amount of capital employed by bank agencies. The principle of transferring wealth or value, by force of legislation, from one class or portion of society to another, under whatever pretext of public utility, is a principle of plunder and robbery. It is taking the property of A, depriving him of the use, increase, and profit, and giving it to B, because he will, in the estimation of the Legislature, vest and employ it more beneficially for the "general welfare." It is as clear as the sun in the firmament on a cloudless day, that this unprincipled and unconstitutional connection between the banks and the Government operates as an unmitigated stimulant to superfluous, excessive, tyrannical, and unconstitutional taxation—to taxation greatly surpassing the amount required for proper and economical expenditure.

But suppose, admit, that this licensed and approved conversion of revenue into bank capital does essentially assist in augmenting the aggregate wealth of the nation to an extent not otherwise attained. The admission of such a fact would be no refutation of the charge of injustice, partiality, and tyranny, urged against the system; and would, by no means, prove that such a system operated equally in improving the condition and multiplying the general comforts of society—that its tendency was the production of "the greater good for the greater number."

Take, for example, a small community of one hundred persons, whose total production of value, or increase of wealth, is ten thousand dollars.

* Dr. Hamilton, in his valuable tract upon "The National Debt of Great Britain," illustrates the absurdity of the position here attacked, by comparing it to the "forcible entry of a robber into a merchant's house, who should take away his money and tell him he did him no injury, for the money, or part of it, would be employed in purchasing the commodities he dealt in, upon which he would receive a profit." The encouragement afforded by the public expenditure is precisely analogous.

Whether this increase shall, by the partiality and injustice of law, be monopolized by five individuals, or shall be left free to the acquisition and enjoyment of all, does not at all affect the certainty of the fact of such increase; but it does materially concern the comfort, happiness, and equal rights of ninety-five out of one hundred in society. The augmentation of the aggregate wealth of a nation is not, therefore, always the proper measure of the aggregate improvement and amelioration of the condition of its inhabitants. Strange and paradoxical, therefore, as it may at first appear, it is nevertheless undoubtedly true, that a nation may be rapidly increasing in wealth, whilst individual poverty and inequality may be still more rapidly multiplying; and this deterioration of the comfort and means of subsistence of the inhabitants, separately or in different sections or parts, may be the result of those very laws which are stimulating the employment of capital, and enhancing its profits. Such will be the tendency, in a greater or less degree, of any system which takes from individuals, by taxation, a sum more than sufficient for the most rigidly economical wants of Government, and permits the sum of taxation, or any portion thereof, to be transferred to favored classes or associations, to capitalists and speculators, under the shallow pretence of sustaining credit, invigorating confidence, extending commerce, and promoting the general prosperity of the country, but really for the purpose of swelling the profits and aggrandizing the wealth of these favorites.

I should not have gone thus seriously, and at large, into this investigation of the deposite system, as connected with the principles of political economy, but for the fact that the policy of using the revenue, as active business capital, has heretofore been recommended and sanctioned; has been maintained on this floor, and has been recently and zealously urged and defended in the other end of this building "The whole surplus revenue beyond the current disbursement of the Government" is to be rescued from "barren and unproductive idleness," is to be preserved from "annihilation" as so much "national capital," and is to be made "susceptible of multiplication, through conventional substitutes, to four times its nominal amount, and capable of fructifying and sustaining the national industry to a corresponding extent."* I have felt it my duty to meet and repel this doctrine of availing ourselves of the revenue power, the power of taxing the people, for the acquisition of national capital, to be employed in the encouragement of national industry. Such a system of deriving capital from the labor of the country, such a mode of giving it employment, with the consequent distribution of its profits, is partial and unjust in its effects upon the different sections of the Union, and is repugnant to the spirit and intention of the Constitution. Against such a departure from the meaning and intent of the compact, against such sectional preferences, against such odious inequality, we have just cause of complaint. Without discrimination or favor, let all be left free to exert their industry and skill, to employ their capital according to the suggestions of their own judgments, and to enjoy, without interference, the fruits of their toils. But to see taxes, generously contributed for the sole purpose of equal government and equal security, diverted from their legitimate end, in order to bestow partial benefits, is to feel the sting of injustice and oppression.

In vain has the Constitution secured uniformity throughout the United States, in "all duties, imposts, and excises;" in vain has it ordained that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another:" these provisions lose their salutary qualities, under the operation of that system which regards the revenue as national capital, and allows its employment for the encouragement of the industry and trade of one commercial city in preference of another.

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding all these objections, to the constitutionality and policy of the measure, which I have endeavored to enforce, and which, to my own mind, are insuperable, a revival of this exploded experiment is still most pertinaciously recommended. Numerous apologies, alike ingenious and unsatisfactory, are offered for past insufficiency, whilst the most liberal promises are tendered for future fidelity and prompt performance of duty. For myself, I have no confidence in its adequate ability or its efficient agency. Unquestionably it has performed one miracle, a repetition of which, no man, in his senses, who loves his country and its Government, ought to desire. With millions of revenue actually collected and unexpended, reported by the Secretary as having been received into the Treasury, this system has reduced the Government to want and embarrassment, in the language of the day, to bankruptcy. Is it the part of wise men to urge an immedate exposure to a similar fate? Or is it not a wanton disregard of a high and solemn obligation to insist again to place the public money in an exposed condition, liable to be withheld from lawful use and appropriation at the mere pleasure of artificial and irresponsible bodies, acting under the suggestions of fraud, caprice, convenience, or necessity. Exposed to such contingencies, and destitute, as I contend, of any complete remedy, we cannot, with strict propriety, affirm that the revenues are in a place of security. He, who is exposed to danger, who is in actual peril, cannot, in truth, be considered safe, because probably he may have the good fortune to escape without injury. The banks may again suspend, (should they generally resume and get possession of the public money,) may refuse to redem their promises, may violate their contracts, and may disregard all their obligations. Because they may ultimately prove solvent, because they may perhaps, if so inclined, refund the money placed in their custody, and because eventually nothing may be lost, is it therefore safe or prudent to subject the Government, for its support and very continuance, to such contingencies? To speak with accuracy and precision, I cannot admit that banks are such agents as the public ought to believe safe and suitable. My colleague, [Mr. GARLAND,] however, will insist that banks give security, and are as much responsible as the officers of the Government; and that we have all the power over them which we have over individuals.

It will be an exceedingly difficult task to demonstrate that there is the same degree of responsibility to this Government on the part of State banks and Federal officers. It will be a rash undertaking to strive, by argument, to prove that we have all the power over them which we have over individuals holding Federal offices. This subject of corporate responsibility, and corporate liability to coercion and punishment, has already been anticipated. Suppose, in defiance of all principle, it should be attempted to declare by law the same penalties, the same sanctions, against State corporations, as against individual officers of this Government for delinquency; suppose, by the contrivance of compacts and stipulations, you set on foot some species of prosecution in the Federal courts: how can their judgments and sentences be enforced against bodies politics of the States? If the coercion of the civil magistracy be insufficient, shall resort be had to the coercion of arms? It is absurd to think of fine, and punishment, and imprisonment, as applicable to corporations. In the very nature of things, there cannot be the same kind, or the same degree, of responsibility on their part as on the part of regularly appointed officers. In the very nature of things, no Government can exercise all the power over its own corporations which it may exercise over individuals; and much less can, or ought, this Federal Government to exercise all the power over the State banks which it may, and does, exercise over its own officers. But there is an acknowledged distinction between a law commanding and compelling performance, and a compact or agreement for mutual service or favor. Suppose a violation of the bargain by the Government, or its officers, where is the remedy of the corporations? Confiscation of the public money? Suppose a violation or failure on the part of the corporations, how can a specific performance of the contract be enforced? And again, these contracts may be prohibited by the State Legislatures; nay, more: may be set aside nullified by the stockholders in general meeting, as was the case of the contract made with the Bank of Virginia.

Having made these suggestions in relation to security and safety, to responsibility, and to the practicable application of a coercive power, I proceed to take a very cursory view of the manifold advantages so confidently promised, as the result of this fiscal connection with the banks. I am much mistaken if the ends to be accomplished, the benefits designed, will not be found, on examination, to be objects not contemplated or authorized by the Constitution. The power to raise revenue, and to disburse it is unquestionably granted.

It is proposed so to exercise this power as to regulate or restrain the banks from issuing notes below a certain denomination to be prescribed by act of Congress. Congress has no power to enact in direct terms any such prohibition, and yet principle is equally violated by the adoption of regulations indirectly accomplishing the same purpose. It proposes to stimulate the banks to good management, and to deter them from misconduct, by operating on their "hopes and fears." The hope of being permitted to derive profit from the use of the revenue, the fear of losing the opportunity of enjoying this boon, are held out as inducements to the banks to conform their proceedings to the wishes of Federal authority. The power to foster and encourage domestic manufactures in the States, by means of the revenue power, and by force of commercial regulations, rests on no better foundation than the power to foster and encourage the issue of a local currency. The power to encourage the manufacture of articles of prescribed dimensions and quality depends upon the same rule of construction as the right to encourage the manufacture of bank notes of prescribed denomination and value. The right to create public confidence in the strength and durability of the article of cloth, is as clear as the right to impress public confidence on the articles of paper promises. They are both articles of domestic manufacture, and may be produced with or without acts of incoporation.

The "reward" of public confidence is proffered to one class; the withholding of public confidence is the rod of "punishment" to another class of banks. Where is the constitutional power to convert the public confidence and the credit of the Government into a system of "rewards and punishments?"

It virtually establishes a treaty of peace and cooperation with the pliant and conformable, and makes war upon the solvency and credit of the recusant and non-conforming banks.

The power of selection is founded upon the assumption of a right to pronounce upon the solvency and sufficiency of our State institutions. In practice, it makes an odious, unjust, and injurious discrimination. Its effect is to divide the local currency of the States into two classes: one class is to have the credit and confidence of the Government, and its issues are to be received in payment of dues; the other class has not the endorsement of the Government for its solvency, has not the favor of its confidence and good opinion, and its issues are not receivable in payment of dues. Equal though they may be in all other respects, the receivability of one in payment of dues, and the exclusion of the other, destroys their uniformity. The additional function of discharging public dues, enhances the value of the one in public estimation, and depreciates the other.

On this subject of currency the United States present an anomaly.

No State can make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. The power thus prohibited to the States, is no where conferred on Congress. "To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures," is a power delegated to Congress, and expressly denied to the States. The gold and silver coin, thus under the regulation of Congress, is the only money known to the Constitution, and of which Congress can take cognizance, or can produce or regulate. In addition to this current and constitutional coin of the whole United States, the States respectively claim, and have exercised, the right of creating banking companies,

* See speech of Mr. Rives in the Senate of the United States, February 6-7 1838 with the privilege of issuing promissory notes, serving the purpose of a local currency.

The advocates of the deposite system propose, by an affiliation of certain banks, placed by contract under the supervising control of the Federal Government, exerted by an application of the revenue power, to convert this local currency into a general currency, and to impart to it uniformity. Sir, the plan, at the outset, is chargeable with the absurdity and inconsistency of promising uniformity, and actually aggravating inequality by the mode and terms of selection. The promised uniformity in the multifarious and diversified paper currencies of so many separate communities, can never be consummated. Such is its versatility, such its uncertainty and inequality, at different times and places, that it seems to expose mathematical truth to ridicule and doubt. A bank note in the city of Richmond may be equivalent to specie ,and so may another bank note, of similar denomination ,be in St. Louis. Now, sir, in mathematics, that things equal to the same, are equal to each other, is a truth independent of time and place. He who should act upon this truth, in reference to the two supposed bank notes, would be egregiously deceived. They are, perhaps, in no other places ,equal to the same thing, and are no where equal to each other. The uniformity of such variety of circulation and currency, emanating from the separate and independent States of this Confederacy, can never be effected by any constitutional application of the limited powers conferred on Congress. The want and the desire of uniformity in this various currency, its elevation above, or depression below, the standard of the Constitution, its tendency to exclude gold and silver from circulation, its useful or injurious functions in commercial transactions, its agency in disturbing or deranging the fair rate of exchange between different parts of the Union, neither from one, or all of these considerations combined, can any power be derived to Congress over the subject. For correction and reform in the character of the currency of the several States, we must, under our forms of Government, rely upon the same authority which has bestowed the privilege of creation and issue. For weal or wo, in wisdom or in folly, constitutionally or unconstitutionally, the States have adopted this paper system; they have, respectively, exclusive jurisdiction in the regulation of their own issues, and each may wholly exclude from circulation within its limits the issues of any or all the rest. Sir, I repeat that the great question of reform in local banks and currency, the great question of a revisal of the whole system of corporations—these great questions between Republican equality and Aristocratic privilege—belong to the States separately; and any attempt on the part of Congress to interfere, regulate, control, or settle State policy, directly or indirectly, overtly or clandestinely, I denounce as an unwarrantable exercise of power. Congress ought not to be permitted to divide with the States the glory of achieving a radical reformation in their own peculiar local institutions, nor ought it to desire to participate in the crime of perpetuating existing abuses by interposing the ægis of protection, upon the false and slanderous suggestion that, under the cloak of reform, the Democracy conceal the demon of destruction. Let the struggles for reform of State policy be carried on, free from all unjust obtrusion and illegal interference on the part of this Government.*

I see with approbation that the eminent individual to whom is entrusted the Executive power, has adopted this safe rule of conduct; and, in his adherence to it, I trust confidently that he will be triumphantly sustained. The States may, and doubtless will, improve their currency; will cause it to approximate more nearly to the constitutional standard; will make it uniform, and equivalent to gold and silver within their own limits; and without, must leave it to depend upon its good character at home and the condition and wants of business. I will not doubt both the inclination and wisdom of the States to accomplish, without Federal dictation or prescription, the general reform so earnestly demanded by the state of public opinion. In the fulness of time it will be accomplished. It is a certain stage in the regular advancement of political truth, and in the gradual progress of the great Democratic principle.

Mr. Chairman, let us briefly recapitulate the purposes, promises, and designs, of this union of the State Banks with the Federal Government.

It assumes the power to loan out the public money:

It converts the State banks into Farmers General of the revenue:

It reduces the Government to the necessity of making requisitions on the banks for the use of its own revenue:

It effaces the line of partition between the two Governments:

It applies national capital, raised by taxation, and multiplied four-fold, to fructify and sustain national industry:

It undertakes to prescribe the denomination of notes to be issued by the State banks:

It undertakes to restrain and regulate their issues:

It addresses, as motives of conduct, their "hopes and fears:"

It uses the public credit for "reward and punishment:"

It promises to give uniformity to the whole local currency:

It makes odious discriminations, and aggravates its disparity:

It proposes to recur to "existing materials," "State institutions," upon which to build up a system of Federal power:

To make the most of these for the convenience of the Government, as well as for the general good:

To reform their abuses, correct their defects, and adopt every precaution which may be necessary to insure their fidelity and efficiency.

These are but an imperfect enumeration; and where, since the days of Hamilton, can its parallel be found? I call to mind none, except, perhaps, the extravaganzas of Richard Rush, in his first annual report, as Secretary of the Treasury. There appears to my mind so strong a resemblance, that I cannot forego the opportunity of introducing to the notice of the committee the enumeration of the legitimate objects of Federal legislation contained in that famous document:

"To give perfection to the industry of a country rich in the gifts of nature, and blessed in the beneficence of its Government; to draw out its obvious resources, and seek constantly for new ones, ever ready to unfold themselves to diligent inquiry, urged on by adequate motives; to augment the number and variety of occupations for its inhabitants; to hold out to every degree of labor, and to every modification of skill, its appropriate object and inducement—these ranking amongst the highest ends of legislation. To organize the whole labor of a country, to entice into the widest ranges its mechanical and intellectual capabilities, instead of suffering them to slumber; to call forth, whenever bidden, latent ingenuity, giving to effort activity, and to emulation ardor; to create employment for the greatest amount of numbers, by adapting it to the diversified faculties, propensities, and situations of men, so that every particle of ability, every shade of genius, may come into requisition, is, in other words, to lift up the condition of a country, to increase its fical energy, to multiply the means and sources of its opulence, to imbue it with the elements of general, as well as lasting, strength and prosperity."

With an avowal of so many objects and purposes of Federal legislation, with our State institutions nationalized, and drawn, by consequence of compacts and agreements, within the cognizance of, and subjected, if possible, to the decision of, the Federal judiciary, as cases, in law or equity, arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, what portion of the reserved rights of the States, may we hope, will ultimately be saved from encroachment, should these alarming doctrines obtain? Then the Republicans of the present day, as did the Republicans of '98, will have too much cause to express their deep regret, "that a spirit has been manifested by the Federal Government to enlarge its powers by forced constructions of the constitutional charter which defines them."

In lieu of this scheme, which has so lately failed with a most disastrous explosion, it is proposed in the bill before us, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, to organize the Treasury according to the requisitions of the Constitution. My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] has candidly admitted that there is no constitutional objection to the plan which we, on our side, advocate, whilst the plan which he so zealously defends, is surrounded with insurmountable difficulties. I was glad that my colleague did not indulge in the usual cant of charging our bill with creating two currencies, one for the Government, and another for the people. Sir, it is utterly untrue that this bill creates any currency at all. I have heretofore adverted to the anomalous condition of the United States on the subject of currency, and have shown that whilst the Constitution requires a metallic currency, and authorizes no other, the States respectively, with or without constitutional right, have superadded a paper currency. Neither Congress or this bill is at all responsible for the existence of two currencies in the country. The coinage of money, the regulation of the value thereof, and of foreign coin, is the imperative duty of Congress. The existence of a metallic currency, therefore, is an indispensable constitutional requisition. There is, then, one currency, under the Constitution, which is necessary and unavoidable, and must perform its intended functions; and those who are disposed to murmur because there is another currency, which cannot answer all the same purposes, ought to go to the source of its creation to vent their complaints and remonstrances, and ought not to hurl their indignation against our bill, which, in that particular at least, is innocent. Our bill is based upon the principle, that according to the Constitution, in the payment of all dues and debts to the Government, gold and silver ought to be required, and looks to the ultimate establishment and general application of this principle. Although taxation, in its broad sense, implies any species of contribution or impost for the support of Government, yet I presume that it will not be contested or denied that our rates of taxes, duties, imposts and excises, must be laid and collected in a general medium, denominated money. We have seen that the Constitution makes money to consist of gold and silver, and does not authorize any other currency; this, therefore, must be the species of money intended to be employed, in Government purposes, by the framers of that instrument. Money is only the standard or measure of value. Taxation is but the transfer of individual wealth or value to the Government for its consumption. The amount or extent of value taken from each citizen is measured by this standard. Entire uniformity and exact equality in all contributions and exactions cannot be attained really as well as nominally, but by the use of this common or constitutional standard or measure of value. Specie payments of all debts and dues to the Government are the necessary result of requiring uniformity, and employing a common and invariable standard. In addition to the argument resting on uniformity and a common standard, it will be remembered that neither the States or the Federal Government can make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts. Should the Government receive the paper substitutes, issued in the different States, in place of gold and silver, how can it with these preserve the public faith, and fulfil all its engagements at home and abroad, according to the terms of the Constitution? Should the Government receive paper at all, it ought to be with a certainty, excluding every possibility of doubt, of its immediate convertibility into gold and silver, and it ought to be so converted invariably before disbursement. In such case, the Government, as a matter of convenience to the tax payer, assists him in the process of converting his paper into that medium required for the use of the Treasury.

As an authority for the receipt and disbursement of a paper currency, my colleague [Mr. GARLAND] relies upon the construction given to the act of 1789 by Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, and to the subsequent practice of the Government. In my opinion, sir, there has been a constant tendency to depart from the strict line of constitutional duty, in the administration of the finances, from the commencement of the Government, which is mainly attributable to the unfortunate bias acquired from the doctrines inculcated by Hamilton under the imposing authority of the head of the Treasury Department. Hamilton's Federal ideas were embodied and brought into practice in his management of the Treasury, and in his systems of finance. Against his constitutional constructions and his fiscal arrangements, the Republican party have regularly protested; and I cannot but think that my colleague, as a Republican, has made a most unfortunate reference. Instead of gold and silver in the receipts and disbursements of the Government, in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution, it is maintained that the receipts and disbursements of equivalents is a fair compliance with the Constitution and the law. Sir, the doctrine of equivalents is unknown to the Constitution. It is one of the many and fatal heresies of Federalism. If Congress, or any department, or officer of the Government, can, in place of a specific thing, at discretion substitute an equivalent, then all the specific provisions of the Constitution may be supplanted, at the discretion of one, or all the departments combined, by the substitution of their equivalents.

Sir, all the doctrines and arguments of those who profess to belong to the Republican party, and yet advocate bank agency and a paper medium in the public receipts and disbursements, are of strong Federal tendency; they lead, inevitably, to an admission of the constitutionality and necessity of a National Bank. They maintain that bank agency is essential in the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the revenue, and that a paper currency, convertible into gold and siver, and as an equivalent for gold and silver, is also indispensable in the collection, transfer, and disbursement of the revenue.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a Chief Justice Marshall would, from premises not so strong and pointed, easily and logically deduce the conclusion that it was the right, and the duty, of Congress to establish a National Bank as a proper, convenient, useful, and necessary appurtenance of the revenue power.

I do not mean to charge my colleague [Mr. GARLAND] or all his political associates on this question, with any wish or intention to favor the establishment of such an institution at present. He has always disclaimed it—disclaims it now, and I am satisfied of his sincerity. I was, however, showing, as I migh legitimately do, and, as I think, I have successfully done, that the creation of such an institution must be the ultimate result, the final conclusion, of all their arguments and doctrines.

In the long departure of the Government from the true rule of duty, and in the systems and practices which have grown up, I am fully aware that the habits, business, and interests of society are involved in a complicated and intimate connection. No man is more sensible than I am, that, in the application of principles, however true in theory, we ought most carefully to survey all the difficulculties and obstructions presented by the existing condition of things. Whilst I would not, in defiance of every obstacle, and regardless of consequences, press an immediate adoption of a favorite system, in all its parts; neither would I, relinquishing all hope and all effort, abandon it in despair, because it was not, at once, wholly practicable. Existing difficulties, caused by the errors and defects of the past, cannot justify a change or an abandonment of principles founded in truth, and in the Constitution. It is rather the duty of the statesman and the philosopher, sincerely convinced, and firm of purpose, to strengthen his defences by reason and argument; and to remove, prudently and gradually, with the least inconvenience and injury, the difficulties which oppose the introduction of his system. In obedience to the suggestions of prudence, and from a desire to avoid any shock or injury to the interests of the community, the bill under consideration proposes, very gradually, an entire disuse of the paper currency for the use of the Treasury, and a complete restoration of the constitutional standard; and thus, after a long course of error, to retract the Government, in the management of the finances, to the simple duty prescribed in the instrument defining its powers.

Mr. Chairman, an objection has been urged, that this separation of the Treasury from the banks will require an additional number of officers, and will increase the patronage of the Executive. Sensitive as may be the public mind on the subject of patronage, it is yet too intelligent and too patriotic to be deluded into an abandonment of a wise and constitutional measure, by an unfounded clamor. It relies for its execution, like every other measure, upon officers competent in capacity and number, constitutionally appointed, and constitutionally responsible. Ample personal security, the solemn sanctions of oaths, liability to removal from office, the certainty of punishment for offences, the dread of exposure and disgrace—these are the guarantees, which will, in the general, ensure capacity and fidelity. Shall we surrender the belief, so long and so universally entertained in America, that man in his natural person, and in his individual responsibility, is worthy of trust and confidence, is capable of executing the ordinary functions of civil Government? Shall we surrender this theory of Republican Government as an impracticable speculation or an idle dream, and in utter despair commit the vital concerns of this extended Confederacy, to associations of men converted by legal magic into bodies politic and corporate, with chartered protections, known to the Government as agents only in their artificial character, whereby responsibility is diminished, and the difficulty of applying the restraints and coercions of the law is greatly increased? In lieu of the vast and complicated machinery of bank agency, our bill substitutes only some nine or ten additional officers. The increase of patronage to be exerted through these few additional officers of the Treasury Department, rigidly prohibited from using or employing any public money in their charge, under any pretence, for private purposes, dwindles into insignificance, compared with the almost incalculable influence which may be secured by an alliance between the banks and the Treasury. Take the favorite number of deposite banks—twenty-five; multiply these by the whole number of officers, stockholders, and debtors, too, in each: the extent of corrupt influence and patronage into which this system may degenerate is absolutely appalling. The public attention cannot be diverted from the contemplation of this stupendous combination, so susceptible of a sinister influence, and so tempting to a designing Secretary, by the artful and causeless cry of Executive patronage over nine or ten officers, fettered with legal restraints. Look at the numbers of opulent merchants, capitalists, stockholders, and stockjobbers, who may, under the operation of this system, be brought into financial, and, probably, political, union and concert, with the Secretary as common head. It would seem that the genius of Hamilton had awaked to revive "those fiscal systems and arrangements which keep a host of commercial and wealthy individuals embodied, and obedient to the mandates of the Treasury," and which the advocates of free Government and the enemies of corruption have heretofore assailed.

Mr. Chairman, under the separation of the banks and the Government, proposed to be effected by the bill under examination, "a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money" will be practicable. All the artificial conclusions and legal constructions of former systems, which, in most cases, were confused and unintelligible to the mass, will be avoided. A plain system of accounts, so anxiously desired by Mr. Jefferson, will be introduced, and the object of the Constitution fulfilled in requiring a publication, from time to time, of the account current of the Treasury. The great body of taxpayers will see and understand the whole operation of the Treasury.

The strict inhibition against employing any portion of the revenue in trade or business, will remove every inducement to excessive taxation; a superfluity of revenue beyond the economical wants of the Government, will neither be desired by Congress or permitted by the people. The transfer of revenue, in no way connected with trade or commerce, from points of collection to places of expenditure, can produce no inconvenience, shock, or revulsion. No charge can with justice be preferred, that the financial operations of the Government have interrupted business, paralyzed commerce, and destroyed credit. No class of citizens or section of the United States, can complain of partiality in the benefits to be derived from the use of the revenue, whilst all are alike excluded from any such favors. All unjust discriminations in the local currency, all improper interference in its regulation, will be avoided; and the States, without impediment or assistance, may proceed in its reformation, according to their own sense of duty and policy. The strict adherence of the Government in all its money transactions to the common standard, will furnish both the measure of value and the example of enforcing it, which the Constitution intended, and will be more persuasive to the States to conform to it, than any direct attempt to control and regulate their diverse currency. Finally, the organization and management of the Treasury, according to the Constitution, will be to exercise and vindicate the right and capacity of the people of the States respectively to govern themselves, and to emancipate their Federal Government from bank thraldom.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

REMARKS OF MR. YELL,

OF ARKANSAS,

In the House of Representatives, June 20, 1838—On the bill to increase the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. YELL said, he should not now have troubled the House; but from the peculiar position he occupied as a representative from Arkansas, his duty to those whom it was his honor to represent here, forbade him to be silent, and rendered it his imperative duty to urge upon the House the duty, under existing circumstances, to increase the regular army, to some extent. He would say with his friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] who had just taken his seat, that he was as much opposed to an overgrown standing army as that gentleman, or any other was, or could be. He believed that such an army would not be found dangerous to the liberties of the people; and as soon as he apprehended such a result in regard to the army of the United States, he should oppose its increase with what little ability he possessed; but until then, he saw no impropriety, but, on the contrary, great necessity, for so far increasing it as to provide for the protection of the country. The gentleman had asked the House why should we increase the army? In reply, I will recall his recollection to the commencement of the war in Florida. Every one knew that at the time it broke out no one apprehended the least danger of an Indian war in that quarter. The signs of war were not more ominous, nor as much so then as now on the whole Western frontier. There was but one man slain, that was Wiley Thompson, the Indian agent; yet in a few months the whole line of boundary in that quarter was in the flames of open war. Had we had a competent military force upon the ground at that day, there would not have been the necessity of calling out militia and volunteers to the tune of forty-three thousand men. The volunteers from Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama, might have remained in peace at their homes, and the nation would have been saved the whole expense. There is now an obvious cause of war on the frontier; and the reports from that quarter all agreed in stating the probability that it would happen. The officers from whom this intelligence was received were actuated by no secret design to increase the army, as the gentleman had suggested, nor would their own rank be raised by its success if they had. They were men far above so base a conspiracy, and have given only their views as they were bound to do. General Arbuckle and Colonel Vose, and others, all state that the Indians in their vicinity were engaged in preparations for war, as will be seen by reference to a document from the War Department a few days since. Would this House refuse to credit the statements of such men, officially made to the Department? The House would understand him as confining his remarks entirely to the Western frontier. He spoke for the benefit of his own people. The gentleman from Missouri was abundantly able to look after his own constituents.

Mr. Y. said he had voted to strike out the Senate bill, and in favor of the substitute moved by the Committee on Military Affairs. The former recommended the augmentation of the army to the number of 14,000; the latter to only 11,500. He had voted for the smaller number, because he saw no necessity for so large an increase as was proposed by the Senate. There was no need for augmenting at all the existing staff, of the army, as reported by the Senate; all he asked was, that the rank and file should be increased in number. This he demanded of the House as an act of mere justice. The House had placed on the western frontier a body of Indians mustering not less than 66,000 warriors, as will be seen by the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—an officer distinguished for his ability and integrity. Whole number of Indians west of the Mississippi river, 332,498; estimated warriors, 66,499. No matter by whose advice or policy this had been done; it was too late now to inquire into that; certainly, it never had been done by the suggestion, or with the consent, of the representatives of the people of Arkansas or Missouri. They had opposed the plan from the beginning. One of his colleagues in the Senate, then a delegate, opposed it on this floor and elsewhere. But without reverting to the past, the fact now was that those Indians were there; the Government had sent them there; and it was the duty of Government to provide against their hostile operations.

He would remind the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. POPE,] and from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] that the Indians on the Arkansas frontier were not such Indians as Clark and Harmar had fought. These Indians were all fully armed; each one of them was furnished with as good a rifle as any of our own people, and they were well supplied with all the munitions of war; and what was their numerical force? There were 20,000 Creeks, 15,000 Choctaws, 10,000 Cherokees, besides some 5,000 Osages, and some 1,500 Chickasaws, and how many Seminoles would depend upon the final results of the Florida war.

Now, he did not wish to be understood as taking the position that the people of Arkansas stood in dread of these Indians, however numerous they might be, as of a superior foe, from whom they fled to the Government for protection. No; if matters ever came to extremities, the people he represented were both able and willing to defend their own homes, and to protect their own wives and children. But the danger was not a personal or peculiar one, in which they alone had an isolated and independent concern. It was the danger and the concern of the country at large; and it was the duty of the whole people of the Union to guard against it. The people of Arkansas demanded protection, not as a boon, not as a gratuity, not out of pity; but as a matter of right to her own citizens, and by treaty stipulations with the Indians. He appealed on this subject alike to gentlemen on both sides of the House. Would they be willing, on account of any political or party bearings of this question, to stand by and see their fellow-citizens scalped and tomahawked? Would they have them exposed to the danger of such a fate, merely for the sake of saving a little money? No. He had a better opinion of the representatives of the American people. He was sure that both the friends and the opponents of the Administration would freely vote whatever might really be requisite in this matter.

M. Y. was well aware of what were the feelings, the apprehensions, and the desires of his people at home. They all fully expected an Indian war; they had no doubt that it was coming; and in that expectation, it would be their desire that the largest increase which had been proposed by either of the amendments should be granted by Congress, and they would be glad to increase it yet farther. Yet, though he knew these were their wishes at the present moment, he could not consent to vote for the increase proposed by the Senate's bill; he thought a smaller addition would be sufficient, and he took the responsibility of saying to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HARRISON] that he could not go for the amendment he had proposed. He proposed, and it was all he asked, that five regiments of infantry and two of dragoons, making in all upwards of 6,500 men on our western and north western frontier, should be forthwith raised, and this amendment will give it. This was, in his judgment sufficient to meet the exigency of the country. If the companies of infantry were increased to 80 privates, this would give a force of 5,000 infantry, and 1,450 dragoons for the defence of the south western frontier. He would dispose of this force as follows. He would place in Fort Jesup, at the mouth of the Sabine, 500; at Fort Towson 500, to protect the frontier from the inroads of the Camanches and Pawnees; at Fort Smith 500; at Fort Gibson 500, and 200 at a post to be established in the northwest corner of Arkansas. These, with the dragoons would give 3,400 men to meet the Indian force west of Arkansas.

Now let gentlemen consider the formidable amount of the Indians which have been collected at our western frontier. They might be reckoned as follows:

Choctaws and Chickasaws - -	30,000
Creeks - - - - - -	20,400
Cherokees, about - - - -	10,000
Osages - - - -	5,000
Pawnees - - - - - -	12,000
Camanches - - - - -	20,000

What then was the condition of the frontier as to safety? Why, it was true, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had said, that 25,000 men could not defend it, if it came to a trial of actual strength; but if the Government erected a line of posts well garrisoned, with mutual means of easy communication between them, the moral effect on the minds of the Indians would operate as a sufficient defence, and prevent hostilities. But let war once actually break out, and twice the number of troops would afford no effectual resistance. The Indians were more than two to one. The Cherokees lay within half-a days march of some of the strongest counties in the State; in ten days the Indians, if united, could drive every thing before them, and take Little Rock, the seat of Government. The militia would have to be called out, but they would not check their progress to the Mississippi river. This was no dream of the imagination. The Indians, it appeared from late advices, were planting no corn, and some of them had burned their fences; and they declared to the whites, that at the time of their green corn dance they would finally determine whether to make war or no. The President had been apprised of this state of things, and if he believed it to be true, as Mr. Y. did, he ought to draw off some troops from elsewhere. If, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] had said, the troops were not wanted on the Atlantic seaboard, send them to the West, where they really were needed. Under this view of the case, Mr. Y. had been willing to vote for one additional regiment, as proposed by the present amendment.

The force at present on the frontier Mr. Y. stated as follows:

Men at Fort Towson, some - -	200
" at Fort Gibson, say - -	400
" at Fort Jesup - - - -	200

with a portion of the regiment of dragoons; in all, about 1000 men. The garrison at Fort Gibson was no protection to Arkansas with her present force; so far from it, that they had been obliged to send out three battalions of volunteers to protect the protectors. If this was the manner in which the Government meant to protect the people of Arkansas, it would be better at once to withdraw all the United States garrisons, and let the people fight it out themselves. If they were not to have enough troops to do any good, better take away what were there, and not oblige the people of Arkansas to defend the troops of the United States Government. There had been a selection of two posts to defend Arkansas and Missouri. He would give them 2000 infantry, and 1450 dragoons, for Missouri. But the honorable gentleman from Missouri must remember that the Indians west of his State would not have to be fought till those in Arkansas had been met first. The people of Missouri would not be troubled till the people of Arkansas had been attacked. He was willing to give his friend from Missouri two regiments; and then let the dragoons be divided. Let Arkansas have one regiment, and Missouri another. There were a body of 66,000 Indian warriors to be met, as he had before stated, all well armed with the best of rifles, and with plenty of ammunition. Was not the country bound to provide some addition to the army to meet a force so formidable?

Mr. Y. said that, perhaps, he was willing to put up with too little; but he was the more willing to be content with a small increase, because he well knew the ability, zeal, and energy, of the present Governor of his own State. That excellent officer would never be wanting to his duty; and if it did come to hard fighting, he rather thought they would whip these Indians a little sooner than Uncle Sam had whipped those in Florida, and at much less expense.

He was willing to give two regiments to the Northern frontier, from Detroit to Maine. He believed this would be as much as would be needed in that quarter.

It must be remembered that they in the West had no artillery; all the cannon were on the seaboard. They might be taken, some of them, to the Northern frontier; and if the force he had named was insufficient, he would consent to raise one more regiment, as proposed in the amendment of the committee.

He believed that the Northwestern and Northeastern frontier needed additional regular troops, but not very many, unless Maine was determined to rise up and take by force the portion of her territory now unlawfully held by the British. When it came to that, he was willing to vote her 25,000 men, if necessary; but, as matters now stood, the people on the Northern frontier had as many as those on the Western.

In taking the ground he had done in relation to this bill, it must be recollected that he did not calculate on any further provision for the war in Florida. If they could not get along with the Seminoles without more troops, let them try the virtue of militia and volunteers. One thing was perfectly certain: we must keep the body of western Indians in awe, or we should have war just as surely as the sun would rise. As long as the Government kept the Indians there, they must furnish forts and soldiers to keep them in order. This was necessary, also, to restrain evil minded whites, and to keep them from intruding and imposing on the Indians. A military force was as necessary to keep the whites off the Indians as the Indians off the whites.

What the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had said about Indian agents was, in general, true enough. But Mr. Y. knew of at least one bright exception, and that was the United States agent among the Choctaws. That gentleman had been on to this city lately, and during his absence the Choctaws had met the Chickasaws, the Cherokees, and the Creeks in council, and were likely to unite with them in any hostile movement that might take place.

What he had asked was less, he knew, than his people expected; but he should persuade them to be content with it; at least, he should try. The Indians were two to one against them; and better armed than they. They would have, in the first place, to get their wives and children across the Mississippi. This was the first thing a Western man cared about. And by the time that was done, the Indians would have possession both of Arkansas and Missouri. After that they would face about and drive the Indians beyond the Rocky Mountains. But before it came to that, and to prevent, if possible, the commencement of hostilities, it was no more than a matter of sheer justice that the Government should send there a competent military force, as he had every reason to believe and hope they were disposed to afford.

REMARKS OF MR. PRATT, OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, June 8, 1838—On the bill providing for the removal of the Treasury building.

Mr. PRATT of New York, one of the Committee which reported the bill rose, and said that he was altogether unused to public speaking, but hoped that he might be allowed to claim the attention of the committee, while offering to them a few practical observations upon the subject under consideration. He was glad that the discussion had, thus far, been mainly carried on in a business-like manner. This pleased him the more, that it strengthened him in the hope that his own unadorned and plain mode of expressing his views would meet the indulgence of the committee.

Mr. P. said that having been placed upon this Committee of Public Buildings, and the subject of the fitness for its intended purposes of the new Treasury building having been brought to his attention, he had looked at the matter in the same practical manner in which he usually went about his own affairs. Thus viewing the building, he had not been long in coming to the opinion that it was all wrong, both in the matter of taste, and in the matter of execution. It was at his request and suggestion that the committee had examined the building personally; he believed it to be going wrong, and the examination had tended to confirm, not to confute that opinion. At first the proposition personally to inspect this building was not favored by the committee, although it had at last been acceded to. And here Mr. P. would take the occasion of paying a merited tribute to the singleness of purpose and purity of motive, which dictated the course of the members of the committee, of both political parties, in reference to this subject, from first to last. He would particularly instance in this connection, the course pursued by the honorable chairman of that committee, [Mr. LINCOLN,] in regard to the furnishing and repairs of the Executive mansion. He, as well as the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERCER,] though a political opponent, was as liberal and fair as any friend of the Administration could have desired. They had acted with the spirit of business men, and could honestly answer to the country, with the rest of the committee, that they had discharged their duty faithfully and conscientiously.

For himself, he had for years been practically engaged in building; he could not avoid, therefore, looking at the work submitted to his examination in a practical point of view. He intended, in doing so, to do his duty, and to be useful, if possible, to the country, whose servant he was. He knew well the responsibility he assumed, and had not shrunk from it. He and the whole committee had taken great pains to enable themselves to lay before the House all the facts upon which the report which accompanied the bill under consideration had been founded. It was now the province of the House to judge for itself, as to the validity of the committee's conclusions from those facts. The committee had counted the cost—they had come to the deliberate conclusion that the public money was being wasted on this unlucky piece of work, and they had told the House that such was their opinion.

Mr. P. then stated that the length of the Treasury building, as it stands, is four hundred and fifty-six feet, the lower hall eight feet two and a half inches wide, and the upper hall nine feet. He assumed as a demonstrable fact, that this was far too narrow. He compaired it with the hall of the new Patent Office, now in process of erection, which he said was a little over one hundred feet in length, and fifteen in width. Nearly half the Treasury building, he stated, was so constructed as to be under ground, which would have the inevitable effect of rendering thirty-seven, at least, of the rooms proposed to be made upon that floor, too dark and too damp for use.

Mr. P. also contended that this building, which Congress had ordered to be built under the direction of the President of the United States, had not been executed according to the directions given by General JACKSON; who had expressly stipulated that the building should not interfere at all with the State Department; a building, nearly new, and which cost the country over $100,000. But by the plan of the architect now engaged on this building, it seems that this Department is to come down, at an admitted loss of some $90,000. This, Mr. P. could not but look upon as miserable economy indeed. The new erection was now within three or four feet of the State Department; and, owing to the different heights of the walls of the two buildings, it was quite obvious that they could never be made to match. White and black could not differ more widely than the two from each other; and was this a specimen of workmanship and of taste for an American citizen to point out to the stranger who may visit the Capitol of his country? He thought not.

Mr. P. then went into a series of statements by way of exposing some of the prominent imperfections of the building; its entire want of adaptation to its purposes, the unfitness of the architect who designed it, and the palpable necessity which existed for taking it down, as a matter of the best and most prudent economy. He took the statement of the architect himself, as contained in the National Intelligencer, in a communication signed M, and which was as follows:

The architect's estimate for completing the present building, under the construction, is - - - - - -	$500,000
Expense of simply grading the street, without including the cost of culvert underneath - - - - - -	2,500
Total cost - - -	502,500
Estimate for carrying out the whole plan, as approved by the Executive, including the renewal of the State Department building, and constructing a corresponding building at the south end - - - - - -	397,500
Whole cost - - -	900,000

And showed that, in 1837, this architect's own estimates were not much more than half that sum. In commenting on this discrepancy, Mr. P. remarked that he was compelled to say that this architect's rule in building was like that adopted by a certain Irish journeyman he had heard of, who, as he could neither read nor write, dispensed with the draughts, and said he could work best by his eye! It seems to be the maxim of this architect to "cut and try."

In reply to some remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KEIM] who had addressed the committee on this bill, and in behalf of the architect of the Treasury building, Mr. P. observed, that that gentleman's estimate of the thickness of the walls, at 3 feet 3 inches, was entirely erroneous. He, Mr. P. had been told so before; and had taken the trouble to measure them for himself with the rule. Their thickness was only eighteen inches stone, filled inside with brick nine inches, making only a thickness of two feet three inches in all; and this for the walls of a building three stories, or forty-eight feet, high. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his zeal to endorse the character, as an architect, of Mr. Mills, had stated, upon the authority of the latter, what he, Mr. P. knew, from his own personal observation, to be inaccurate. He did not rest content with hearsay. His highest ambition, in making out his case, was to state facts.

Mr. P. alluded also to some remarks which had fallen from the member from Arkansas, [Mr. YELL,] who had expressed the opinion that the present building was adequate to the purposes for which it was designed. He would ask that learned judge a simple question. How was light to be obtained in the lower story of the hall of that building, four hundred and fifty-six feet long, eight feet wide, with both ends closed; one-half of the story being under ground, and a high wall in front of the building, and ascending to the next story; how could he obtain sufficient light in such a hall, for the most necessary purposes for which light is required?

Mr. P. said that these walls should have been at least three feet and six inches thick; that the iron bands are now precisely in the position where they are least useful, to wit: at the corners, and not at the antæ, where, if at all, they should be. And he entered into a particular statement of the number of rooms, which it was a part of the plan to put into the building, many of which he demonstrated must be entirely unfit for use, by reason of the want of light, and the dampness. He also showed great errors in the calculations of the cost of executing different parts of the work, and demonstrated the entire want of any thing like a fixed plan of proceeding, on the part of the architect, from first to last. He thought the duty of the legislative branch of the Government to take the execution of this and similar works into its own hands; believing as he did, that the duties of the Executive were already sufficiently onerous, without superadding those of master builder of the public offices. The Legislature, he contended, should attend to these matters itself, and carry them on, by appointments emanating from itself, of men in whom confidence could be placed, and who would be responsible to Congress for the manner in which they did their duty. This would be the course, he said, that each man would pursue in his own case, not only in architecture, but in law, in commerce, and in every other department of life.

This was the building of the nation, and it was not his. He had here strung out facts which he had ascertained by careful examination for the benefit of those concerned. It was proper to act as they saw fit. On them rested the responsibility. He had shown them that their money was being uselessly lavished, almost without any accountability on the part of those entrusted with its expenditure, and here Mr. P. remarked upon the meagreness and unsatisfactory character of the accounts rendered by the Commissioners of Public Buildings, who had put down a gross amount of estimates, with a long string of dittoes, instead of giving particular statements of every item of expenditure. That was not the way, he, [Mr PRATT] did his own business, and he was not inclined to permit that of the country to be done in that loose and unsatisfactory manner. He certainly did not intend to impute any thing like default to that officer; but what he wanted were the facts, that he might be able to act understandingly.

In the inquiry ordered by the House, as a part of the duty of the Committee on Public Buildings, they had had the aid of experience and disinterested architects from New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Vermont; not one of them sustained the views and statements of the architect of public buildings; and he, [Mr. PRATT,] had already said enough in other portions of his remarks, to convince the House that the statements of that architect had not always been correct, or consistent with themselves, in relation to this subject. He had deceived two Presidents already, and was seemingly disposed to lead the country into an expense of some $3,000,000 to carry on this extravagant project of his; and should this be done? What was the proposed alternative? To cause the walls of this building to be taken down, and its materials used for the erection of the Post Office, and then to erect a substantial and economical Treasury Building, according to a feasible and reasonable plan, as proposed in the bill under consideration; and what would be the expense of taking down and removing these walls? The following estimate, Mr. PRATT said, was made by Mr Mills, which could probably be relied on safely.

1st. The present expenditures on this building amount to - - -	$200,065 79
2d. The value of the materials and work when taken out, and removed to a place of safety, with those on the ground, are estimated at -	97,800 00
	$102,265 79
3d. The site being changed would render it unnecessary to regrade and pave 15th street, and construct a culvert under the same, estimated at (which deduct) - -	20,000 00
Making the total estimated loss -	$82,265 79
4th. in the event of removing the building, there will be no necessity to take down, or alter the State Department building, which cost $100,000, and the saving here which might properly be carried to the credit of the account, would be	80,000 00
Leaving an actual loss of only -	$2,265 79

But, said Mr. P. I fear I am troubling the committee beyond their patience. I will relieve them. I am no friend to long speeches; and what I dislike in others, I will not myself inflict on them. I went into this inquiry, and into the discussion of the subject, in a practical way, as a business man. The building, which is the subject of present consideration, is not mine, Mr. Chairman, but yours. It is for you to act as you please upon the advice which has now been given you. If you take it, well and good; if not, do not complain if you find, when too late, that it had been better to follow it. The passage of this bill would save the country at least a half million of dollars. The building now erecting, if permitted to go on, would cost more, ere it is complete, than its erection thus far has cost. With these plain facts, stated thus plainly, I leave the decision of the question to the House, where it properly belongs.

PROTECTION OF THE FRONTIER.

REMARKS OF MR. FULTON, OF ARKANSAS,

In Senate, June 13, 1838—On the bill to set apart a belt of land on the western borders of the States of Missouri and Arkansas as bounty lands, to be granted to settlers engaged for a term of years in defence of the frontier.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he should like to hear the provisions of this bill explained; when

Mr. FULTON arose, and said:

MR. PRESIDENT: The Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] has only anticipated my intention, in asking an explanation of the objects of the bill which has just been read to the Senate. The measure proposed by the bill is of too much importance to at least two States of this Union, not to enlist the deepest anxiety on the part of those who represent them on this floor, or to be submitted to the Senate without a zealous effort to satisfy every Senator that, in voting for the bill, he is not only supporting a measure of great national importance, but also a measure calculated, in the most economical manner, to give security and protection to our exposed southwestern frontier; a measure, sir, which, in all human probability, may be the means of preventing, at no distant day, that portion of our country from being deluged in blood. The report upon this subject of the Committee on Public Lands, has given the reasons which induced a majority of that committee to sanction the measure; but, as the members of the Senate may not have felt the force of those reasons as sensibly as those of us must do who are so deeply interested for the lives and property of our constituents, and who must necessarily regard with intense solicitude every measure calculated, in any manner, to afford them protection, yet I cannot but indulge the hope that a further and fuller consideration of the subject must lead the Senate to the adoption of similar conclusions with those which influenced the action of the committee in reporting the bill upon your table.

The bill contemplates the creation of a strong military force upon the western borders of Missouri and Arkansas, of sufficient strength, and in such a position, as, when united with such a portion of the troops of the United States as the Government may be able to assign to the defence of that frontier, will be capable of giving protection to the country, and, by forming a barrier against the sudden incursions of hostile Indians, (now concentrated upon that frontier in such numbers as renders them a most formidable foe,) will be the means of giving security to all the inhabitants of both those border States.

By the provisions of the bill, a belt of land, two townships deep, commencing on Red river, and running across the States of Arkansas and Missouri to the Missouri river, within and bordering upon the western boundaries of those States, is to be set apart as bounty lands, to be granted in quarter sections to such persons as shall enrol themselves as volunteers or militiamen, to be organized and regularly trained for military service, and each of whom shall go upon and settle the quarter section he shall select. Each settler is to be registered, and to be bound at all times to take up arms in case of an apprehended or actual attack by the Indians upon the settlements, and to continue in service as long as troops may be required for the defence of the frontier. It will be the interest of each settler to see that the companies and regiments are fully organized agreeably to the provisions of the bill, and that he is regularly exercised and instructed in military tactics, as the title to the land is made to depend upon the organizing and training of the settlers, and without which the right is forfeited. The bill requires that each settler shall select and occupy the quarter section he wishes to own, and shall cause himself to be registered as the claimant of such quarter section; which registration will secure the possession, unless the same is forfeited by a failnre to comply strictly with the terms imposed by the provisions of the bill. These terms are, as already stated, either that the occupant shall unite himself with a volunteer company, bound to serve upon the frontier for five years, or shall enrol himself in a militia company for a like period of five years, and which company must belong to a regiment regularly organized and officered, and to be kept at all times prepared for action. These volunteer or militia troops are to be regularly trained to service, and to be subjected to such military duty as may be required of them during the whole term of five years, even should it extend to constant service during the whole of that time; the right to the land to be forfeited if the same is not occupied for five years from the time of registration, or upon a refusal to do military duty at any time during that period. The fact that no title can be obtained except upon the certificate of the proper officer that the settler has strictly complied with all the requisitions of the bill, and has faithfully served his country for five years, creates a perfect security that the services will be rendered, and that the fullest consideration will be paid for the bounty of the Government.

The object of the committee in limiting the quantity to be granted to each settler to one quarter section, was in order to increase the number of troops, and, at the same time, place them in such a convenient position to each other as would secure promptitude and certainty in bringing them immediately into the field of action. It was estimated that of the quantity of land included within the proposed limits, much more than one half of it would be unfit for cultivation; and, when it is considered that the most valuable tracts are already sold and settled, it is believed that within the belt of land proposed to be set apart by this bill, there would not be much over five thousand quarter sections which would be likely to be settled under the provisions of the bill; so that, if the inducement should be found to be sufficient to produce the desirable object contemplated by the bill, the force which would be in this way obtained would not exceed five thousand men. When it was considered that there are, or will be in a very short period, about seventy-five thousand Indians of the various tribes collected together and settled so close to each other as to be able to embody a force of fifteen thousand warriors almost at a moment's warning, all of whom have been removed from the east to the west of the Mississippi, and who have been, by the policy of the Government, concentrated immediately upon the borders of the State of Arkansas, many of whom, also, have been removed there under circumstances justifying the belief that they will avail themselves of the first favorable opportunity to gratify their thirst for blood by making inroads upon the frontier settlements, and against which a war of the most devastating description might be at this time most successfully prosecuted, it was considered by the committee that the additional force which this bill might be capable of affording, would be still necessary even if such an increase of the army took place as would enable the Government to place upon that frontier from five to seven thousand regular troops. And when the great uncertainty of the increase of the army is taken into consideration, the importance of such a measure as the one proposed by the present bill becomes still more obvious.

Mr. President, this bill does not propose a mere donation to the settler. It is not intended to encourage persons to seize upon the public lands, as the hardy pioneers of the West have, as I think, most unjustly been accused of having done. No, sir: those who are to get the benefit of this measure are required to render valuable services to their country. The policy of granting bounties in lands to those who risk their lives in the public service, is as old as the Government itself. And what service, I would ask, can be greater than that of voluntarily placing onesself in the very face of danger, as all must do who comply with the provisions of this bill? What better troops, I would ask, could there be than might be obtained in the manner proposed by the bill? These settlers would be called on to defend their property, their families, and their lives. They would go forth to battle, animated not only by a proper sense of the obligation which the service they have entered into imposes, but also by the consciousness that the lives of others, near and dear to them, depend upon their valor. They would fight, not only from a sense of duty, but for their country, and their homes, and their firesides. In this way may a respectable and efficient force be permanently established upon the frontier, to maintain and supply which the Government will not be required to expend a single cent, except when the men are called into active service. Once established there, with the improvements and cultivation which each will be required to make to support himself for five years, their population will become fixed, and although all may not always remain, yet the inhabitants will be so permanently established, by separate farms, that the number of occupants will be, most probably, continued, and a dense settlement of citizen soldiers will thus be secured, capable, almost within themselves, of giving security to the frontier in all future times.

It has been objected that a thick settlement of our citizens close upon the Indian border, would be calculated to lead to difficulties with the Indians. The best answer to this objection is derived from the experience of the past. The counties immediately bordering upon the Indian line, in the State of Arkansas, (and through which the belt of land now proposed to be set apart runs,) are the most populous counties of the State. A highly respectable, industrious, and enterprising people are now inhabiting this belt of land, having purchased the land of the Government at a time when they had no right to suppose they were destined to be exposed to all the horrors of the tomahawk and scalping knife. These citizens of Arkansas have lived in the immediate neighborhood of the Indians for many years. No intrusions upon the Indian country have ever taken place; no depredations have been committed; and the established boundary between our citizens and the Indian tribes, has been as sacredly respected as it would have been if it had been defended by a sufficient standing army to enforce respect. No, sir: our frontier inhabitants are as good and law-abiding a people as live. From such a population, no matter how dense they may become, nor how close they may be to the border, no difficulties with the Indians need be apprehended from them. They have amongst them many hardy adventurers, who have endured the greatest privations in reaching the country of their choice; but they are now generally surrounded by all the comforts of life, and by a course of industry and prudence, have made themselves independent. They are a moral and exemplary people, and peace and good order universally prevails throughout those distant settlements. Relying upon each other for mutual protection, they are bound together by the strongest ties. No deeds of violence happen there. The Government has placed them in their present perilous situation, and they have a right to expect from her the most ample protection. They are not willing to believe that their country will abandon them to their fate, or leave them a prey to the merciless savage, instigated to deeds of blood by imaginary wrongs, and the bad counsels of wicked and vindictive spirits amongst them. And yet, sir, such is the state of alarm which prevails upon the frontier; so suspicious have been the movements of the Indians; so many secret councils have recently been held; such have been the character of their threats; such their confidence in their strength, and the knowledge of our weakness; and so universal is the belief there that a combined Indian attack will ere long be made upon our settlements; that if adequate protection is not immediately afforded, the country will either be abandoned, or such steps will be taken for the purpose of fortifying the country and placing it in a state of defence, as they may themselves be capable of, if they find that they have been abandoned to their fate by the National Government. Our people are brave, sir, and would make a determined stand if they could be embodied; but, separated as they are, and scattered over so wide a surface, an Indian force of many thousand warriors, such as they are now capable of collecting instantly together, armed as they have been by our Government, and well supplied with ammunition, might deluge our country with blood, and spread desolation over the whole border settlements, before a sufficient force could be embodied to stay the work of death.

The excitement which now prevails upon the frontier, from the belief that the powerful Indian tribes are rife for war, makes it the imperious duty of the Government to afford prompt and adequate protection. I trust, sir, I have satisfied the Senate that the measure now proposed will add materially to the defence of the country, and would form a solid barrier against the incursions of a merciless and exterminating savage foe.

I feel it to be my duty to state to the Senate and to the country, that the inhabitants of Missouri and Arkansas are at this moment in a most critical situation. The lives of all sexes and conditions are in jeopardy. They are now looking with intense anxiety to the action of Congress. Nothing has yet been done. Will you, after having forced upon them such terrible neighbors, refuse them that protection which humanity demands? I am satisfied it will not be refused. By the proposed measure, the services of an efficient and considerable force will be secured for five years, at the rate of $200 for each soldier. It is true, they may not be required, even during the whole of that period, to go to the field of battle; but they will be at all times in the face of danger, and fully prepared for action. I feel the utmost confidence that a body of troops thus collected together, may be certainly relied upon, and that they will bravely and nobly defend the land they have upon such terms chosen as their homes. If the country proposed to be thus occupied, was an uninhabited wilderness, then indeed, perhaps, some might fear that such a measure might cause it to be filled up with a dangerous and lawless population. Settled, however, as this country already is, by an honorable, high-minded, and virtuous people, amongst whom desperate and bad men would not be permitted to remain, the vacant lands must necessarily be occupied by such a description of people as will promote the prosperity, as well as add to the defence, of the country.

In an economical point of view, no defence could be cheaper than that which is proposed by the bill under consideration. It is true, it would not do to be alone relied upon; but if a dense settlement is presented to the Indians all along the line, trained to the use of arms, and so organized as to be capable of taking the field in considerable force at the shortest notice, such would be their consciousness of our military strength, and our ability to defend ourselves, as must necessarily force them to remain at peace, or at least to hesitate long before they would consent to make war upon such a settlement. Powerful, however, as are the Indian tribes immediately upon our border, and relieved, as they now are, from all apprehensions of attack from the Indians of the prairies, and since the policy has been adopted of making peace between the wild Indians and those who are somewhat civilized, the necessity for maintaining a sufficient number of regular troops, not only to preserve peace amongst the Indians themselves, but also to deter them from all attempts towards uniting together, and making common cause against the frontier States, is most strikingly manifested. Indeed, sir, it is the duty of this Government to place the frontier in the most perfect state of defence. Experience has proved to us that whenever the Indians become desperate, even the fear of extermination will not prevent them from madly rushing upon death, and forcing upon us the necessity of destroying them, as the only mode by which they can be prevented from perpetrating the most desperate deeds of blood. It is also true, that no matter how war may come upon us, the certain consequence always will be, that then at least we must expect an Indian war to break out. We cannot hope to escape from war altogether; and therefore, a large force will be constantly required to keep the Indians in check. If a sufficient force could have been sent to Florida at the time the Indians began first to manifest a hostile spirit, what a vast expenditure of blood and treasure would have been saved to the nation? So long as there are indications of hostility manifested by the Indians, or a remote prospect of a foreign war exists, the only means of preserving peace will be to place our exposed frontier in such a state of defence, as will be calculated to give ample protection to the people.

Some objection may be made to the quantity of land proposed to be set apart for military purposes by this bill. But, sir, that portion of it now unoccupied, and capable of yielding a support, is not considerable. The quantity of land proposed to be set apart is only two townships in depth; not wider than is necessary to create a barrier over which an invader cannot pass. The belt commences on Red river; and, as the greater portion of the country between Red river and the Arkansas is exceedingly broken and sterile, only a small portion in that section of the State, within the proposed limits, will be settled upon on the terms offered. That section between the Arkansas river and the Missouri line, is capable of supporting a dense population; and such fearless and enterprising men as will risk their lives, and those of their families, there at this time, and who desire to live by field labor, may procure homes in between those limits, if disposed to avail themselves of the terms offered. But as already much of this land has been purchased from the United States, the remainder will not be sufficient to afford settlements for a larger number of persons than the defence of the country demands. The same remark applies, I presume, to the country between the line of the State of Missouri and the Missouri river. This is the extent to which the bounty settlement is contemplated to extend. That portion of the State of Missouri bordering on the Missouri river is considered not to be in danger, or so much exposed to Indian aggression.

The policy of all other Governments has been to grant lands with a view to encourage their settlement and cultivation. Our country having settled so rapidly, many of our statesmen have become opposed to the wide-spread extension of our population. Their policy is to adopt measures to enrich the nation from the sales of the public lands. No measure, therefore, having for its object only he settlement of the country, could hope to find avor at this time with Congress. But as the present measure proposes the grant of lands already culled over, and in consideration for perils and services to be rendered upon a national object of the first magnitude and importance, and in the defence of a portion of the country, to protect which the Government has, by its own action, imposed upon itself an obligation of the highest and most binding character, and to neglect which would be a breach of faith, which would not only be disgraceful, but would also involve her in a most bloody and exterminating war—it does seem to me that the bill before us cannot fail to find favor in the breasts of Senators.

The proposed measure will create a considerable force, answering nearly every purpose of a corresponding amount of regular troops, and without subjecting the Government to any of the expenses, or giving rise to any of the apprehensions which standing armies are calculated to produce.

I trust the Senate is satisfied that there is an urgent necessity for a large increase of force upon the southwestern frontier. It is not my purpose to urge this or any other measure, by an attempt to create unnecessary alarm. It is known to all that a vast number of Indians have been congregated upon the frontier. It is also known that they have been instructed in the use of the rifle, and that we have put the very best description of that weapon into their hands. It is known that great dissatisfaction and loud complaints have been poured out against the Government by the inhabitants of the frontier, for having manifested so little concern, as they think, for the perilous situation in which they have been placed by the policy of the Government. They tell their representatives not to cease their efforts until they succeed in rousing every department of the Government to a proper sense of the danger to which they are exposed. They say it will not do to compare their situation with that of the early settlers of Kentucky and Tennessee. Those settlers had to contend with (comparatively speaking) but a handful of Indian warriors, and those, too, not armed with the deadly rifle. They, too, went prepared to fight for the country they settled in. They spilt their blood freely, and held the land at an immense sacrifice of life, and by sufferings, at the mention of which all our sympathies are awakened. This Government has no right to place the citizens of Arkansas and Missouri in a similar situation. The people of those States have done no act which should involve them in an Indian war, and particularly such a one as may now be waged against them. It is against the whole people of the United States that the Indians are disposed to make war, and it is, therefore, the duty of the Government to see that our citizens are not left to suffer alone. I trust, sir, that every measure of defence will be promptly taken by the Government; and I hope that the measure proposed by the bill under consideration may be speedily adopted.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

SPEECH OF MR. TOUCEY,

OF CONNECTICUT,

In the House of Representatives, June 23, 1838—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill for the establishment of an Independent Treasury.

Mr. TOUCEY rose and said:

I regret, sir, that this measure has not been brought into discussion in this House at an earlier period of the session. The bill from the Senate on the same subject was laid upon the table, without discussion, by a silent vote; and this great measure, the deliverance of the Government of the American people from abject and dangerous dependence upon the banks, and the establishment of an Independent Treasury in pursuance of the plain principles of the Constitution—a measure, fraught with immense interest to the country, and destined to influence permanently, as well as deeply, the welfare of this great nation—has not, until this late period, been made the subject of debate and deliberation in the House of Representatives. I approach it now under a strong sense of my responsibility to a most enlightened constituency, and to the American people; and I shall endeavor to discharge my duty under the guidance of truth and reason, and in entire forgetfulness of every consideration not connected with the best interests of the country.

This measure has already taken effect, practically, by force of existing laws, and was brought about by the suspension of specie payments on the part of the banks. It is no longer a question whether the separation shall take place, but whether a new union shall be formed with them, after they have separated themselves from the Government; have entirely failed to perform their engagements in the most essential particulars; have, in the midst of a long and prosperous peace, inflicted upon the country a multitude of depreciated currencies, and when the whole system has fallen prostrate under the weight of its own excesses. I am against a reunion, and I propose to state the reasons for my opinion.

We are still in the midst of one of the greatest calamities which can befall a people, because it reaches every individual in the country. No one so humble, no one so exalted, as not to taste its bitter fruits. In the downward progress to it, and in the convulsive struggle to return and escape from it, the value of every man's property is unsettled, every contract is changed, and every human being in the land is visited with injustice, fraud, and robbery, under the forms of law. It is the most stupendous iniquity which can be practiced, and prevail in a civilized community, without involving it at once in all the horrors of insurrection and bloodshed.

Such a calamity, so extensive, and all-pervading, cannot exist without a plain, palpable, adequate cause. What is it? If the Government has done the mischief, if the agents of the people have brought it upon us, let them be held responsible for it, and let the indignation of the whole country pursue them to the uttermost. But if, on the other hand, it has been brought upon us by the agents of another power, which has sprung up as it were by stealth, and grown upon us unawares, into perfect organization, and the most gigantic dimensions; which has a foothold in every part of this broad land, already rises higher than the Republic, can master the Government itself, and dictate law to the States and the people—the law of necessity which must be obeyed—if this great overshadowing, organized, moneyed power exists among us, and has brought this calamity upon the country by its own irregularities or abuses, then, sir, let us hold it responsible for the mischief, acquit the Government of the charge, and let us provide guarantees for the future.

What was the cause of this calamity—the cause of causes; the cause of the many conspiring agencies, which contributed to produce it? What was the true, real, radical, vital cause, from which this mighty mischief sprung into existence?

Will any one deny that the immediate, efficient cause was the undue expansion of the currency by an excess of paper money? The fact is most certain; established by indubitable evidence, and acknowledged on all sides; that the actual currency of this country, at the commencement of the past year, was incomparably greater than at any former period. In the year 1830, the whole currency of bank paper was but sixty-one millions; in the beginning of 1837, it was one hundred and fifty millions, and was estimated by some of very high authority, to be one hundred and eighty-five millions. Thus the actual currency of the country, in that short period, suddenly, violently, in subversion of every principle of political science, of every maxim of political wisdom, had been augmented nearly threefold.

What was the unavoidable consequence of this incredible augmentation of the currency? For, although the results of a very considerable expansion may be overcome, without producing overwhelming calamities, yet, when it proceeds beyond certain bounds, an earthquake or a tempest is not less under the dominion of man, or its effects less inevitable or less disastrous. A great enlargement of the currency, beyond all due bounds, is necessarily followed always by a great and rapid increase of prices, (without an increase of value,) an irrepressible spirit of trade and speculation, an inundation of foreign goods, an accumulation of foreign debt, a heavy drain of specie, a violent pressure upon the banks; and when the drain of specie is so great, and so long continued, that the banks are unable to meet it with the specie fund which they have on hand, why, of course, every body knows they must suspend their payments, that is, in gold and silver, the only currency which will go abroad.

This expansion of the paper currency, this increase of prices, this spirit of speculation, this flood of foreign goods, this foreign debt, this heavy drain of specie, and this pressure upon the banks, and their suspension, we have witnessed in regular succession; the over-banking, over-trading, and excessive speculation have passed under the eyes of every one; and the deplorable consequences, the prostration of credit, of business, and of the banking institutions of the country, so severely felt in the embarrassments and bankruptcies of so many thousands—I had almost said millions—and the curse of so many depreciated, inconvertible paper currencies, will not soon be forgotten by the men of the present generation.

Who were the authors of this mischief? Who put forth this excess of paper money? Who produced this expansion of the currency by this excess of paper money, and thus became responsible for the consequences which necessarily ensued? Was it the banks, or was it the Federal Government? Was it the banks, which have been clothed, by the several States, with the high sovereign power of furnishing the entire paper currency of the country; or was it the Federal Government, which neither has, nor exercises, any such power? By what arts of sophistry shall the responsibility be transferred from the exclusive authors of paper money, who have issued it in boundless excess, to others, who have issued none, but have striven to increase the currency of hard money?

The answer is given by the banks: We have done it; we have put forth such an excess of paper currency that we have not been able to redeem it; but you have destroyed the great regulator by which we were checked; you have refused to recharter a National Bank, by which we should have been restrained from these excesses; and we have run riot, and you are responsible.

The advocates of a National Bank have always insisted on its indispensable necessity, or, at least, its great utility, as a regulator of the currency. This is the great argument for such an institution, urged by its friends, and they deem it unanswerable and irresistible. From 1830 to 1836, we had such a bank. What was its course? Did it regulate the currency? Did it hold the State banks in check, and confine them within proper limits? Did it prevent, or even impede, the enormous expansion of the currency, which has proved so disastrous? Far from it. On the contrary, it was precisely the worst conducted institution in the country, the most irregular in its action, the greatest disturber of the currency, the most vicious in its influence, the most powerful for evil, and most immediately and directly efficient in producing the present disasters. Let facts speak; let history speak; let the records of the Bank tell its own tale. In 1830, its issues were fifteen millions and its loans forty millions; in May, 1832, during the struggle for the succession to the Presidency of that year, it had increased its issues to twenty-six millions, and its loans to seventy millions. In this then unprecedented career of expansion it was, of course, followed by the whole train of State banks. Suddenly taking an opposite direction, it forced the whole army of State banks to contract; and in November, 1834, its issues were down to fifteen millions and its loans to forty-five millions. Suddenly again veering about, it set off with redoubled speed and vigor in a still wilder and more disastrous career of expansion; and on the 1st of July, 1835, in the brief period of eight months, it had expanded its issues from fifteen to twenty-five millions, and its loans from forty-five to sixty-five millions; and, if the State banks were guilty of an equal expansion, that memorable period of eight months deluged the country with more than fifty millions of currency, and more than one hundred millions of bank loans, beyond what existed at the commencement of it.

It was impossible that this sudden and vast increase of the currency (to pass over that of 1832) should not have broken up the settled course of all business, disturbed the prices of all property, and roused and maddened the spirit of speculation, already rife, to tenfold fierceness. We find, therefore, that immediately after the Bank of the United States, then acting under a charter granted by Congress, began this expansion, immediately after the termination of the ever-memorable session of panic and consternation, the sales of the public lands began to increase, and rose to five millions in the very year 1834, to fifteen millions in 1835, and to twenty-five millions in 1836. At the same time our imports began to increase, and rose to one hundred and twenty-six millions in 1834, to one hundred and fifty millions in 1835, and to one hundred and ninety millions in 1836. At the same time, so profitable was the business of banking, and so great was the employment of banks, that bank capital increased from two hundred millions, in 1834, to two hundred and thirty-one millions in 1835, to two hundred and fifty-one millions in 1836, and to three hundred and twenty-three millions in 1837. From 1834 to 1837, bank capital increased more than one hundred and twenty millions, bank loans more than two hundred and fifty millions, and the surplus in the Treasury rose to forty millions.

The Bank of the United States, the boasted regulator of the currency, the vaunted controller of the State banks, was the first to start off in this mad career of expansion, of over-banking, over trading, and exorbitant speculation, and pushed on at the top of its speed, under whip and spur, followed by the rest in close pursuit, until the whole troop, exhausted, fell prostrate, and all who were borne along by them were brought to the dust. Such was the forlorn and wretched condition of the currency (inflated, false, and hollow, ready to explode at the slightest shock,) which the Bank of the United States bequeathed to the country as the fruits of twenty years' salutary influence and beneficent operation!

Such was the action of the banks. Furnishing the entire paper currency of the country, they increased it to such an extent, under the lead of the Bank of the United States, that its immense expansion produced, 1st, a great and rapid advance of prices, with its usual concomitant, an exorbitant spirit of trade and speculation; 2d, a vast influx of foreign goods, with its usual attendant, an immense foreign debt; 3d, a heavy drain of gold and silver, and a tremendous pressure upon the banks, (which were out at sea, upon the top of the highest billow, with every sail unfurled;) and, lastly, a disruption and separation of the metallic and paper currencies. This is the ordinary and natural course of things. The uncontrollable laws of trade require it. It could not be otherwise, where the expansion had been enormous, and had long operated, with little to resist its powerful agency. The laws of trade must be repealed, and the course of human affairs must be entirely reversed, or the light of experience will always, and every where, disclose such results.

These enormous expansions, followed of course by corresponding contractions, are the great practical evils of the American banking system, whose radical vice is, that this propensity to periodical expansions is the law of its nature, under its existing organization. It would be difficult to devise a system, which would have a more powerful and necessary tendency in that direction. The interests of the banks and the interests of those who deal with them, the large dividends on the one side, and the large accommodations and ample profits on the other, combine perpetually to produce these expansions and explosions of the currency. The profits of banking, and the profits of trade and speculation, go hand in hand, increasing together, and by the same operations. Most men want money, because it can be profitably employed. The banks can manufacture it to any extent, and send it forth in any quantities, because they are not in truth called upon to redeem it. There is absolutely no demand for the precious metals, no necessity of redeeming their paper, no necessity of keeping any sum beyond the merest pittance of gold and silver in their vaults, while the expansion is in progress, and of course the bubble may be blown indefinitely. At last, in the midst of the most largely extended business, and the most highly excited hopes, an adverse balance of trade, a foreign movement upon American securities, calls for the gold and silver in the banks, and the whole scene is changed in an instant; the bubble bursts, and ruin and desolation stalk through the land, claiming half the community for their victims!

Having thus stated the direct and obvious cause of the present derangement of the currency and business of the country, it becomes an inquiry of the gravest import, whether any remedy can be applied, which, though it may not entirely remove, may yet greatly repress, and hold in check, this vicious propensity of our moneyed institutions, and how far the Government has ministered, or can minister, by its operations, to the same important object; important alike to those institutions, to all who are particularly interested in them, and to the whole community.

Passing over the great question of the constitutional authority of Congress to create a National Bank, the concentration of so much power in the hands of one man, the establishment of a virtual monarchy in the moneyed world, the danger threatened by it to the interests of the country, and the liberties of the people, and the unequivocal and repeated expression of the public will against it, I shall confine myself to the only view appropriate in this connection, the influence of such an institution upon what I have denominated the radical vice of the American banking system—its propensity to expansion and explosion.

I have already anticipated this view, by a narrative of facts and experience, which render theory and speculation of little moment. We have seen precisely this institution, at a period most favorable for the exertion of a corrective agency, first and foremost to stimulate the currency and trade of the country to the brink of destruction; opening the floodgates when they should be shut, and shutting them when they should be open; without the skill to discover, without the ability to correct the evil, or without the disposition to do so, unless it may have the Government and the country under its heels.

But why should we expect that a National Bank, even if it were not an instrument of partisan warfare, or an element of political power, would furnish an adequate check upon these expansions of the currency? From its very nature, it is essentially the same, in the laws of its existence, with all other banks. It is immaterial in what city of this Union its directory may reside, or under what name they may act. Subject to the same general influences, and operated upon by the same powerful and universal causes, it would inevitably itself take the same downward course. Borne along upon the same tide with all other banks, it would equally, with them, be incapable of offering resistance. The same interests of the Bank on the one hand, and the same interests of those who dealt with it on the other, would be in incessant operation, in perpetual conspiracy, for ever leading to the same end—the expansion of the business and profits of both. We have yet to see men, in the conduct of a moneyed institution, organized for purposes of profit, act invariably, and at all times, in direct opposition to motives of pecuniary interest, to the urgent solicitations of confiding and dependant friends, and to the importunate demands of an excited community. A National Bank might, at times, check a solitary irregularity here and there, but it would only inflame and aggravate those general disorders of which we are speaking; would only perpetuate those general abuses which we are deprecating; would only augment the power of expansion, and that fatal tendency of the system to revulsion, which we desire to counteract and resist. The history of the past, to which I have alluded, drawn from the records of a National Bank, fully illustrates and establishes these positions, not as theory, but as actual, attested experience.

It is beyond the utmost power of human legislation to remove, in any great degree, this deep-rooted evil—an undue increase of the representative part of the currency over the real money represented by it—without diminishing the one, and increasing the other; without substituting a metallic currency for some portion of the paper currency, and enlarging the amount of gold and silver to be kept in the banks as a basis for the remainder. We have too little hard money in use, because the Government had discarded it, and because all the channels of circulation are filled with paper money of larger or smaller denominations, which dispenses with it; and we have too little in the banks, because year after year the fund which lies there is not called for, is therefore encroached upon from time to time, and not kept up; and, finally, in the ordinary course of affairs, is not deemed necessary. These two evils, so prevalent in times past, are the very elements of an undue expansion of a paper currency.

The policy of the Administration of the Federal Government, and of its friends generally, has been to reform these evils, and the abuses connected with them. In the first place we enlarged the mint, and increased the coinage. In a very short period we coined more gold than had been coined from the foundation of the Government. In the next place, we established a new valuation of the gold coin. Before that, there was practically a premium for exporting it, in consequence of its low valuation; and it went immediately out of the country as fast as it was coined. Now it remains in the country. In the third place, in the several States where our friends had the control, they prohibited the use of small bills, as had been done in France and England, and supplied their place with hard money. By these measures, we increased the gold and silver in actual circulation among the people of the United States, from four millions in 1834 to thirty millions of dollars in 1837; and we increased the gold and silver in the banks from twenty-four millions, in 1834, to forty-five millions of dollars, in 1837. In three or four years, we added forty-seven millions of dollars to our stock of gold and silver in the country. The States, it is true, where the Opposition have had the control, have to some extent counteracted this policy, by flooding the country with small bills, which, as far as they prevail, expel the gold and silver; and the banks by suspending specie payments obtained a temporary victory over our policy, by shutting up the specie in their vaults; and by arresting the circulation of it as long as their depreciated paper shall continue to circulate. The great result of this policy, however, still remains, and gold and silver is even now so abundant in the country, though locked up, that the banks are able to resume their payments, which otherwise would not have been the case. Let them resume, as they can and ought to do, and the auspicious results anticipated from this policy will be signally manifest to every body, when the measure of suppressing small bills shall have been carried into full effect. In the first place, there will be an abundance of gold and silver in circulation for the ordinary transactions of the great mass of the people. In the next place, this abundance in circulation will furnish a ready supply to the banks. At the same time the greater amount in their vaults and at their command, will enable them at all times more surely to redeem their bills and sustain their payments, in the only money recognised by law. These results, so much desired by all, will, when once accomplished, be permanently accomplished, and enjoyed without interruption, if the banks can only be compelled, or induced, to preserve themselves in that condition, which will enable them to sustain their payments; a condition so much more easy to be maintained in consequence of these very results.

But, sir, that condition the banks will not maintain, unless there shall be a uniform, steady, unremitted and persevering demand upon the specie in their vaults, which will compel them to keep an adequate supply. They are too much disposed, from motives of immediate profit, to reduce that supply too low. This is a matter of the utmost importance. The whole paper circulation of the country depends upon it for its solidity, for its convertibility, for its equality with the real money it represents, for its character as money, for its hold upon the confidence of the community, for its ability to withstand the first shock from any vicissitude in trade, the first pressure from any cause at home or abroad; and when we reflect that if this fund, aided by an abundant specie circulation, is unequal to the task of sustaining the payments of the banks, the whole paper circulation of one hundred and fifty millions is depreciated in a moment, the whole people of the country are plundered of fifteen millions at the first onset, and all the evils of broken faith, prostrate credit, and depreciated currencies, are fastened upon us by the failure, I am confident that no one will accuse me of overstating the importance of this supply of specie in the vaults of banks, of setting additional gaards over it, and rendering its withdrawal more difficult, if not impracticable.

The policy of coming ultimately, but gradually and surely to the use of coin chiefly in the fiscal operations of this Government is, in part, to fill another great channel of circulation (not in the control of any State) with gold and silver; and also to fill the banks with a larger supply by creating a uniform, steady demand upon them to a reasonable extent. The only effect upon the banks will be to check them, as was done by the late Bank of the United States, to require them to keep a larger supply of the precious metals, to prevent them from doing too much business upon too little capital, to constrain them in a degree to keep within safer limits, to guard the public in some measure against those dangerous expansions which are always followed by disastrous consequences, to prevent the growth of those enormous excerscences upon the body politic, which absorb the vital juices and induce the most terrible maladies. This sound and healthy circulation of the precious metals, the banks, if they are not too overgrasping, will easily supply and sustain. It requires only an increase of their supply not inconsistent with a reasonable profit. It will go out of their vaults and return again, and the process will be gradual, constant and steady. It will not go out of the country, and when exchange is against us, and there is a demand for the precious metals for exportation, it will not diminish the ability of the banks to meet that demand.

This is the great power of regulating the currency conferred by the Constitution: to coin money, to regulate its value, and use it in the fiscal operations of this Government. It is not a doubtful power, obtained by forced constructions. It is a clear and express grant; and if exercised in the mode proposed, it will hold the banks in check, restrain their improvident issues, keep them within safe bounds, or at least have a most powerful tendency to do so, by a reasonable, constant, steady, unremitting, all-pervading operation, which the banks now affect to dread so much, and for no reason whatever, except that it will require at all times a broader specie basis to be kept perpetually in their vaults; the very thing which the whole community so much desire, which the immense interests involved in our vastly extended paper currency imperatively demand, and which cannot be dispensed with without essentially compromising periodically, at short intervals, the substantial prosperity of the country.

Such will be the effect of the return of this Government, not suddenly, but gradually, by sure and cautious steps, to the use of its own money in its fiscal operations. It must be obvious that it will not destroy or prejudice a safe, well regulated credit system; on the other hand, it will strengthen it where it ought to be strengthened; will reform it where it needs reformation; and will only lop off abuses.

Instead of overthrowing it, it will give it a sound and healthful existence. I have, sir, both here and elsewhere, listened to much unmeaning and some gorgeous declamation upon the splendid results of the credit system; as if we were indebted, not to our liberty, our free Government, our equal laws, our untiring industry, to the overflowing cup of Heaven's bounty in this new world, for our vast and astonishing progress in wealth and power, but to monopolies and exclusive privileges granted to a few favored individuals; as if the very vices, deformities, and distempers, which grew out of an excess of health, were the parent of it; as if the very evils generated in the hot bed of our prosperity, were the very cause and foundation of that prosperity. Sir, I deny that the return to the constitutional currency in the pecuniary transactions of this Government will injure a just credit system at all. If there be any force in the considerations which I have urged, they show that it will have exactly the contrary effect, by giving to that system greater stability and a more equable operation; by enlarging its solid basis and repressing and preventing, in some measure, expansions on the one hand and contractions on the other; and by guarding against those terrible vicissitudes, in which the trade, commerce, currency, and credit of the country are so often overthrown.

The policy of the Administration has been directed exclusively to the improvement of the currency, by increasing the solid part of it, and checking these expansions.

Even the tendency of the far famed Specie Circular was merely to check the banks in some small degree, as the friends of a National Bank insist would be done by such an institution. It carried no specie out of the country; it merely removed a portion to the interior. It created a demand upon the Atlantic banks, which in some measure checked and limited that expansion, which, in the event, has been so destructive. It perhaps prevented the fever from rising to a fatal height. It perhaps ac celerated a little the final winding up, which could not have failed to be worse, the longer it was delayed. At all events, it did not increase the expansion; it did not increase the amount of foreign or domestic debt; it did not inflame the universal madness, which seemed to reign triumphant in all classes of adventurous men; it did check, in some measure, the career of infuriate speculation, and arrest, in part, the progress of those evils which were then threatening the business and currency of the country with overthrow.

I say then, sir, that the Bank of the United States, chartered by Congress, in conjunction with the State banks, brought upon the country the calamity under which we are now suffering, while the policy of the Government has been directed to our permanent relief from similar calamities in all time to come. And it is notorious that the same Bank, under the same control, conducted by the same hand, but acting under a charter granted by a single State, has taken the principal lead in preventing an early return to a better state of things, and is now the chief obstacle in the way.

Such has been the policy of the Administration; such has been its course. Is there any thing in the present condition of the country which should induce it to change its ground? I have already observed that this policy has been partially and temporarily arrested. The circulation of small bills, under the authority of certain States, was at war with this policy; the immense expansion of the banks, by which the paper money was increased so much more rapidly than the precious metals, was still more at war with it; and the suspension of specie payments has crowned with partial success the efforts of the Opposition to thwart this policy of the General Government, and of those State Governments which have co-operated with it.

It is to this suspension of payments, on the part of the banks, that we are almost entirely indebted for this temporary defeat. This is the only reason why the metallic currency has disappeared, and why the country is overrun with depreciated paper. Let the banks resume, and the evil is at an end. It is their duty to do so. It is equally their legal and their moral duty to resume their payments, to perform their promises, to comply with their solemn and deliberate engagements. The depreciated currencies which afflict the country are theirs. The metallic currency is the only true, legal, and constitutional standard. The paper currencies are below it. It is the absolute duty of the banks, under the laws and constitutions of the country, to maintain them at the point of equality; and that can only be done by instantaneous convertibility at the will of the holder. Until that is done, until the banks perform their promises, until they abide by their engagements, the depreciation must continue, the paper is not as it is designed to be, the representative of gold and silver, and hard money must necessarily be expelled from use, as we all know it cannot circulate side by side with a degraded currency. It is this suspension of specie payments, therefore, which is the cause of there being two currencies, if that may be called a currency, which is driven out of use by depreciated paper. Let the paper be raised to the value of gold and silver, by being convertible at will, and the depreciation would cease in a moment; the specie currency would be instantly restored, and the whole mass of evil annihilated. Whose fault, then, I ask, is it, that the banks fail to perform their moral and legal obligations, and preserve their currencies at par? Is it the fault of the Government, or their own?

The banks were invested with this high power of putting forth their currencies upon the fundamental condition—that they should at all times be equivalent to gold and silver, by being convertible at the will of the holder. The whole mass of their currencies, amounting but recently to $150,000,000, was received by the people of this country upon this indispensable condition. The faith of the banks was pledged to it. The engagement was impressed in broad and legible characters upon every parcel of the mighty mass. And yet, sir, this engagement was broken; this faith was forfeited; this fundamental condition was violated; the whole mass was degraded; the people were defrauded to the extent of the depreciation; fifteen millions of dollars were taken from their pockets just as truly as if exacted at the point of the bayonet, with this most aggravating circumstance, that it was accomplished by delusion, without the ability to resist, as they could have done had there been open force; and now, when the banks have arrested the whole specie currency, and depreciated the whole paper currency, by their failure to perform their legal obligations, they or their exclusive friends turn round and charge the evil upon the Government of the people, and denounce the Government for adhering to a currency of gold and silver, for not abandoning it at once and adopting their depreciated paper money in its place! And this great and terrible evil, existing in defiance of all law, so demoralizing in its character, so destructive in its effects upon the community, is the chosen means by which its authors and abettors are to ride into power over the necks of a suffering people.

Sir, I do not say this for the purpose of exciting hostility against any man or any set of men. But when the charge is made against a Government elected by the people, and founded upon their will, that they have given two currencies to the country, gold and silver for the office-holders, and degraded paper money for the people; when the unjust and groundless charge is made and reiterated, day after day, by the very authors of the mischief, against the Government itself, merely because it will not relapse into the depreciated currency of the banks, truth and justice require that the charge should be exposed in all its nakedness, to the contempt which it justly merits.

I say again, sir, let the banks resume, and the evil is at an end. Already have they begun without a National Bank, and with an Independent Treasury. Already are we upon the eve of a general resumption. It must take place. The people of this country are too intelligent to submit much longer to the present state of things. Let the banks do their duty, and the whole evil is annihilated. In the first place, the derangement of the paper currency will cease. If their bills are redeemed at all times promptly with gold and silver; if they are truly convertible at will; if they are in fact equivalent to the precious metals, as they profess to be, at the place where issued, the paper currency is no longer degraded nor deranged. In the second place, the specie currency, no longer banished by degraded paper, will re-appear whenever and wherever it is called for, and the immense sum, approaching one hundred millions of dollars, already in the country, no longer locked up, will come into sight and into use, as the wants or the wishes of the community shall require. In the third place, the exchanges will be instantly regulated by the laws of trade, as they should be, and not by the wit or the devices of man. Sir, no human regulations, no board of control, no device of man can repress the excesses of trade, save only the necessity of liquidating unfavorable balances, when they reach a certain point, in gold and silver. Any expedient to evade this necessity only aggravates the evil. The time of payment will come, and if there are no products of the earth, or of labor, wherewith to make payment, the precious metals must be transferred. It is of the utmost importance to the stability of trade, to the soundness of credit, for the suppression or prevention of over-trading and undue speculation, that these balances between different countries, or different parts of the same country, should be promptly and freely adjusted by the laws of trade. The great instrument is the precious metals, acting upon the currency, and when the local currency is equivalent to them, is promptly convertible into them without loss or discount, so that they can easily be obtained for it, without a large item of depreciation to be charged into the account; the exchanges will then be precisely what they ought to be—equal where they ought to be equal, unequal where they ought to be unequal, adjusted by the laws of trade in exact conformity with the principles of eternal justice, and the true interests of the respective communities. A suspension of the laws of trade is just as pernicious as a suspension of the laws of gravitation, by which the ocean is kept near its level, and within its bounds. Let the northern merchant, who has funds deposited in a bank far to the South or West, which has suspended specie payments, remember, that the laws of trade are suspended as to him, and that to the loss which ordinarily he must sustain in transferring his funds home, not exceeding the freight and insurance on specie, he must now add the depreciation of a degraded inconvertible paper currency. Finally, the resumption of payments by the banks will be simultaneous with the revival of the business of this great, rich, powerful, and prosperous country. Its progress is onward and onward. It may be depressed for a brief space; but its recuperative energy is too mighty to be subjected for a long time to the sinister designs of those; if there be such, who would make its distresses a source of pecuniary profit, or of political power.

This Government is not hostile to the banks. It adopts no measure, it recommends no measure, it pursues no line of policy, in conceived hostility to them. Its position is that of non-intervention, its policy that of non-interference, in their concerns, but to withdraw itself from them, for its own security and independence, and to leave them to the policy of the States, respectively, which created them, and alone can control them. They are confessedly within the reserved powers of the States, and there we leave them. On the other hand, this Government has a high duty to perform within its sphere. It has the sole power to coin and regulate the only money recognised by the Constitution and laws; which is not only a power, but a trust also. It is its high duty to maintain, by its own operations, the just prevalence of this hard money, this sole standard of value, this immense balance wheel, by which alone the motions of that great and tremendous machine, the paper money currency, may be so checked and regulated that it shall not, by its own self-accelerating velocity, run to destruction. Federal power and State power, each harmoniously acting within its proper sphere, and each exerting its appropriate influence, will together work out the greatest possible results of happiness and prosperity to be achieved by legislation.

I have thus far, sir, endeavored to show that the true cause of the present disorders in the currency was its expansion, by an excess of paper money; that the Bank of the United States was a principal agent in producing it, and would never be an effectual check upon that tendency of the system; that the policy of the Administration has been to increase the amount of gold and silver in the country, both in the banks and in circulation among the people; and by ultimately collecting its revenue principally in its own coin, to create a demand upon the specie in the vaults of banks, which will insure an ample supply, and check the tendency of the banks to these pernicious expansions; that this policy has not failed, but is only temporarily defeated by the suspension of specie payments, and that it is the duty of the banks immediately to perform their engagements, which will at once restore the metallic currency, bring up the degraded paper currencies to an equality with it, and put an end to the existing disorders.

I now proceed to state some further reasons why the connection between the banks and the Government ought not to be restored, and why an independent constitutional Treasury ought to be established.

The recent connection of the Government with the banks, furnished a practical illustration of its dangerous tendency in reference to these very expansions, which all now admit ought to be repressed. We have at the very outset the most astounding fact, that it actually gave forty millions to the banks in augmentation of their active capital, at the very moment when they ought to have restricted their operations

This connection has a necessary tendency to produce these expansions, at all times, to foster overbanking, over-trading, and exorbitant speculation in every emergency: and especially when other causes co-operate with it.

Our revenue is derived principally from two sources: the customs and the sales of the public lands. When, from any cause, prices begin to advance, and the spirit of speculation is abroad, it is obvious our revenue from both these sources will be greatly augmented. This excess goes immediately into the banks to swell the public deposites there, to be loaned out again to swell the ready means of an over-trading community, and the profits of the over-trading banks. By this process, the very money, which is drawn into the public Treasury for public purposes, and should be held there, and would then constitute a check upon this tendency to extravagance and excess, instead of being a check, becomes a stimulus to excessive action, and reproduces itself in rapid succession, inflames the growing disorder, and swells the tide to the utmost height. The connection gives a bounty to the banks to push on the community in the mad career; and this stimulating bounty increases, exactly as the evil and the danger and the necessity of repression increase. So, when the period of contraction and embarrassment commences, the withdrawal of this fund, always inevitable in such case, increases the embarrassment and aggravates the distress, precisely when the greatest indulgence should be granted.

On the other hand, the establishment of an Independent Treasury, and the withholding of its contents from the uses of trade, would constitute a a great and powerful check upon any excess in trade, banking, and speculation, at its inception, and in every stage of its progress. This excess augments rapidly the excess in the Treasury, which is withdrawn and withheld from the uses of the commercial community; and thus the check becomes constantly more powerful, as the evil increases, until finally it is subdued and overcome. And if this surplus, thus flowing into the Treasury, should ultimately, by the policy of this Government, consist principally of the precious metals, it would be difficult to estimate the power and influence of this check, to prevent those expansions, which the commercial world has long dreaded as the worst of all possible evils.

This union of bank and State will always have a tendency to foster an undue growth of the banking interest. It gives it undue importance. It draws into it an excess of capital. It gives it a degree of confidence, which it does not merit from its intrinsic strength and prudent management, which are the just foundation of all just confidence. It inspires in the public mind a false and delusive confidence, which is felt principally in the season of prosperity, but vanishes in the hour of trial.

This old system of Bank and State connection, and trading upon the public treasure, is most pernicious to the manufacturing interest. It is, virtually, as to them, a partial repeal of the tariff of protective duties. It causes, as I have already shown, an inflation of the currency, and of course an inflation of prices. Thus the prices of all the elements of our manufactures are increased, of labor, of stock, machinery, buildings, land. The foreign article is made at a lower standard of prices, and whether we go into the foreign or home market, we meet a foreign competition at disadvantage. The higher price, which may for a time be obtained at home, will be no indemnity. It will be but a bounty to the foreign manufacturer, who makes his article at lower prices, comes in for the higher paper prices, and carries home ultimately the precious metals. The effect is obvious. The temporary high, inflated price, produces a competition of new works springing up at home, and an influx of goods from abroad, until the business is ruined. Or probably, more suddenly, the contraction comes, when all their works, new and old, are of course at a stand, many of them never to start again, without new owners. It requires no proof that a specie duty, or an equivalent to specie duty, is the most effective for protection; and that a settled and stable course of things is infinitely preferable to one that is unstable and unsettled, for any of the great, solid, and permanent interests of the country.

I pass, sir, from high considerations of political economy and national policy, to higher questions of constitutional law and propriety, which preeminently belong to this subject. It is quite apparent that the use of banks as fiscal agents, and of bank paper as Federal currency, is a policy of a suicidal character, at least in one point of view, on the part of this Government. It has a tendency to thwart the exercise of the high constitutional power of coining money, and to defeat the ends for which that power was conferred. It has a most powerful tendency to expel from use and from the country the very currency of gold and silver, which it is the duty of this Government to make and to maintain. It leads to its neglect, to its disuse, to its banishment. It destroys the standard of value, and introduces a false one, silently, invisibly, unheeded by all, until the public attention is forced to the wide-spread mischief, and the pernicious effects, growing out of an unchecked, fraudulent paper currency, and the unsettling of the standard of all value, are felt universally by all classes of the community.

It was, beyond all doubt, the design of the framers of the Federal Constitution, and of the people of the States in adopting it, that there should be truly and really a FEDERAL TREASURY, where the PUBLIC MONEY should be KEPT. "Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin;" and "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States." "No State shall coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time." These clauses in the Constitution do not leave it open to doubt or question that it is the will of the people of the United States, as expressed in the Constitution of their Government, that there shall be, in deed and in truth, not evasively, or in name merely, A PUBLIC TREASURY; that the PUBLIC MONEY shall be KEPT THERE; that no State shall coin MONEY; that Congress alone shall have that power; that NO MONEY shall be drawn from THE TREASURY, but in consequence of appropriations made BY LAW. Let these provisions of the Constitution be carried into effect honestly and faithfully, and it is impossible that the public money should be in the Treasury and out of the Treasury at the same moment of time; should be in the Treasury, and at the same time loaned out, even to the most meritorious class of borrowers; should be in the Treasury, and at the same time, by the will of private individuals or private corporations, without the default of any public officer and without an appropriation made by law, be scattered, broadcast, over the wide circumference of this land!

It was most obviously the design of the Constitution that the public money, drawn from the pockets of the people in any manner, for the constitutional purposes of this Government, should be applied exclusively to those purposes. The application of it to other purposes is clearly a misapplication of the public money, an abuse of the powers of the Government, a concession of advantages to one interest not granted to others, to one set of men at the expense of the whole. It is manifestly against the true spirit of the Constitution that the public money, the common property of all, put into the common treasury by all, for certain specified purposes which are for the common benefit of all, should, instead of being devoted exclusively to those purposes, be made use of for different objects, for private profit and private accommodation. It strikes the mind at once as an anomaly; as an irregularity; as an abuse crept in; as a species of favoritism; as an act of injustice to the whole community; as a practice, which need only be brought to public view to receive the verdict of condemnation. And when we reflect that we have too much rather than too little capital employed in that manner, that the aggregate of our bank capital is in fact already swollen beyond all reasonable bounds, and that the public money, when thus illegitimately diverted from its proper object, goes only to increase those expansions, which involve the whole so often in one common ruin, it becomes a matter of the utmost astonishment that this irregular and extraordinary practice should receive the least countenance or support from any quarter.

Equally anomalous, irregular, extraordinary, and contrary to the design of the Constitution is it, that the powers of this Government, which are essential to its daily operations, should not be exercised by its own officers, but committed to private hands, to the agents of private corporations, to the officers of these private bodies, selected by them and responsible to them, and not responsible to the Government or the people? Why is it? Cannot the people trust themselves with the management of their own affairs? Are their agents, selected by them, dependent upon them, and responsible to them, for that very reason unworthy of trust, and to be thrust aside to make way for the officers of banks, for the agents of moneyed men, not chosen by the people, not dependent upon the people, and not responsible to the people, but exempt entirely from their control? No man in this country dare hold this, I had almost said unconstitutional, language; and yet every man who advocates a reunion of Bank and State, and a surrender of the public money into the hands of the banks as the best public Treasury, does hold this language in the most emphatic manner, by his course, which speaks louder than words. Public officers are the agents of the people, the necessary instruments by which their will is executed; and yet they are denounced, while the agents of private moneyed corporations are worthy of all trust!

This position, that the people of the several States of this Union, in framing a Constitution, and setting up a Government of limited and specific powers, designed that the Executive powers, conferred upon the new Government, should be exercised by its own officers, would seem to be so reasonable and so plain as to require neither argument nor illustration to enforce it. And yet, it is now insisted, that the custody of the whole public treasure shall be taken away from the officers of this Government, and shall be conferred, not upon any officers of the several States, but upon officers of local corporations:—that the vaults of these corporations shall, by fiction of law, be constituted the Treasury of the Federal Government; that the treasuries of these corporations and the Treasury of the Union shall be commingled and blended into one!

The consequences of this departure from the plain and simple theory of the Constitution, are in the last degree deplorable. We have no public Treasury, except by fiction of law. We have no public money, except on paper, and as a mere matter of account. The Government becomes a mere creditor of the banks, and absolutely dependent upon them for all its fiscal operations. The whole public treasure, as fast as it is collected by taxation, or from any other source, is surrendered to them, is put out of the control of the Government; and the millions which had been drawn from the people for great public purposes, and had been placed, in form at least, in the public Treasury, to be forthcoming in the hour of need, by the least concert among the banks vanish in a moment! No law, no power of this Government, can control them. They are not amenable as public officers. They may be sued in the civil courts. In the mean time, public faith is broken; public engagements are violated; the honor of the country is trampled under foot. The Government, entirely dependent upon commercial vicissitudes, and upon the concerted action of a few private individuals, may at any time, either in peace or war, be defeated in those measures, which are essential to the prosperity or the safety of the country. In the most important or perilous crisis, its powers may be paralyzed, or its strength broken, by the collusion of an extremely small number of men. Such would be the degraded and imbecile condition, the base, humiliating dependance of the Government of a great and powerful people; created to execute their sovereign will in all matters confided to it, yet utterly impotent of itself to execute the most essential purposes for which it was called into existence.

I will now reply to the two principal objections which have been urged against the system of withholding the public money from the use of local corporations or private individuals, and appointing public officers to keep and guard the public Treasury, and will then relieve the House from any further trespass by me upon their attention.

It is objected that the public money is not so secure in the hands of public officers as it is in the custody of banks. This objection is probably forever set at rest by the facts disclosed in the report of a committee of this House at the present session, showing that the average loss upon the public money in the custody of banks, has been three-eighths of one per cent.; while the loss upon the public money in the hands of public officers, has been but one-tenth of one per cent. Fact, therefore, is at war with the theory of objectors But the experience of the last few months, the sudden stoppage of the banks, the sudden reduction of the Treasury to bankruptcy with its millions in their possession, merely from their inability to comply with their engagements, furnish a decisive and triumphant reply to this objection.

The other objection, which we hear from the opponents of this measure on whichsoever side we turn, is that the Executive patronage of this Government will be increased.

This objection, did it exist in truth, would not be entitled to any very great weight. If there are certain duties properly appertaining to this Government, and necessary to be performed by it, it is not a very solid objection, that the appointment of the agents necessary to discharge those duties will involve some patronage. It is no sufficient reason why those agents should be altogether dispensed with, and those duties shuffled off upon the officers of private corporations.

No Government can abdicate its duties, because patronage is involved in the performance of them. This would put an end to all government. There is, however, no danger from this source, while the Executive power is kept within the proper sphere of appropriate duty. The danger is when it goes beyond those limits, and assumes to itself new powers by doubtful constructions. The necessary patronage incident to the exercise of the undoubted powers conferred by the Constitution for great public ends, is not to be feared by an intelligent and independent people.

But, sir, the objection does not exist at all, except in heated or distempered imaginations. It is not a process of accumulating power and influence in the hands of the Federal Government, to dissolve its alliance with the power and influence of the banking system.

I cannot but express my astonishment, that it should ever have entered into the mind of any man, that the dissolution of the alliance between the Federal Government and the Banking Power of the country would be attended with any actual augmentation of the influence of the Federal Executive. The question must be viewed under two predicaments: when this moneyed power is, by party allotments, placed in the attitude of Opposition to the Administration; and when, on the other hand, it is identified with those who sustain the Administration. In the first aspect, every one will see there is less danger from the restoration of this connection. But even in that view the influence which the Executive would acquire, by its control over the banks, would far exceed all that could be exercised by the appointment of a few additional Treasury officers. The public money has always been collected and disbursed by public officers. Between the collection and the disbursement, though deposited in banks, it is still at all times, and must be, under the control of public officers; that is, if the banks are faithful to their trust. Can any one doubt then, which would confer greater influence, the appointment of a few, a very few officers, rendered necessary by the disuse of the banks, or a Governmental alliance with these banks, when even in the hands of those opposed to the Administration?

But, sir, it is in the other aspect of this question, when those who have possession of this Government are the political allies of this great Banking Power, that a union between them, established by law, assumes the most formidable character. Then, indeed, would this country have reason to dread an alliance between the patronage of this central Government, and the patronage of this great moneyed interest, which penetrates into every State in this Union; which, one year ago, embraced eight hundred and twenty-three banks, three hundred and twenty-three millions of permanent capital, one hundred and fifty millions of circulating medium, and more than five hundred millions of loans in the hands of its thousands and myriads of dependent debtors; which holds the foreign and domestic trade of the country and the business of every class throughout these States in strong subjection to its will; which has power to subdue to its purposes, and to absolute dependence upon it, the commercial, manufacturing, and all other interests; and, by its control over them, and its influence through them, in the great cities, and at the principal commercial points, to subsidize and wield that most powerful of all political engines, the public press. It is when this central Government combines its own rightful patronage, by legal union, and political identity, with the immensely larger and more fearful patronage of this vast moneyed power, that the people of this country will find it no easy matter to check the tendency to consolidation, to change their rulers, or preserve their liberties.

It is, sir, from this view of the subject that I am anxious that the Federal Government should be separated from the banking power of the country; that this immense interest, perhaps already too powerful to be resisted or controlled, should, in its organized form, be withdrawn from the political arena; and that the great mass of the business of the country dependent upon it should no longer be involved in those party struggles, which are inseparable from the enjoyment of liberty. It is not for the interest of the banks that one-half of the community should be perpetually arrayed against them; it is not for the quiet of the citizen that his private pursuits should be for ever implicated in the unceasing conflicts of party strife; it is not for the happiness, the tranquillity, the prosperity of the country, the vigorous growth, the felicitous working of our institutions, that all the private business and interests of men should be embroiled, from year's end to year's end, by the selfish ambition of partisan leaders, in those schemes and agitations which are destined to convulse this country, as long as any combination of men and money shall entrench itself in any position, and strive to give law to the American people.

It is from reasons growing out of this view of the subject, from an apprehension of too great a concentration of power and influence in this central Government, from a deep conviction of imminent danger that this Government with all its patronage may fall permanently into union with this vast organized moneyed power beyond the hope of redemtion, from a desire to minister to no pernicious commercial expansions, to apply the public Treasure exclusively to public purposes, to exercise the powers of this Government by its own responsible officers, to render the public Treasury independent of the vicissitudes of trade and of the interested combinations of private corporations, and to carry into effect the plain intent of the Constitution, that I am anxious that this separation of the Government from the banks should be maintained; and that the great measure of an independent, constitutional Treasury, should triumph now and hereafter, for the present, and for future generations.

I will not pursue the subject further. We are engaged in a mighty contest with this vast MONEYED POWER. The war now rages over the PUBLIC TREASURE, with more violence than that of Greece and Troy over the body of Patroclus. Shall the PEOPLE hold it, or shall the MONEYED POWER hold it? Shall it be guarded by the agents of the people, or by the agents of this MONEYED POWER? Shall it be held by the PEOPLE exclusively, for their own public uses, or shall it be held by this MONEYED POWER for its own private uses also? It is a contest for the essential principle of Republican Government, against all-grasping avarice and thirst for power in a few. It involves essentially the same arguments which have been often urged, and often refuted, that the people are not competent to govern themselves, and take care of their own affairs by their own agents, but that they need the kindly assistance of a few, in whose hands they will be safer, and their affairs better managed than in their own. The bold and fearless—those who have confidence in their fellow men—those who have no fears of the power of the multitude—will rally in defence of the principle of Republican liberty. Those who are haunted by imaginary terrors; who have no trust in their race; who have no faith in the intelligence and virtue of the mass; who see nothing but ruin in the largest liberty and the power of the many, will take their wonted refuge in the power of property. We plant ourselves upon this broad basis of universal liberty and equality—the capacity of the people to govern themselves, to take care of their own affairs, and to exercise all the powers of Government, safely and happily, by their own chosen, dependent, and responsible agents; and if we are not able to stand upon this rock of adamant, which bears up our country's institutions and the hopes of liberty throughout the world, then, sir, I say, for one, let us fall; but truth and reason, and the cause of freedom and humanity, must fall with us.

REMOVAL OF THE TREASURY BUILDING.

SPEECH OF MR. KEIM, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In House of Representatives, June —, 1838.—The House having gone into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POPE, of Kentucky, in the chair) took up for consideration the following bill:

A BILL providing for the removal of the walls of the Treasury building, and for the erection of a fire proof building for the Post Office Department.

Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause the unfinished walls of the Treasury building, now in the process of construction, to be taken down, and the materials to be removed and applied to the construction of a fire-proof building of such dimensions and upon such plan of arrangement as may be required for the use and accommodation of the Post Office Department, on the site of the Post Office building recently destroyed by fire; and, for this purpose, that he be authorized to employ a skilful architect to prepare and submit to him the necessary plans for the proper construction of such building, having regard to the use of the materials aforesaid, which, being approved by him, shall be conformed to in the erection of the structure. And the said architect may be continued in the superintendence of the construction of the building, or another employed in that service, as the President may judge best.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the erection of the building authorized by the first section of this act, in addition to the materials to be removed and applied thereto, as therein mentioned, there be, and hereby is, appropriated, the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated by law.

Mr. KEIM addressed the committee in substance as follows:

MR. CHAIRMAN: An apology is due in the outset to this committee, for an attempt to solicit their attention upon a subject of comparatively so little interest to them. Indeed, it seems as if every mind was already determined to acquiesce in the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Public Grounds, without any further reflection. A proper sense of duty, however, prompts to a moment's forbearance on the part of the House, to ascertain whether, really and earnestly, it is proposed to carry into effect the most singular requisitions of this bill, and establish a precedent so anomalous and extraordinary in its character.

If it be tedious to perplex with remarks, the only consolation is, that the country may not deem them ill-timed, or irrelevant, particularly when a large amount of expenditure is involved, which, at least, some think should not be allowed, without good and substantial reasons. At the present eventful period, when all the various sources of industry are paralized, when commerce and trade are depressed by financial agitation, and when we are told that the Government has not revenue sufficient to meet the necessary appropriations, a proposition is presented to destroy a building now being progressed in, at an admitted loss of $80,000, but which will be found greatly to exceed that amount, and perhaps consume not only the money already appropriated, but also the additional sum proposed by the bill, being in the aggregate, $247,648 29 actually expended, with $100,000 remaining on hand, and $150,000 in the bill itself. In the general confidence reposed in the committee who presented this bill, there were none, who, for an instant, supposed, that in a subject of mere taste, economy and judgment, party bias could have the least influence or tendency to govern their conduct. In this respect, every one who has marked the progress of the debate, will agree in the conclusion, that a latent propensity is apparent throughout to confer odium upon the past and present Administration. Indeed, with all the smooth denials of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] his indirect and apologetic language for the state of things, was the first inducement to invite my attention.

The remarks, too, of my colleague, [Mr. SERGEANT,] that the new Treasury building originated a new figure of speech; for instead of falling it was rising to ruins, induced me to ascertain whether this hyperbole was not rather what some desired to promote than obviate. If I remember aright, that remark was also coupled with the expression, that it seemed at least as if some "expert in demonology" had been identified with it. Such sentiments from such a source astonished me, knowing as I did that the late President was closely identified with the plan of construction, and that he was not in the habit of building on a very slender foundation. On reflecting, however, that the doctrine of "the end justifies the means was very popular with a certain party, the argument was taken in its proper sense, and placed at the account of those destructives who would destroy even a well-constructed edifice, so that some impediment might be cast into the way of the Executive officers of the Government.

It occurred to me, also, that, as ruin and desolation was part of the panic machinery by which the whole country had been visited, the phantasmagoria had reached this city to destroy the Treasury building. But when, for myself, I visited the doomed structure, so "light and flimsy," with all the trepidation that caution could bespeak, what was my surprise to find those castles in the air firm and stable as the granite of my native hills, and rising in all the simple grandeur that human skill could accomplish, the evil spirit was no where to be found but in the assertion itself, and the good genius of the Hermitage seemed still to protect it from the ruthless hand of the infatuated spoiler.

The new Treasury building is being constructed, under the authority of the fifth section of the act of July 4, 1836, which is in the following words:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause to be erected, on or near the site of the former Treasury building, or on any other public lot which he may select, a fire-proof building of such dimensions as may be required for the present and future accommodations of the Treasury Department, upon such plan, and of such materials, as he may deem most advantageous; and that, for this purpose, there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars.

This act is very explicit and easily understood, nor has any man the right to go beyond it for the purpose of objections as to the indisposition of the President, or as to the want of ability of those he consulted. It was the law under which General Jackson acted, and if it is at all to mean what it says, the site is plainly selected on or near the former building; the size for present and future accommodations is fully defined, and the material left at his option as to its advantageous selection. In conformity with the power to cause it to be erected, he selected Robert Mills as architect in the following words:

Under the act of Congress, authorizing the President of the United States to cause a Treasury Building and Patent Office to be erected, I hereby designate the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to superintend generally the detailed modifications of plans for them, the advertising and forming of the contracts, and the whole disbursements thereon; and to enable him to keep the accounts, make the payments, and prepare vouchers for settlement, and conduct the other correspondence relating thereto, I authorize him to employ a clerk at not over $900 a year, to be paid equally out of the appropriations for said objects. I further appoint Robert Mills as architect, to aid in forming the plans, making proper changes therein from time to time, and seeing to the erection of said buildings in substantial conformity to the plans hereby adopted; which are, in their general outlines to be, as to the Treasury Building, that annexed by said Mills—and as to the Patent Office, that annexed by Mr. Elliot; the former building to be erected on the old site, and the latter one on the square north of the Post Office.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington City, July 6, 1836.

Immediately after the appointment of Mr. Mills, whose character in every respect has been fully established from the time of Mr. Jefferson to the present, he applied to the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain what number of rooms would be necessary for the immediate wants of the Department, and received the following statement:

Treasury Department proper will require	21	rooms.
First Comptroller - - -	8	"
First Auditor - - - -	8	"
Treasurer - - - -	5	"
Register - - - -	12	"
Land Office - - - -	36	"
	90	rooms.

Several plans were submitted to the President: the one receding from the line of the street, and the other facing more immediately upon the line of the street; this latter plan was adopted by him, and presents a perfectly simple structure, containing a centre building, and wings to the north and south connected with it, and contemplating, also, at some future period, the completion of two other buildings, corresponding in dimensions, and parallel with the centre, at the extremities of the wings.

The centre building and wings were calculated to contain 108 rooms, which, in the language of the Secretary of the Treasury, "would leave a surplus of 18 rooms, or 6 in each wing, and 6 in the centre." Agreeably to these preliminaries, the following order was made by General Jackson, to which he affixed his signature: "Let the foundation be laid accordingly, for centre, and north and south wing." This is dated July 8, 1836.

Thus, every incident has been done strictly in conformity to law; and here I would be understood, even now, as disapproving the plan adopted, on the score of economy alone, although it is in keeping with other public edifices in this city. A cheaper and more comfortable plan could have been projected, to have been erected of bricks, instead of freestone, and without a colonnade. The question now is, not whether we remove this building, that has already cost so much, for a cheaper, but for a more extravagant one to be built of marble. I refer you to report, page 9, which says:

"Should the walls be removed, and the materials applied to the construction of a Post Office building, a new structure for the Treasury might be erected near the same location, with some change of position, and upon a plan better adapted to the site; or a new location might be selected, which would admit of an edifice upon an enlarged design, to embrace the required accommodations for all the Departments. Whenever this shall be done, the committee cannot but earnestly advise to the substitution of marble or granite, on the exterior walls, for the pervious and destructible sandstone, which can only be protected, by the frequent application of paint, from defacement and decay, under the ordinary action of the atmosphere and climate."

Sir, of two evils I prefer the lesser, with a perfect knowledge of the fact that if the committee had evinced the same nursing anxiety last session that now seems to impel them, every real objection could have been easily accommodated to suit the most captious of their number; but, as the delay has been so protracted, it is ungenerous now that Congress should be importuned with it. Although the character of Mr. Mills has ever stood beyond reproach, it became necessary that it should be doubted or suspected, not only professionally, but morally. As a reference to his past services, Mr. Mills designated several edifices which he had planned, and some of which he had constructed. Amongst these the custom-house stores in Baltimore were mentioned. A Mr. John F. Hoss, however, denied the fact in the following letter:

BALTIMORE, April 11, 1838.

To Hon. B. C. HOWARD:

RESPECTED SIR: I have taken the liberty of intruding on your time by asking the favor of you to explain to the President of the United States an error I have seen in Mr. Robert Mills's (architect) reply to Mr. Lincoln, and the architects Mr. Thomas U. Walter and Mr. Alexander Parris, on the inefficiency of the structure of the Treasury building. Mr. Mills says, in his reply, "the custom-house store in Baltimore, now under construction, designed by me." Sir, this assertion is altogether erroneous, as I will prove to you. From the first day, I was employed by the Commissioners, Messrs. Joseph White and James Howard, appointed to have this house constructed. On entering on my duties the first day, the Commissioners laid before me a general plan, and other sketches and plans designed by Mr. Mills, engineer and architect, and other plans, designed by Colonel Small, of Baltimore, with instructions that I should examine those plans carefully until the next day, when they would meet, and I should report to them my opinion of the plans, whether there was any that I would recommend at their meeting. I made an unfavorable report, not accepting any of the plans submitted for my consideration. I was then instructed by the Commissioners to make drawings, and at as early a period as possible, and submit them for their consideration. On their examining my plans they approved of them. They sent the plans to Washington for examination, and they were there approved, sent back to the Commissioners, and I have built by them in this particular way.

I cannot see how Mr. Mills can claim, in his reply to the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, that he designed the plans of the custom-house store in Baltimore.

Sir, this assumption on the part of Mr. Mills I deem an injustice to me as a mechanic and draughtsman, who can design his own plans of edifices, and execute their construction afterwards.

I will not trespass on your time, as I know it is all-important, but would beg of you the favor to inform the President and the Committee on Public Buildings of the grievances of which I complain.

Your obedient and humble servant,

JOHN F. HOSS.

Fortunately the entries in the Auditor's office present a confirmation of the truth, as per following certificate:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Auditor's Office, Sept. 16, 1833.

I hereby certify that I have examined and adjusted the account between the United States and Robert Mills, and find that the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars is due to him for designs, specifications, and estimates, for the custom house stores purposed to be built at the southeast corner of Gay and Water streets, city of Baltimore, &c.

R. HARRISON, Auditor.

And if Mr. Hoss can point out any changes in that plan, at least as to any new construction of arches, he is bound to do so, and give his reasons wherefore.

The veracity of Mr. Mills, with his most exemplary character, are too well established in this community to be impugned; nor was it at all to the purpose that he should be obnoxious to any other than professional objections. The filthy slang of the billingsgate school illy becomes any censors of public taste, and our own infirmities should induce us not to investigate those of others, particularly when so much ill would result to the comforts and happiness of an interesting family.

I will now pay my respects more closely to the report of the committee; at all events, as to the leading testimony upon which they rely, and from which we are almost induced to believe that it were cheaper to half complete a building, and remove it, than to finish it on its original site. Predetermined that the whole of the labor exerted should be obliterated, and the work commenced anew, a letter was addressed to the President, designating their objections, distrusting, however, with feminine timidity, their own taste and judgment, and desiring the "appointment of some distinguished and skilful artist to give his opinion." The President assented to the employment of Thomas U. Walter for the purposes specified, whose most singular coincidence with all the committee had stated in their letter, proves that, for once, science and skill confirmed the preconceived prejudices of doubt and mistrust. He was the principal person connected with their observations, and the main dependence of their determinations and conclusions. In the language of their report, he is noticed as "Thomas U. Walter, Esq. of Philadelphia, an architect of great distinction, and superintendent of the construction of the Girard College in that city." Proud as a Pennsylvanian, of the metropolis of my native State, it is neither my province or inclination to say aught against her enterprise or prosperity; on the contrary, every interest is very dear to me that is in the least conducive to the welfare of the Keystone State, or any section of her, however great or humble it may be. Honest doubts, however, may be entertained whether after-time will accord the encomiums those gentlemen so freely bestow.

Stephen Girard, mariner and merchant, if we may judge from his general regard for economy, and his antipathy to useless and unnecessary expenditure, never projected, either in the spirit or the letter, a building such as is that college. "The said college shall be constructed with the most durable materials, and in the most permanent manner, avoiding all needless ornament, and attending chiefly to the strength, convenience and neatness of the whole," are the words of the will. Has the architect borne them in mind? When we reflect too that Girard's whole life was characterized by an humble and unostentatious department, a despiser of the affectation of the great, and the influence of the wealthy, a lover of the poor and oppressed, a firm supporter of Republican simplicity, it may well be asked have the executors fulfiled their trust in approving that model. His intentions evidently were the promotion of intelligence, where it was most neglected, and his express desire looked upon the extent of the charity as limited only by the concentrated and well-managed investment of the utmost farthing of his means. "For a long time impressed with the importance of educating the poor, and of placing them by the early cultivation of their minds, and the development of their moral principles, above the many temptations to which, through poverty and ignorance, they are exposed," he granted two millions of personal property, besides a large residuary estate, for that purpose; and although the most minute description of the manner of construction, the material, and every essential incident is expressly defined, not one syllable can be found to justify the massive display of truncated pyramids, or those marble columns, the cost of whose entablature alone would have brought personal comfort and intellectual blessings to numerous suffering orphans—the only legitimate object of magnificent expenditure and munificent charity under his will. The fact is also palpable, that the intention was to have "as many poor white male orphans as the income would be adequate to maintain, introduced into the college as soon as possible; and from time to time, as there may be vacancies, or as increased ability from income may warrant, others shall be introduced." The expense of needless ornament alone would support an additional school; but in the spirit of fashion, which too much governs the world, the architect seized upon the public propensity for external style and ornament, even at the risk and sacrifice of the funds. Allow me to remark, that as to the grievous delay in the building itself, that may be attributed to the president of the college, but who, in other respects, if he has any notoriety at all, is certainly a man of letters.

This benevolence required prudence and caution in its exercise, because it was not intended for one district of the country only, but for many places. First, to the city of Philadelphia; secondly, to other parts of Pennsylvania; thirdly, to those born in the city of New York, and lastly, to the city of New Orleans, "that it may not be perverted," he says, "that if the said city shall knowingly and wilfully violate any of the conditions mentioned, then the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, or, in neglect thereof, the United States of America, shall receive the remainder, and accumulations." It seems, then, that others are interested in the proper management of the bequest, besides the city of Philadelphia; and it becomes a primary duty that it should be controlled in the strictest economy and good faith, lest the Legislature of Pennsylvania be invoked, for the purpose of scrutiny, and to assume the exercise of that benign power of visitation which pertains to her, so that the good intended may be as widely extended as possible, according to the request of the liberal and benificent testator. Thus, whatever character the builder or architect may have acquired, it is at least susceptible of great doubt whether, when the length and breadth of the ground plan is defined by will, when the utmost caution is urged, to avoid unnecessary display, both ordinations are sacrificed to an improper ostentation, leaving at least the imputation that however beautiful and strictly in good taste may be the design in the abstract, it is, in this particular, an open and plain violation of the last will and testament of Stephen Girard.

So much, by way of digression, as to the skill of Mr. Walters, and the independent and faithful manner in which he exercises it.

We have now Mr. Mills and Mr. Walter, the very Ajax and Hector of this modern seize. Armed to the teeth, and ready for the onset, Walter sounds a round of musico-architectural dialectics, Mills responds by a problem in dynamics; Walter makes a thrust at an opening in the stereotomy, and Mills parries it with his abundant ægis of esthetics,

> Thrice round the walls to ruin or to save,
> Contending heroes sought a glorious grave.

The committee, looking upon this commotion, glean from it a variety of conclusions, under no less than four distinct heads, all of which are greatly aided by imaginative theory, in contradistinction with rational experience and successful practice:

"1. That the location of the Treasury building on Fifteenth street, in the precise position given to it, is injudicious and highly objectionable."

This is a mere matter of opinion, and not demonstrable; for what may seem most offensive to some, may in turn become highly agreeable to others; and whose opinion shall be the correct criterion? Certainly the judgment must be suspected where the will is predetermined and the result predicted. They say further:

"It is obvious that the grade of the street can never be conformed to the base of the building. It must continue, after any reduction, consistent with the least practicable ascent to the level of the intersecting streets, to present, along the line of the building, an inclined plane, and thus exhibit to the eye the awkward appearance of a continuous colonnade, at an unequal height from the elevation of the contiguous foot-way. The proximity of the building to the street will likewise preclude any other mode of entrance to the platform of the colonnade, than by narrow and diminutively disproportionate steps, placed perpendicular to the base, and opposite to the centre, and under which, also, must be the entrance-way to the front corridor in the basement. The extension and number of steps at the ends must necessarily be unequal, in proportion to the difference in elevation of the opposite extremes from the earth. Besides, by the position and extent of the building, if the work be carried to its completion on the present plan, the original design of the arrangement of the streets and squares of the city will be prejudicially invaded; the view from F street, south, will be entirely shut out; and the principal objects of attraction and regard, the Capitol and the President's House, will be concealed, each from the other, so as materially to impair the beauty and grandeur of the prospect from both. How far these and similar considerations are entitled to regard, will be for Congress, upon admonition of the effect which is about to be produced, to decide."

It is exactly the site of the old Treasury building, and appropriations are now pending to lay aculvert in that street, which will undoubtedly allow the inclination to be brought more upon a line with the base of the building. As to the proximity to the street, and the objection to the use of side steps, the former was located according to law, and the latter would be found to be strictly in accordance with ancient science and skill. The Artemisium at Ephesus, the work of Dinocrates, whose majestic fancy proposed to change Mount Athos into the form of a statue, will exactly confirm the method by which these steps are placed. The Louvre, so renowned as being the production of twenty monarchs and eight centuries, and which defies the world in competition with it, is open to one admitted defect, and that is the breaking of the line of colonnade by the pediment in the centre. The last idea of objection, the hiding the President's house from the view of the Capitol, is, to the political aspirant, a vital reason why the impediment should be removed, so that he may see the wished for haven. In every other respect, it is entirely unworthy of a moment's notice.

"II. The erection of the new building, upon its present site and plan of construction, must unavoidably produce the removal and destruction of the building now occupied by the State Department."

It never entered into the calculation of any one that the old State Department should be removed; nor is at all necessary to the accommodation of the plan that it should be immediately removed. The ends of the new building, to use the phrase of a gentleman from Ohio, may be "chunked, scutched down, and daubed," so as to be made comfortable without touching a single stone of the old building.

"III. The plan and interior arrangements of the new building are manifestly defective; neither adapted to the object of its construction, nor admitting the necessary accommodations for the present wants of the Department."

The Secretary of the Treasury on the 8th of July, 1836, submitted a communication to the President in which ninety rooms only were required: by some singular obliviousness the Secretary may have forgotten that document, but it is now before me, signed by him, and approved by the President. It is absolutely necessary that some attention should be exerted to prevent the discrepancies that occur in that Department. It would be a novelty to tear down all that has been done in two years, because, forsooth, in the interim, the wants of the Department had increased. The size of the rooms was taken from those now in use in the State Department, and their area served as data to regulate the dimensions of the new building. There will be room enough and light enough, notwithstanding the narrowness of the passage, which Mr. Walters considers a defect without a remedy. The great difficulty with me, is to know how the committee can want light on this subject; they are not so benighted as to avoid the due investigation of the effect of the direct rays of light in this Hall. Has not the whole study of intelligent gentlemen for years endeavored to ameliorate the effect of those rays, and render them secondary? Was not that an inducement to change every position in this House? When then the experience of things is against the committee, the objection itself should be considered as untenable.

The last great source of anxiety and care is presented by the committee in one general maranatha, as if some tornado were wasting its force in strewing around it every impediment in its course. But let me, without delay, proceed to the last count in this indictment.

"IV. The construction of the walls of the building is imperfect, inartificial, and deficient of the requisite strength for secure and durable structure."

They say: "The principal defects under this head of the subject, may be resolved into the want of sufficient thickness to the walls, and a proper bond of connection between the blocks composing the antæ and the courses of the ashlar. This will be better understood by the following extract from the report of Mr. Walter: 'My decided opinion, (says he,) in reference to the subject, is, that all the outside walls are entirely too thin and too weak for so large a vaulted building as the one in question. These walls should have been at least three and a half feet thick exclusive of the antæ, (or pilasters, as they are commonly called;) instead of which, they are only two feet three inches.' After treating of the mode in which the walls should have been constructed, alluding to the defects of the work, he subjoins, 'Under existing circumstances, the whole bond of the ashlar is cut off, from the bottom to the top of the building, on each side of every one of the antæ; while the antæ themselves offer little or no resistance to lateral pressure, being composed of large stones set on the end of each other, without a single cramp or tie to hold them to the ashlar, or a dowel to keep them in their places.' Again, he remarks, that 'the strength which would have been derived from these antæ, had they been constructed according to the principles of stereotomy, is not only lost by the manner in which they have been built, but the walls, which would have been too weak without them, are actually rendered weaker by their introduction.' In reference to the effect upon the stability of the building by the mode of arching which has been adopted, Mr. Walter expresses the opinion that 'this plan of arching can never be executed with safety to the building. The arches in the lower story would probably stand, provided that the centres are kept under them until the walls receive the superincumbent weight of the structure; but the fate of the upper arches, if executed upon the same plan, is certain.' Mr. Parris certifies his concurrence in the description given by Mr. Walter of the character and construction of the work, and gives it as his decided opinion, 'that the walls of the building are not sufficiently strong to sustain the lateral pressure, if the arches are to be continued above the present height.'"

If ever the climax of hypothesis was indulged in, this is it. Not satisfied with anticipating evils, they unhesitatingly, and without qualification, predict "that the fate of the building is certain. The building itself, however, exhibits a palpable contradiction of the assertion of Mr. Walter, whose positive language is, "that this plan of arching can never be executed with safety;" that the arches in the lower story would probably stand, provided that the centres are kept under them, until the walls receive the superincumbent weight of the structure. Now let any member of this House for himself, visit the premises as he should do, to vote understandingly, and he will find the very centres "struck" in both stories, and the naked truth developed, that the prediction of a fall is too theoretical to be realized. The walls stand firm and unmoved, without showing either settlement or crack, notwithstanding they are open to very severe weather at all points.

They are but three inches in the thickness of the wall between safety and destruction, according to the hair splitting calculations of the umpire architect to resist the thrust of the arches.

The continued experience of thirty years, as to the durability of the arches of the Capitol, concur in the practice of Mr. Mills's construction of arches; but he also proves, from a valuable author on the subject, that he strictly doubles the strength required, as by the annexed table.

TABULAR STATEMENT showing the comparison between the theory and practice of vaults in the case of certain arched buildings erected by Robert Mills architect, in the several places named.

By consulting Rondelet, we would find a proposition demonstrated that there is in some constructions of arches no lateral thrust, but their power is exerted only vertically.

There is one evidence of a want of minute investigation on the part of Walter, in his inattention to an important material used in the building. I allude to the cement which binds it together. The cohesive qualities, compared to mortar, are almost as two to one in its advantageous application and use; and as the arches are of brick work, and the power is in the ratio of the surface of the joints, the strength of arches thus luted together becomes almost as firm as adamant, and most assuredly should have received some notice on that account.

I have no particular knowledge in the science of architecture, but have considered it like sculpture and painting—the expression of a refined imagination and pure taste, brought into shape and visible form by the skilful hand of an accomplished and intelligent artist. What may be its early history, it is not my design to inquire. Whether it originated in the infancy of the world, was cherished and promoted by the Egyptians, attained perfection among the Greeks, declined among the Romans, or was revived by modern Italy, would require more research than I am willing to bestow upon it. I will venture one suggestion, that, at least, some effort should be made on our part to be inventors, instead of followers of any system. If science is progressive, so should the polite arts keep pace with them, and American architecture become a new school, in which might predominate, as a characteristic feature, the principles of economy, simplicity, and convenience. That architecture owed its birth to necessity, and its embellishments to luxury, is an admitted truth; and how far, as a national trait, the costly expenditures upon public buildings assimilate to that age of luxury should be fully inquired into by the economist.

Instead of making this the counterfeit imitation of "the Eternal City," would it not be conducive to our better interest if the same simplicity were preserved which the spirit of our Constitution inculcates. We are taught to avoid all affectation of superiority amongst ourselves, excepting only where authority is defined, in order more faithfully to preserve the general harmony of our political structure. Indeed, it is admitted to be strictly in keeping with the nature of things, that an unassuming and Republican people should be more the admirers of the useful than the extreme patrons of the polite arts. Ours is a primitive, not a secondary, Government, to use a geological phrase to express its analogy with early times, associated together upon a perfect equality, having a common interest, and pledged in a common defence of civil and religious rights. Amongst us the gaudy trappings of royalty find no throne to embellish; our only sceptre is the law, and our only sovereign is the people's will. Since, then, it is congenial with all our habits, let us compare our Government to a plain, unadorned column, whose base is the people; the shaft the Constitution; and the capital the laws.

Utility is emphatically the American order, and look where you may, it will be found to be consonant with the feelings, as it is compatible with American tast. To look at the front of this stately pile, one would suppose it was the palace of a king; but if common custom is indicative of public sentiment, we have but to visit the rotundo, and we will find it fully displayed. There may be seen a collection of pictures, and butter churns, cannons and busts, basso relievos, and statues promiscuously blended. This hall itself we find reversed in its order, and the main entrance entirely blockaded by the gewgaws and tapestry that hang around your chair Do we want any other expression of national taste than this? Utility, convenience, and comfort are, as they ever should be, the only principles of composition with which we are acquainted.

Let then this object be considered hereafter, and instead of rearing these extravagant structures for external show, let plain, unostentatious and comfortable buildings meet with proper consideration. In the present instance, there is no alternative left, but to proceed; if we destroy it, it costs more money than it will take to complete it.

There are, however, many other subjects to which the committee might devote their attention, without doing injury. Let them restore the original earth, in preference to the micaceous pavement, or remove the whirligig from the jet d'eau, indicating the truth of a suggestion that taste is as curious as it is inexplicable, or the monument itself, now hanging in our way, like the sign of a Chinese chop-house, and by its contiguity with surrounding objects, losing its intended effect. I would be the last to obliterate any record of those brave men, who, in the language of Madison, "fought until humanity tore down the colors that valor had nailed to the mast." Let it rather be removed to some eminence upon which the eye of the ocean warrior may linger, as he bids adieu to his native shores. It will inspire him with new ardor for noble achievements, and promote the memory of those noble spirits that slumber beneath it.

Motives of economy are always patriotic; and when we must know that the finances are out of joint, that prudence should govern all our acts, let every one reflect for himself, whether it would not be better to allow the workmen now thrown out to complete what is so nearly finished, instead of indulging a mere depravity of taste in its immolation.

The admitted cost thus far is $356,000, whilst the computed loss in removing it would be $82,000; but which, I believe, would far exceed that sum; and the amount asked to finish the "centre and north and south wing" is an additional 100,000 dollars; so that the only question is, whether we will involve in doubt, upon imaginary grounds alone, the work as is now stands, or whether we will incur a comparatively small expenditure, in order to finish it as speedily as possible.

SPEECH OF MR. BYNUM, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, June, 1838—On the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, to reissue Treasury notes, not exceeding in amount ten millions of dollars

Mr. BYNUM said he rose reluctantly, to enter into the discussion of the subject then before the House; and nothing could have induced him, at that hour, to have trespassed upon its attention, but the most singular, unwarrantable, and extraordinary course that had been pursued by a number of honorable members, in relation to the subject then under consideration. He said this course to him was most singular; it would have been more so under any other Administration than the present, or the one that had just preceded it. The character that the debate had assumed, was unquestionably any other than that appropriately belonging to it. The simple question before the House was comprised within a nutshell. It was, whether this House would consent to reissue a limited amount of Treasury notes, to supply the vacuum occasioned by the redemption of those now about being returned, and which, by the present law, could not again be put in circulation.

The question, it appeared to him, resolved itself into the most simple propositions:

1. Should we supply the deficiency in the revenues by collecting the moneys due to the Government by compelling the banks, the merchants, and States, to pay in their dues to the Government.

2. To borrow the money from individuals, or from foreign Governments.

3. Or to reissue the amount of Treasury notes, as redeemed, not exceeding the amount of ten millions of dollars.

This, sir, is the sum and substance of the propositions now before the House, which gentlemen of the Opposition, with but short intervals, have consumed four days in the discussion of. During which time they have dilated and brought before the House, for political effect, no doubt, as it could have had but little or no relation to the present subject, almost every act of the present and past Administrations. Had they confined themselves to the subject of the bill immediately before the House, he would challenge and defy all their boasted talents and inventive faculties, to have spun out an argument longer than twenty-five minutes upon the intrinsic merits or demerits of the bill then before the House. No, sir: there is no genius here, of the Administration or of the Opposition party, prolific enough to have consumed more than twenty-five minutes in a discussion of the legitimate merits of this bill; yet, sir, both Europe and America, Asia and Africa, had been gone over in search of materials and comparisons to aid in assaults by far-fetched and irrelevant matter upon this, and its preceding Administration. Sir, the American people can but be astounded at the exhibition of the diminutiveness of the bill upon which such an explosion of Opposition oratory has been let off to blind, to bewilder, and confuse their common sense and practical understanding.

Mr. B. then called on the Clerk of the House to read the original bill; which was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued, according to the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to authorize the issuing Treasury notes,' approved the twelfth day of October last, in place of such notes as have been, or may be, issued under the authority of the act aforesaid, and which have been, or may hereafter be, paid into the Treasury and cancelled."

The bill was again read by the insertion of the following amendment, between the fifth and sixth lines, after the word provisions: "and subject to all the conditions, limitations, and restrictions.

Now, sir, said he, we have the whole bill as originated and amended before us; its length, breadth, and depth. Let us scrutinize it, examine it, contemplate and dissect it, and it must be seen that human genius, however productive or refulgent, could consume but a little space in the discussion of its pertinent and intrinsic merits. Sir, the whole discussion has been a mere farce, or it has been intended to effect ulterior objects. The course that has been pursued by those opposed to the bill, justifies this inevitable conclusion, to apply to whose remarks, it is more my object at present, than to either vindicate or discuss the merits of the bill. The very honorable gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] and his honorable colleague [Mr. BIDDLE] had embraced this occasion to go into a general discussion of the merits and policy—not, sir, of the bill before the House; no, sir, but—of the merits and policy of this and of the passed Republican Administration of President Jackson, the policy of which they contend this Administration was pledged to carry out. Sir, in this, if in nothing else, they are right; and may God, in his infinite mercy, grant it success in the faithful execution of the pledges that its members have made to the hardy Democratic yeomanry, and laboring, planting, and productive classes of this country. Sir, it is all we ask to make this a great, growing, prosperous, and a happy people, But to faithfully execute this pledge, they and we must be prepared to meet the bitterest denunciations, and to hear fulminated peals after peals of anathemas against them, by those drones and their immediate representatives, who live, and fatten, and luxuriate upon the industry and labor of others Yes, we may be prepared to hear and witness too all this, and those who have not hearts stout enough to meet and brave them, let them now retire from our ranks, as imbecile, unworthy defenders of liberty, of law, and of right.

Mr. Speaker, there does appear to me to have been a peculiar delicacy involved in the discussion of this subject, in consequence of the very peculiar relations which certain honorable gentlemen bear towards some of the principal topics that they have thought proper to introduce into the debate. The Bank of the United States and its character have been introduced by the two honorable members from Pennsylvania, and discussed and defended at large, accompanied with denunciations against all others who believed not in its infallibility. There has been a time, sir, when modesty has restrained gentlemen from a forward expression of their opinions on subjects in which they were most notoriously known to have been deeply interested, but not so now. Honorable gentlemen should not presume too much upon the insensibility of the House to the peculiar situations that they bore towards certain subjects. It was to be expected, from immediate and deep personal interest in certain institutions, however obnoxious to the public good, there would be found individuals in and out of this House, always ready to step forward in their defence on any and every occasion. Sir, it would be ungrateful in them not to do so, regardless of every species of diffidence on the occasion. The ties of consanguinity had too a wonderful tendency to render more acute our sensibility, when the conduct of a friend had been, or was about to be, implicated in any course of policy that he might have pursued. Such things as these were natural, and almost inevitable consequences, and most frequently prompted us to action imperceptibly, and without due consideration of motives; but I will not now dwell either upon the remarks or course pursued by those two distinguished gentlemen, as I design to notice them more particularly hereafter.

Sir, when I reflect upon the character of the opposition to the present and past Administrations, upon the peculiar circumstances under which it has been created, and on which it is known to act, and on the peculiar materials of which it has been made, I am lost in wonder and surprise that consequences more, by far more, disastrous have not befallen to, and been witnessed by, this great nation of freemen; that it has not, is the greatest compliment that could be bestowed upon the great mass of the free and intelligent men of this Republic. Yes, to the immortal honor of the people will it be said, by the future historian who shall chronicle the events, that, under similar circumstances, there is no nation of the old world that would not have been plunged into the most deadly of civil wars, and have drenched the land with the best blood of her own citizens, and which would have originated, and set in a blaze a revolution, that nothing short of human gore could have extinguished. Sir, I say emphatically, had a similar incident to that which we have all witnessed here, taken place in any Government in Europe, ancient or modern, a revolution, most bloody, disastrous, and fatal, would have inevitably been the result.

Lt us for a moment look at the circumstances and materials; let us not throw our attention further back than for the last six or eight years, and contemplate for a moment what has transpired here, and before our own eyes, and none will say that he ought to be surprised at any of the most extraordinary attempts to confuse and oppose and thwart every action of this Government, even at the hazard of revolution and bloodshed. Nor can any intelligent, disinterested man say, that he could reasonably have expected otherwise than an indiscriminate opposition to nearly every measure of this and the late Administration, without the least regard to right or wrong, its policy or impolicy. How shall we account for this? I have been astonished not to have heard or seen, even in the newspapers, that these facts have not been alluded to before, so palpable, so instructive, so admonitory to the American people, of the natural course that should have been expected, from the very composition and materials of the opposition to their Government, that has kept up one continued scene of strife with the people of this country ever since the election of President Jackson to the Presidency of these United States. Could it have been otherwise, when, as soon as it was practicable, nearly the whole of that very discarded, defeated cabinet which had been so recently defeated and superseded by President Jackson and his administration, all, all sir, burning with revenge, were placed immediately, either in the Senate of the United States, or in the House of Representatives, where they could glut their most malignant appetites upon the objects and conduct of those by whom they had been driven from office into retirement, if not disgrace. I say, sir, could it have been otherwise? Look to the Senate, analyze its composition, and with such disappointed spirits, all thirsting alike for revenge, seeking out the victims of their disgrace, what would their conduct not effect in other countries less enlightened, less intelligent, less patriotic, than our own? In that body was placed the Prime Minister [Mr. CLAY of Kentucky] of the defeated Administration to arraign and try and execute competitors who had disrobed him of his ill-gotten honors. It was on their conduct that it had become his daily duty to pass, and, with such feelings, enter on the duties of a judge, to enter up a decision on their conduct. The Secretary of the Navy, too, [Mr. SOUTHARD of New Jersey,] of the same defeated and discarded Cabinet, was also, with the same feelings, thrown about the same time into the same body, as a co-judge of the conduct of those by whom he had been expelled from his place in the Cabinet of a former administration; of the character of whose feelings, as there exhibited, the public has had the most incontestible evidence.

Another distinguished individual, who had had a personal altercation with the former President, that had once held an exalted station in the Government, was also placed by their sides, in the same body, all men most distinguished for their talents and powers of eloquence, and men who were not in the habit of brooking an insult, or submitting peaceably to disappointment and degradation by an adversary. These, sir, were surrounded by many of their adjuncts, most devoted partisans and proselytes from almost every section of the country. The House of Representatives, too, has not been without its portion of these rebuked and disappointed spirits, upon whom public censure had rested, whose duty it has become to convulse heaven and earth to wipe off this foul blot. In the House of Representatives has been placed the very head of that superseded Administration which had been condemned by the voice of this free people. Nor, sir, does he stand here alone; but aided by the powerful arm of one of his former ministers, [Mr. SERGEANT of Pennsylvania,] who is ever ready to do him service, and lend a hand in making any opposition to the present Administration: and at different times, within the same periods, have we been favored on this floor with the distinguished talents of two disappointed and defeated Vice Presidents; each with their train of friends and devoted partisans, all colleagued in the holy office of opposition, indiscrimately, to the measures of those by whom they have been defeated before the people. Nor was it long before they united their destinies with a gigantic money power, more potent than the Government itself, possessing more amply the means to keep up and carry on a war against the Government, than the Government itself had for its defence against it. Such, sir, has been the position, the composition, and materials, of the opposition to the past and present Administrations of this country. With such materials in this and the other branch of Congress, is it to be wondered at, that panics extraordinary, and every other effort to thwart, embarrass, defame, degrade, and even to revolutionize and disgrace, this Government, should be attempted? No, sir, no, sir: the only marvel is, that with such materials, placed under such circumstances in your Congress, that a revolution, bloody, disastrous, and convulsive, of this great Republican empire, has not been effected. Sir, nothing but the hand of Providence could have prevented it in any other Government than our own; and much cause have we for congratulation, that there has been found in our blessed native country virtue, intelligence and patriotism enough, amidst the sons of her Democracy, to ward off a calamity so fatal to the peace, happiness and prosperity of our people; and for having effected that which no nation of Europe could have done, under similar circumstances, without being deluged in revolutionary blood. Sir, the future historian will be amazed, in recording these facts, at the little mischief that has been done this country by the composition and position of such materials of an opposition to your Government. Yet much has been attempted, and more has been designed, to effect a revolution with the people. The leaders of the Opposition, in my humble opinion, have been long prepared for it, and have been awed from the attempt at its excution by nothing but the unflinching integrity and intelligence of the people.

Yes, sir, no intelligent mind could have misunderstood the invocation of that "revolution, though bloodless as yet." It gave utterance to an intention and recklessness of feelings, that the American people have not yet properly appreciated, nor rebuked; and happy this thrice happy people, who have thus far escaped the mischiefs and intrigues to conjure up a revolution by this modern Philip of Macedon, to whom life, and fortune, and peace, and revolution, and blood, were as a feather, when weighed in the scale against his malicious and ambitious projects. But with this I have done, and will proceed to notice, with more minuteness, the character of the body of the great contending parties now before the country.

Sir, I have, on another occasion, said that the great political divisions of the two most prominent parties now contending for power in this country were composed, on one side, of the great mass of the non-productive classes, and on the other, of the great productive and laboring classes of this country; which ever have been the only true great natural divisions of society since the first organization of civilized institutions for the government of man, and which will ever continue to be, to the end of time, though often interrupted by domestic and foreign wars, which for a time may, and have, contributed to obscure the original landmarks that have divided these primary classes; yet, whenever they have passed away, society has never failed to revert back to its original divisions, which ever have been, and are now, common alike to all countries where civilization has proclaimed its dominion. Sir, at no time in the history of our country has this line of demarcation been so distinctly drawn as at the present moment; a division that has become, at this time, too palpable and obvious to escape the observation of the most superficial observer, and which neither skill nor artifice can longer conceal from the discerning eye of a plain, practical, foreseeing people.

Under the specious name of Whig have all the elements of the non-productive interests been recently arrayed, which had been formerly known in this country by the name of Federal, and then National Republican, party, and which has been recently augmented by the addition of the Abolitionists and Antimasons, with all their intolerance; both of which, however, are greatly subordinate, in point of strength and influence, to that of the great banking and moneyed interest of the country, with which they have all become now identified and united in one common interest against the industry, laboring, and productive classes of the country. Enlisted, sir, under the Whig party, you will find every man who lives on the interest of his money and the labor of others—the banker, stockholder, stockjobber, and usurer; every speculator and man who lives by traffic and chicanery; every idler and vagabond who lives on the productive industry of others; which, whenever united, will constitute a force sufficiently large to carry every city election in this nation, in which places you will ever find the greatest proportion of this species of population to the whole number of its inhabitants.

Sir, what is the fact now? Look at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, and Norfolk, and, until within a few months, Charleston, New Orleans, and Mobile. Sir, what has been their language, and what the character of their politics? Add to these, Providence, Plymouth, New Haven, Hartford, Albany, Utica, Trenton, Brunswick, Elizabethtown, Morristown, Harrisburg, Wilmington, Petersburg, Lynchburg, Winchester, Lexington, Nashville, Cincinnati, Raleigh, Newbern, and hundreds, if not thousands, of other villages, partaking of their nature and sympathies, and say, sir, what are their political castes, and by what interest are they led, if not by the trafficking, non-productive, banking interest of the country, all presenting a uniformity of sentiment, demonstrating a general cause, beyond the power of all earthly contradiction? There is scarcely a note shaver, or pawnbroker, or extortioner, to be found in any section of the country, that is not a member of that party. There is scarcely a gambler, or speculator either in stocks or lotteries, that has not espoused the interest of that party. Sir, I admit that there are many honest farmers, planters, and mechanics, who have been won over to its interest, and are conscientious members of it; but the number that they have been able to delude and entice into their fold is comparatively small, and they are compelled to act an insignificant part to the great moneyed and unproductive interest that so effectually predominates with the great majority of the party. Now, sir, upon whose industry and labor, upon the produce of whose toil, does this army of non-productive classes live and luxuriate and fatten in their idleness? Out of whose products and labor and industry come the profits from which these unprofitable, unproductive classes obtain their subsistence? Can there be but one answer? No, sir; no, sir. It is on the labor and produce of the industrious laborer and husbandman, that they can alone live and procure a subsistence; and to wrest it from them with the most plausibility and with the greatest facility, has the ingenuity of that class been taxed from the earliest ages of man: hence the fierceness of this war now carried on against the industry and producing classes of the country, under the most shallow pretext of protecting and defending the banks—yes, sir; yes, sir; the banks.

But, said Mr. B. against whom is this war declared? Against the other party? And who is that other party? the Democracy or Democratic party, or the old Republican party? And of what materials is it composed? Turn your eyes to every section, in every State and Territory in this vast Republican empire, and behold them in their daily vocation, and you find the Democracy in every section composed of the hardy sons of toil, who live by honest labor, and the sweat of their own brow. You will find that Democracy in every soil, composed of the honest ploughman, the hardhanded mechanic, the planter, farmer, whose only chartered privilege is the use of the axe, the hoe, the hammer, the saw, the adze, and the spade, and who only claim a valuable consideration for the produce of their industry, not in promises merely, but in the thing itself; and your backwoodsmen, too, the pioneers of your western and southwestern forests, are Democrats, and must be from the very nature of their pursuits. They can have no affinity to bankers, traders, or stock jobbers and money changers, of whatever description or denomination; and in no instance has there been attempted a connection with them by the farmer or mechanic, that they have not been invariably ruined, and which all experience will show with some small exceptions. Sir, it is the bone and sinew of this country that live by industry and labor, and such as you will find the Democratic party composed of on every soil, and section of this Union. These now constitute the two great parties, whose interests have been brought in conflict by the too great partiality that has been shown in legislative enactments, both State and Federal, to the non-productive interests, in the character of chartered privileges and corporations, with the common name of banking, and, whether State or Federal, are alike prejudicial and ruinous to both the labor and industry of every country in which they have been similarly instituted.

But I have come now to another branch of this subject, which, though not at all relevant to the bill before the House, has an important relation to the subjects that have been discussed by the two honorable members from Pennsylvania, [Messrs. SERGEANT and BIDDLE,] and one to which I will not only invite the particular attention of this House, but the whole American people; and for its further prosecution and exposition, I invoke the aid of mightier geniuses, both in and out of this House, for the benefit of posterity; and I here most sincerely hope, at some future day, that some mightier intellect, with more expansive genius, may be devoted to the further exposition and development of the character and tendencies of this subject. Sir, the fact is not less extraordinary than startling, that we are informed, by the most authentic historians of all ages, that an order or class of men have ever existed, in almost every nation of the civilized world, that have lived in idleness, and been supported in their luxury from the industry and labor of the great mass of the working people. That the concurrent evidence of all antiquity establishes this fact, the history of the world most abundantly proves.

In the earlier stages of society, priestcraft was the universal method resorted to by the sons of luxury and idleness to filch the pocket of industry and labor; and which, in some shape or other, has been equally successful in its operations almost in every section of the habitable globe; and perhaps no system ever was, or ever will again be, devised so effectually to answer all the purposes of its authors, or more effectually to retain in bondage the human intellect, and steep in ignorance, debasement, and degradation, the great mass of mankind throughout the world. The history of the whole eastern empires abounds in the recitals of innumerable acts of the most inhuman cruelty, frauds, oppressions, and the most distressing exactions, committed by their priesthood upon the labor and industry of the country. By their chicane, "the flesh-pots of Egypt" were placed entirely under their control; and the miserable, squalid inhabitants of the Nile were made dependent on them for the crumbs on which to feed, from whose very labor the priesthood had exacted the luxuries of the land; and to this the poor laborer was taught to submit, for fear of incurring the wrath of an angry and insulted idol, which, in fact, was not less stupid or insensible than the stone or marble on which it was placed, while it answered all the purposes of terror, alarm, panics, and intimidation, to exact from the laborer the fruits of his industry.

Nor, sir, was this system of extortion and oppression by the priesthood confined to Egypt alone. Persia has from that time until this, been a scene of the blighting influence of priestcraft, misery, and oppression. Assyria and India, and, in fact, the whole eastern continent, up to this day, are reigned over by, and administer to the cormorant appetites of, priestcraft; where the fruits of industry and the produce of labor are extorted by compulsion or deception from the honest laborer, who has made them. Europe, too, has ever been, and is to this day, afflicted with this greatest of all earthly curses to the human family.

Ancient Greece had her augurs, and oracles, and her Delphic temples; from which, through priestcraft, her pretended gods spoke, and for centuries held in the most abject bondage the human intellect of that renowned and most celebrated empire; and its historians inform us they were to the priests "mines of wealth and power," exacted from the hands of industry and labor. At these temples all sorts of deceptions and frauds and devices were practised for their acquisition of dominion over the consciences of that brave and superstitious people; and but too effectually have they ever succeeded in making them the most oppressive means of hoarding the wealth of the country.* Such have been the effects of priestcraft during the reign of paganism.

*It is stated by a most accurate historian, that the principal hoards, both in bullion and coined money, were in their temples, which were crowded with presents of immense value, brought by the superstitious from every part of Greece. These temples were considered as national banks, and the priests officiated as bankers—not always, indeed, the most honest, as was once proved at Athens, where the State treasurers, having expended or embezzled the public money, had the audacity to set fire to that part of the Temple of Minerva where the treasure was contained; by which sacrilegious act, that magnificent fane was near being wholly consumed. Their purpose, however, was fully answered, since the registers of the temple were reported to have perished with the treasures, and all responsibility precluded. The temple just mentioned, the superb fane of Jupiter Olympus at Elis, and of Apollo at Delphi, were the principal of the three sacred depositories The priest at times concealed the total sum of the treasures lodged in them with too much caution for us to know the amount; yet, when the Phocians, urged to despair by the exactions of the Thebans, seized on the treasures of Delphi, they amounted to ten thousand of talents, (above two million two hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling,) and probably that was but a small portion of what holy perfidy had previously secured. The deposit at the Temple of Ephesus, considered through all ages as inviolable, probably far exceeded those of the three last mentioned.

The spirit of avarice, which at all times characterized the priesthood, and prompted them to such immense accumulations, is not more detestable than dangerous; for, let any one reflect what must be the consequence to a nation, whose monarch and the priests are in coalition, as is usually the case; and the monarch, as is usually the case, too, is watching to extinguish every spark of popular freedom—what, I say, must be the consequences when such overwhelming resources are within his reach? The fate of Greece is a melancholy warning on this subject. These immense treasures were eventually seized upon by rapacious conquerors, and their soldiers paid by them to enslave these renowned States, and thus the coin drained from the people by the hands of priestcraft, became in the hand of kingcraft, the means of their destruction." So has it been in every country—so was it in Palestine—so in ancient Rome—so in Constantinople, and so was it, pre-eminently, in India.

Britain and Gaul, too, at different epochs, were wont to groan under the superstitious lash of priestcraft. The Jewish church was conducted in like manner until it became powerless. Christianity gave to it its last, final blow; but even it could not escape the withering blast of priestcraft.

Sir, let us look to Rome, and see the myriads of monks and friars, and other subalterns—mere drones that feed on the earnings of the labor and industry of others—and in what abject poverty and ignorance the proud pontificates held for centuries the entire western world. The bloody altars of the Inquisition are yet before our eyes, and the fumes of burning victims of our own race are in our nostrils. All, sir, all effected with universal havoc by that great demon, Priestcraft; while the wealth of all Italy, Spain, and Germany, have been hoarded to enrich pontifical coffers. Other nations of Europe, too, have contributed much to the luxury of priesthood and popedom; and, to this moment, the Church of England is grinding into dust and ashes the poor of that realm, and with their glebes and tithes are rolling in luxury upon the products of their labor and industry. Sir, what does all this not prove, if not my first assertion: that there has in all ages, at all times, with all, or nearly all nations, been a class of non-productive, non-laboring people, who, by contrivance, have been enabled to live and roll in luxury and idleness upon the industry and earnings of others? Sir, this fact cannot, nor will not, nor dare not, be denied.

Here let me distinctly be understood as saying nothing against the Christian religion; for I contend that Christ himself was betrayed, tried, adjudged, sentenced, condemned, and crucified by priestcraft; than which, nothing can be more repugnant or hostile to their diabolical purposes than his holy precepts, as taught by him, and him alone, whose simplicity and purity would have ever continued uncontaminated but for the efforts of the priesthood to connect them, for selfish purposes, with the temporal affairs of men and nations.

The great antagonist of every species of craft, of superstition, and ignorance; that great conqueror that has ever thwarted, dissipated, overcome, and put to flight their brightest prospects, is the light and progress of truth, and the blaze of intellectual knowledge. Sir, wherever they have been promoted, priestcraft and all other crafts have been, and will continue to be, driven back into their dark abiding places, and, snail-like, shrink back from an intelligent people into their original squalid shells. Podedom is now reeling on its throne, and the horrors of the Inquisition have ceased to terrify by its burning faggots, or its torch, while its unholy edifice is now tottering to its base.

[The SPEAKER here interrupted Mr. B. and said the debate was taking too wide a range, and that he should confine his remarks to the subjects more immediately before the House.]

Mr. B. replied, that he had said the most he had to say on that part of the subject; and if the SPEAKER would bear with him but a little while, he would soon show its strict applicability, not to the bill—no, said he, I did not set out with that view—but to one of the principal subjects that had been introduced into this debate, and to which he claimed the right to reply.

I now declare, sir, (said Mr. B.) before heaven and earth, that the institutions of banking, as now practised and conducted in the United States, (and in other countries, if you choose,) are upon principles precisely identical and similar (with the single exception of calling to its aid the Divinity) to those upon which priestcraft has practised for centuries—to pillage and plunder the proceeds of industry and the fruits of labor. Sir, I defy human ingenuity to devise a more perfect substitute for priestcraft of old, than the present banking system of this country.

Bankcraft now, with a most trifling exception, is precisely what priestcraft has ever been, since its earliest organization by its primitive impostors; and now, before the bitter drops of its afflictions have been wiped away from the eyes of distress with which it has visited mankind through all ages, here has been attempted its substitute, with a most subtle texture of incorporated institutions, controlled, in most instances, by individuals as unfeeling and as irresponsible as ever were the priesthood of antiquity, to the people whom they fleeced without mercy.

Yes, sir, bankcraft in whatever light you view it, is a legitimate offspring of those institutions of craft, by which the idle, the cunning and luxurious, have in all ages and all nations availed themselves to rob industry of its profits, and labor of its rewards. Sir, the institution is the same, with a trifling modification not at all improved, but in witty devices, in extracting by stealth the substance from those it impoverishes; its attributes are many of them identical and analogous, striking and impressive. Their secret conclaves, by which their business is governed and controlled, are precisely the same; their modes of extortion the same; their often coming in conflict with their Government, where they failed to get the entire control of it, identical; and their objects and effects upon the people are the same and inseparable. Their armies of pensioned stipendiaries and dependants, have every resemblance, and stand always ready at a beck or a nod to denounce and proscribe those who even doubt their infallibility and purity; and as was with the poor heretic, a reward awaits the favorite that shall prove most distinguished in hunting down the political sceptic and disbeliever, who thus dares to question their divine right, to the first fruits of the earth. Sir, look around you and behold the army of them that are continually crying bank, bank, bank, bank; examine the material of which they are composed, and my life upon it, you will not find one twentieth part who calculate on living either by industry or labor. No, sir, but upon their capital, their speculations, their traffics, shaving, jobbing, and the like, all to be benefitted, supported, and enriched out of the products of the industrious laborer, planter, mechanic, manufacturer, and farmer; who alone give substantial wealth and true prosperity to a nation. Your bankers and capitalists enrich no part of our country, nor improve no part of its soil, and many of them, as priests of old, with their monks, and their friars at their heels, are mere drones in society, that live upon the labor of the more industrious of the hive.

Sir, are the people of the United States prepared longer to endure this system of corruption, with its most demoralizing tendencies? Will they longer endure it, without holding its authors to the strictest accountability? Do they not see the consequences of this bankcraft, from its intimate relation and most striking analogy to its great parent, priestcraft, that has depopulated, demolished, and impoverished, more nations, than any visitation of Providence has ever effected by fire, the sword, or pestilential disease. Sir, in my opinion, the age is too far in advance of civilization, of science, and intelligence, for them ever to submit to a system so oppressive, so unjust, so degrading, to all the nobler feelings of our nature.

The American people are too free, too much enlightened, too intelligent, to accept this old system of rapine and plunder of the fruits of their industry, by the mere change of names. Bankcraft is priestcraft in disguise, and its effects, in the end, cannot prove to the common people, the laboring classes, and productive interests, less destructive, distressing, and devastating. Yes, sir, and this is the system that your Government, and the whole Democracy, are denounced and proscribed for refusing their countenance to. This is the system that your Philadelphia Bank Delphian oracles are endeavoring now to rivet on your country; and for refusing his assent to which, your President is denounced and proscribed by your Congressional bullies on this floor, who, "Swiss like," fight most bravely when thrift follows most sure. Sir, can they fail longer to understand this game, that has thus long been but too successfully played off upon them? Can the hired missionaries, and suborned bank-bought presses, longer blink the true issue which is before them? Can the ingenuity and eloquence of bank-bought attorneys and advocates, longer keep over them this veil of deception, by a continual appeal to their fears, and the creation of alarms and panics, the very means of terror that were used by the primitive institutions of priestcraft to hold in check, and intellectual bondage, the whole productive interests of the land, that they pillaged of the fruits of its labor and industry. Sir, the authors of these enormities cannot, will not, fail sooner or later to be overtaken by the wrath of an indignant, robbed, and insulted people.

If, then, the truism is correct, that like causes produce like effects in all ages and nations, what have we to expect from the substitution of bankcraft for the great parent, that, for so many ages and centuries, has afflicted almost every civilized nation upon the globe, and at different epochs has deluged them with carnage and blood. Sir, nations, like individuals, who will not be instructed by the lessons of wisdom and experience, must be blind indeed, and must expect to reap in gaul and bitterness the harvest of their ignominy and folly.

Yet this is one of those beautiful systems that the great new-born Whig party is now struggling to impose upon the freemen of my country, and for a faithful, determined opposition to which, this Administration is denounced and proscribed, and the whole Democracy declared too illiterate and stupid to perceive the sublime benefits of the system. Being already in possession of the capital of the country, they wield with more dexterity and expedition those engines that operate most powerfully on public opinion. Public presses are not only by them purchased and suborned, but, with the greatest facility and expedition, created in every section of the country, to play as a battery and fortress on public sentiment, for the benefit of the craft; and herein they possess an incomparable advantage over, and which was unknown to, those prototype institutions to which those of modern date possess such an impressive and striking analogy in all their attributes of operation and deception.

There is scarcely at this time a single public press in the whole country, distinguished in the ranks of that party, that has not been set up by, or aided with, the facilities, or under some influence, of some one bank or other, in which it is directly or indirectly connected; and, sir, with such a gigantic machine operating with an indefatigability that never tires, can it be marvelled at that public opinion should be frequently led astray, and the own, best, dearest interests of our country renounced? No, sir, no. Sir, aided by such machines, operating with the most uniform system, the odds are against the people and the country; and nothing can rebuke it, dissipate it, or exterminate it, but the intelligence of an active, enterprising, intellectual, spirited people. Its strength, as of old, lies in its deep and mysterious operation on public opinion, which, when once exposed, (like the powers of the Pope who would anathematize) nothing becomes more feeble, disgraceful, nor contemptible. Let, then, the people go to work to expose it; let the Democracy be aroused, and like "dew drops from the lion's mane," will fall this incubus upon public sentiment. Sir, this people cannot be enslaved, if they will presume to act, and judge, and think for themselves. It is against the arts and devices of a most formidable, internal, and insinuating enemy that they are now called upon to sally in defence of their rights. Sir, the landmarks are sufficiently chalked out for each party to tell upon what side they stand; and the true party of the people and the country have only to guard against foul flags and false names, and victory is theirs.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, call the attention of the House to a few remarks that fell from the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT.] That gentleman, after an address of three hours or more, not more than twenty minutes of which he devoted to the bill on the table, went into a general attack upon the measures of this and the preceding Administration. The honorable member tells us that he was opposed to the bill because it proposed to make paper money. This was certainly one of the wonders of the age, that that gentleman should be opposed to a measure because it authorized the making of paper money. What, a gentleman opposed to any measure to make paper money, when he is sent here, almost solely, by an institution whose very existence depends upon its privilege to issue paper money. He opposed to any measure because it issues paper money! What an extraordinary attitude does that gentleman assume, who has, and does now, in every speech that he makes, advocate the banks in their most unlimited, unrestricted privilege of making paper money! He opposed to paper money; and how? He wishes that his idol, the Bank of the United States in Philadelphia, should have alone this privilege. He would have it to monopolize the whole paper money making power, and the balance of the country contributing to this monopoly. Does this gentleman, who undertakes to play the "Delphin oracle" here, think that there is not enough intelligence in the country to detect his flimsy designs? He would have no other power or institution to make paper money but his own dear bank on Chestnut street! No, not even the Government of the people. How monstrous, I had liked to have said how arogant, absurd, and ridiculous. The gentleman from Philadelphia is the last man in this House that should raise his voice against paper money, when he contradicted, by every act of his life, the sincerity of his own declarations. He was the special representative of that interest.

That gentleman, whenever it suited his purpose, was in the habit of charging the Executive and the whole party, with the acts and language of a particular individual—the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] To this he objected, as disingenuous, unreasonable, and unfair; and it could not be sustained by any fair, honorable mode of debate. He was very unwilling that either himself or the Administration should be held responsible for the acts or sentiments of any individual member, here or elsewhere, and to attempt it, was a mere catch, to allure.

The honorable member had said much about the interest of the people, and the friendship of the banks and bankers for the people. This really put him in mind of the Devil serving God. The banks' friendship for the people, all past and present history had shown, was that of the "lion for the lamb." It was on the labor and interest of this people upon which they lived and fattened, and it was well for them occasionally to use towards them honeyed words, and to flatter them. That gentleman had held forth on this occasion, the same language nearly that he had in his minority report, from the Committee of Ways and Means, which was certainly one of the most complete pieces of demagogueism, and feeble attempts to flatter and cajole the people for the wrongs that his Bank had done them, that had ever been put forward in this country. The people—the people—the precious people—was the whole burden of that gentleman's song throughout that report, and he again had taken pretty much the same course in his remarks yesterday and to-day. He had never read the report without smiling at the frequent repetition of the word people—people—it contained; and he would refer gentlemen to it for their especial edification. The gentleman had again, in his discourse upon this subject, mounted the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in all conscience, I do think that the honorable member has carried on this farce long enough; that the especial representative of a bank and its interest, should become the champion of the people's rights, caps the climax of the ridiculous—for one who has been in the service of the banks for years, to make such professions, is adding insult to injury, and can result only to the disparagement of him that attempts it.

What, sir, does the gentleman look upon us all as children? Surely he does? Else he would not attempt in this bare faced way to soothe us, by patting and pitying us, and telling us lie still, be quiet good people; while his institutions are robbing them of the last vital drop of their life's blood, But this is only one of the old ways that has been resorted to by "the Craft family." To get the people to submit to their exactions, extortion, and oppression, the most astounding efforts were about being made to convince the country, that the banks were the people; and the honorable gentlemen had taken the lead in this attempt, which I have not language to characterize respectfully.

To convince the people that the banks were themselves, and that the interest of the banks was their interest, such was not only insulting, but monstrous. It was upon the interest of the people upon wh ch the banks fed; it was upon their labor that they existed and enriched themselves; and it was the profits of their industry that they filched and wrung from the hands that made it. If the banks are the people, so are your mosques, inquisitions, priesthoods, and other abominable institutions that have for so many centuries robbed and oppressed, and impoverished mankind. Have the people not been ever told, in all ages, that these institutions of horror and misery were first erected for their especial benefit? Identical are the reasons advanced now that were then, to lull, deceive, and oppress them; and every step we take, shows the existence of some additional analogy that banking institutions have to those long since founded on priestcraft.

But I will again return to this gentleman and representative of the marble palace, who has evinced so much sophistry and cunning to work in favor of the banks, or a bank, with the people. The gentleman had spoken of the new era. Now new diseases, I think, have ever required new remedies. The existence of bankcraft was entirely unknown to the ancient world—they had other modes of fleecing the people—and is now but partially known to the modern world. Its pernicious effects have but recently developed themselves amongst us; and consequent y, the discovery of every remedy of the disease, must be of the "new era." Yes, the discovery of the whole system of free constitutional government, belongs to the "new era." The ancient feudal systems of crafts and oppression may, however, be more palateable to the taste of that gentleman, than any system of improvement of modern date, or of "the new era."

The honorable member had next adverted to the State banks, and labored with much ingenuity to rally them against the Government for political effect. He had endeavored to excite the States, and alienate them from the General Government, first by flattering them, and then appealing to their pride, and telling them that they had been insulted and their rights usurped by the General Government. Do gentlemen think that great States, as well as silly individuals, are to be caught by the efforts of demagogueism? Do they think to play off on them, without their motives and designs being suspected, detected, and exposed? Yes, sir, they do! So little knowledge have these city declaimers and Federal orators of the plain, honest country people, that they sincerely believe that nothing imaginable is more easy than for them to practise and play off upon their ignorance and credulity. These are some of the old arts again attempted in a new way, to enlist the people against their own Government—formed, erected, and instituted by themselves, equally for the good and happiness of all. The member made a great effort, at least as great as he was capable of, to conjure up and excite the State Legislatures against the General Government. They, too, had been appealed to with an intent most obviously and palpably to be enlisted in the cause of the banks against the people and their Administration. They were told by the honorable gentleman, with what design we all know, that they had been treated with contumely and contempt by this Administration. Such were the artifices and sophistry resorted to by that member to further the views of his party, and to sustain the accursed system of fraud and deception by which his dearly beloved banking institutions had so long, with impunity and arrogance, practised upon the people of this country.

Sir, what rights of the States has this Administration interfered with or invaded? What insults has it offered to the Legislatures of these States? Where and when was it done? What State has been so debased as to have submitted thus long to such ignominy? Such declarations are foul slanders upon the independence, intelligence, and patriotism of the Legislatures of these States, and the members that composed them, and in so many words, is saying, that they have been composed of men heretofore too ignorant to have discovered it; or, if they were not ignorant, they wanted both the patriotism and independence to resist and expose such usurpations, insults, and violations of their right. Then it is a poor compliment that the member has paid those States, whose intelligence, independence, and patriotism he has thus attempted to sport with, if not a most direct insult which he himself has offered to their understandings. The member not only undervalues the good sense of the mass of the people, but depreciates and underrates the common sense, intelligence, and sagacity of the members of the State Legislatures.

This is carrying their contempt for the good sense of the people, a little further than usual. But this is "their way." It is the ancient rock upon which they have ever split—that eternal want of confidence in the intelligence of the common people, and overrating their own, is their bane, from which no age nor experience have ever been able to purify the aristocracy of a country. The effects of their gulling system have, on every occasion, proved temporary and ephemeral; and so long as enterprise and industry are left free from the trammels, shackles, and restraints forged for them by the devices and arts of the "craft family," they may never expect other than a harvest of fatal disappointments, and victories as ephemeral as delusive.

The honorable member [Mr. SERGEANT] has certainly laid under the greatest obligations to him the inert and stupid politicians of the great States of Virginia and New York, for whose rights and interest hes has affected so much sensibility on this occasion. The policy of New York, and the recent acts of Virginia, the honorable member has dwelt on with ecstacies of delight. Sir, these States may feel not a little honored when his motives are scanned and resolved into their original elements, and they may soon learn whether or not the whole of his speech and compliments to them, was not a recruiting concern, intended for the solitary design of using them to further his own selfish and favorite system of banking, and the views of that party. That member, on nearly every occasion, had used the word people for banks. This is another analogy to the practice of the "priesthood," who ever operated with a shelter or bearer between them and responsibility. With them the word God was profaned, and other deities were substituted for their own selfish purposes. It was always for God and their deities that they made war, and effected the most oppressive exactions from a credulous, ignorant people. It was for them hundreds of thousands of human victims were broiled and burnt at the stake, and their estates confiscated to enrich their damnable and fiendish coffers; for them, professedly, rivers of human blood have been caused to flow by these priestly monsters, whose examples are now about being followed with an exactness, in most particulars, unprecedented by any modern comparison. The gentleman and his party have suddenly fallen in love with the people—the precious people—whom the head of that same party so recently denounced with a sarcasm and indignation never to be forgotten by the plain, honest dealing people of this country, *as an ignorant herd, a vulgar, ignoble rabble, that had gained possession of high places which their presence dishonored, and a war proclaimed by this prince of money-changers, interminable, until these Goths were expelled and driven out from every portal of your Capitol.

Sir, what a beautiful moral does it not teach, to see two sainted brethren of the same principles, from the same high temple, laboring in the same cause, preaching in different places, and at different times, doctrines so adverse, so inconsistent, so contradictory, to promote the same holy cause. On this I invoke the candid, impartial reflection of a liberal world. "Thou hypocrite! thinkest thou that man for you alone was made?" Sir, from these loathing attempts the heart turns and sickens with disgust.

The honorable member, again, has told us that the banks were unpopular, and it was deemed popular to denounce them, and indicated that President Jackson, and the party that sustained him, did it to gain popularity. This is perfectly in character with his other assertions, unsustained by the facts, contrary to experience, and unfounded in truth. What were the facts? what the truth? what our own experience? which no sophistry, nor the "crafts" of the cunning, can rob us of.

Up to 1832, the United States Bank was one of the most popular institutions that had existed in this or any other country; laudats, hymns, and jeremiads were sung in every section of the country in its praise. Then, sir, it was (I recollect it well) political death to question, or to doubt even, its infallibility; to do it, faggots and stakes were immediately threatened to the political heretic, and he had tremblingly to whisper his dissent to the dogmas it contained. Then it was the most popular hobby that could have been mounted. No crime then to speak of this paragon of modern invention! In 1832 and '33, in this House, there was an immense majority in its favor, and a like one in the Senate. A bill was then passed by both Houses, by an overwhelming majority, in favor of its rechatter, when the old Roman—born to bless his race, to preserve and protect the liberties of his country—with a mien undaunted, but characteristic of himself; with a heart that neither horrors nor threats could alarm, and a courage that has never failed him—threw himself into the breach, and waved aloft once more the proud banner of the Constitution, and summoned thereto the drowsy friends of Democracy, of equal rights, and of freedom, to arouse and rally to the rescue. The bill was vetoed. The Veto message went forth, amidst the thunders and anathemas of the high priests of the craft. But, sir, the old Roman quailed not. He who had seen a little service was not to be alarmed by the discharge of paper caronnades. He appealed to his countrymen for a justification of his act, and they responded in language not to be misunderstood.

The principles of the message were confirmed by the approbation of the people. The conduct of the Bank was investigated in every canvass in every State, its dangers and corruptions exposed and condemned by an intelligent public; and not until its hideous features had been exposed, did it become unpopular with the people of this country. Its arrogant and precocious introduction into this hall in 1832—its entering on the political arena, demanding its charter to be renewed, aroused the people to its audacious bearing. It was done to produce a political effect at the time. It was to effect the ensuing election of President Jackson, that its friends introduced it here, armed and equipped for political battle, and it was openly and publicly proclaimed then on every occasion, that the veto had sealed forever his fate as a public man; that Pennsylvania, the keystone of Democracy, then supposed to have been held by the bank barons, was and would be inevitably lost to the party and to Jackson, and we heard then the same cries of anticipated triumph that we hear now. But the Pennsylvania Democracy were of little "sterner stuff," and were neither held, nor could they be transfered. From that time to this, the party have been at work to subjugate the Democracy, and reinstate their minions in power. By the subornation of presses—the extension of facilities to its influential friends—and the erection of branches of the bank in every section of the Union—and the creation of distress, alarms, and panics throughout the country. The Bank then was not originally unpopular, but became so by its own acts. Such were the facts in relation to that subject, as I then did, and now understand them.

The gentleman has boasted that the Government had not a dollar to discharge its debts with; it could not pay off its workmen. And why, let me ask the honorable member, did he not tell us the reason? He well knew the reason was that his favorite banks had in their vaults the money of the Government, and refused to pay them out one dollar; and, sir, there is a party here that is backing them in their refusals to return the money of the Government, even if able to do it without creating distress. He well knows, or ought to know, that the deficits of the Treasury have been brought about entirely by the inability of the Government to collect the funds due it, and deposited by law in other institutions—a circumstance brought about entirely by the operation of his most favored banks; and showing, most conclusively, the fatal effect that must result from these institutions, when in connection with the Government; and yet that member would rivet on the Government, and prolong such a state of things.

The member has spoken of the neglect, by the Government, of the industry of the country; meaning, I presume, those in the employ of his favorite banks—brokers, stockjobbers, constables, sheriffs, &c. He knows well that it is for the protection of the industry and labor of the country that every energy of the Government has been put forth, for which it has been so virulently denounced by those who neither live by labor nor industry. He, then, is at fault again in this respect, and must try another gull-trap to catch innocence and ignorance. He said the surplus of cotton, he expected, would be thrown overboard and burnt by the Secretary, rather than have it paid for in any thing other than gold and silver. Does the gentleman seriously think so? or was this one of his hyperboles? or did he intend it as grave argument for this deliberative body? It evidently shows the means which men in high places may be induced to employ under desperate circumstances, when more laudable and honorable ones are not exactly at hand.

The member has said, many had rode into office upon the war-horse of anti-bankism, and denouncing corporations; but he did not tell us how many rode into office on the shoulders of the banks, nor what facilities were used to get members here, nor how many it held by the hand after getting them here.

But the honorable member is again contradicted, from an unfortunate quarter for him. He has said that the Bank of the United States was unpopular, and upon its unpopularity many rode into office. Here, again, is a different language, held at the same time, by brethren of the same church, blowing hot and cold to suit the appetites of those whom they would use. The honorable member from Rhode Island [Mr. TILLINGHAST] has just told us that the Bank of the United States was a popular institution; that it had ever been with the people; and that he had boldly met the question before them, and had put his opponents to the rout upon that subject. Now, without deciding which of the honorable members of the craft is in the right, I shall leave their consistency and political sincerity and accuracy to be judged of by others. They are of the same church, but advocate very different doctrines to promote the same holy cause. I leave them in the hands of the country. It has been exceedingly amusing to me to witness the chameleon course of the honorable Representative of the palace in Chestnut street. At one moment playing the high-priest and expounder of constitutional law, strictly, as spoken and delivered by the oracles of the temple, and the next moment swelling his voice, and crying aloud—the people—the people—their voice should be heard, with an appeal to the worst and lowest of passions: law, Constitution, ancient institutions and all, all are to be disregarded when the people speak. Sir, are not such human inconsistencies ominous of something more monstrous? No, sir: it is the wonted means by which the craft has ever worked their way into power, and retained an ill-gotten ascendancy over the sturdy sons of labor and toil.

The gentleman's repugnance to the sight of gold and silver, gives him the hydrophobia. The whole idea of such a currency is ridiculed and denounced by him as impracticable, and a ridiculous experiment, notwithstanding the evidence of all ancient and modern history to the contrary. The same party denounced, in the same way, the whole theory of this free Democratic Republican form of Government, in its origin, under which we now live, as an impracticable and dangerous experiment, because the enlightened principles of freedom, justice, and equality, upon which it is founded, were subversive and destructive to the grinding and extortionate principles of aristocracy, by which their hierarchical crafts can alone be sustained. They foresaw this in the origin of our free Government, and they foresee now the enlightened principles that are, ere long, to sap the very foundations of their system of bankcraft and extortions; to sustain which members of the same family, advocates of the same abominations, are driven to advocate different principles and hold different language at the same and different times. Such are the political effects of a dilemma so torturing and inextricable.

But I do not propose to dwell much longer upon the remarks of the member from Philadelphia. I think I have already shown a sufficient "leaven to leaven the whole."

The honorable member, however, has informed us that Treasury notes were money; because, says he, you can pay your debts with them, and he was opposed to them for that reason. Now what do the people pay their debts at this time in, if not in bank notes of different kinds? What did they pay their debts in before the Revolution? Do we not then know that tobacco, and other articles, were made receivable for debts in many of the States, and particularly in Virginia? Let him ask the honorable gentleman on his left [Mr. JAMES GARLAND.]

Various articles at different times, in different states, as well as nations, have been taken in liquidation of debts; yet, none ever thought of their being considered money. Such an objection is too shallow for serious argument. The gentleman seems disposed to think that nothing should be taken in payment of debts, but United States Bank notes, and whether money or rags, depends upon the nod of one man. He also brought up the old bugbear, which was used with but little effect at the last session by any honorable Senator [Mr. WEBSTER] from Massachusetts, of continental money, and declared in the true oracular language, that Treasury notes would be in a short time what Continental money was; they had as well told us that every other bank note would in time have been the same, for there was just as much resemblance in the one as the other. The same objections were made to the issue of Treasury notes, by the same party, under another name, during or immediately after the last war; and the same identical predictions made, and with what truth the history of the Governmentshows. Such arguments are mere bugbears and bugaboos, intended solely for panics, but which should alarm only children under their teens. Such, sir, is the character of the most of the arguments used by the honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] and in his minority report is the most feedle attempt to sustain his corrupt and rotten institutions by catchwords, sophistic arguments, and demogogueism that I have ever witnessed in this or any other deliberative body; and I hazard nothing in asserting it, that the intelligent practical people will decide it so upon a candid impartial view of them, and here will take leave of the honorable member and his remarks on this subject.

I will now say a word or two to a few observations that fell from the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. TILLINGHAST.] This gentleman has enlisted as one of the new oracles and prophets of the craft. This gentleman, in doleful sounds and lugubrious vaticinations, tells us that all is wrong, and all must end in wreck and ruin, unless the Government will listen to the melody of his voice. The House is wrong; the committee are wrong; they have not given the bill the right name; it is intended for another purpose than that for which it purports to be. Now will the gentleman be so kind as to christen it properly, as it may belong more particularly to those from the high temple to do such things, which may be, however properly, unecclesiastically done by others, who may not have been vested with those high functions. This gentleman, too, leaving the subject, seems to have thought of little else than the United States Bank and its interest. Poor people! little does the honorable member seem to have thought of them or their interest, and scarcely gives them a passing notice, so eager is he in defence of the great Bank. He too has renewed the old cry of "war against the banks." I had thought that this had become too stale longer to answer the purpose of deception, even. If it is intended for home consumption, let me tell the gentleman that the people whom he represents must be much behind the times, and weighed down by superstition and impositions of the craft, for it to have much effect with them. What, sir! War against the banks! how absurd! how ridiculous! how insulting to the injured people of this nation! What war? For the Government to beg to be separated from the banks, and to be let alone by them? Is this your war? Has not the Government done every thing in its power to accommodate and appease them? Is it not at this very time doing it?

Or, is it war against the banks for the Government to resolve no longer to be preyed upon at the mercy of these Shylock institutions? Is it war against the banks for Government to endeavor to stay their grinding extortions and exactions from the industry and labor of the country? Is this bill a part of that war now, which is to wait with them and to indulge them, to enable them with convenience to pay what they justly owe to this Government, and wrongfully detain from its use? What shameful ingratitude towards the most indulgent of Governments! How audacious and insulting to the people, whom they have robbed and put at defiance!

Sir, in human impudence and arrogance they stand without a parallel. If there is a war, it is emphatically a war of the banks against the Government and the labor and industry of the country, which has been carried on for years in disguise. It is an effort on the part of the banks to subjugate this proud and once freest Government on earth, and make it nod in servile submission to the mercenary will and interest of a single pampered and arrogant institution, which has entered and besieged your very Capitol, and made battle with you for the power of the Government on both floors of your Congress.

The gentleman has spoken of the dangers of popular commotion. Well may he and his clique have an eye to that. The proud spirit of independence and generous love for freedom is not yet subdued in all sections of this country, nor is it in the power of priestcraft, kingcraft, or bankcraft, to place this yoke of ignominy and corruption around their necks, without exciting popular indignation as well as commotion, pregnant with revenge, if not with death.

Sir, let me tell him the people have been tampered with already too much by these hypocritical, cunning, crafty, institutions. Much have they borne of long suffering and patience. They have not only been supporting with food and raiment your unproductive drones in society, but have been turned on by them, and insulted as ignoble, ignorant herds, that should be driven from your Capitol and the high places they dishonor.

Gentlemen should not presume too much upon the ox-like forbearance of a high spirited noble minded people; and let me invoke them not to oppress them too far, nor to rely too much upon their systems of cunning and craft, to keep up the delusion, and to hold them in bondage.

Mr. Speaker, I will now notice some of the remarks of the amiable, modest, and forbearing gentleman from Pennsylvania, who sets nearest to me on my left [Mr. BIDDLE,] whose mild and amiable disposition never permits him to speak of one that he hates, "unkind things."

He too has had but little to say on the subject of the bill before the House, but has launched off into a discursive electioneering harangue intended, no doubt, to operate on the good people of Pennsylvania. He has performed but the usual duties of his office, and anathematized, and prepared, no doubt, as he thought the Secretary of your Treasury for the guillotine, of popular indignation. He informs us that the Secretary, with others of his party, must go down to posterity, as the most miserable and wicked mercenaries; and entertained us with an amusing dialogue between the Secretary and the laborers in the service of the Government. The fiction has been drawn with great exactness, to suit the taste of those reckless squads of idlers, who would delight most in the reality of the scene, and give pleasure alone to those bank myrmidons, who rejoice at such a state of things; and none, sir, none more than the particulars and intimates of the honorable member, whose tastes he so well understands, and seems so carefully to have consulted in the pictures he has drawn to fancy.

The starving laborer, he tells us, goes to Mr. Woodbury, and demands his pay, and receives for answer that he has no money—the Government is bankrupt; and there the gentlemen stops the dialogue.

Now, why did he not give us the full benefit of his picture, so well drawn to the taste and liking of those for whom it was manufactured? Why not tell us, if truth was his object, what might have been the true, and only true, reply, that in such a state of things could, or had they then have happened? Why not have said that the Secretary's reply could have been, "Sir, the money of the Government was deposited by an act of Congress in the banks, and they will not let us have out one dollar. We have money due from our merchants and States, that cannot be collected in consequence of the conduct of the banks, and we cannot at this moment get hold of it; but we will give you our notes, with the plighted faith of the Government to be redeemed in specie at such a date." Now, sir, what patriot, what friend of his country, could have, at such an offer, raised a murmur? None, sir, none but your bank bought hirelings and palace minions, whose joy and transport are never so great as when this country is oppressed, and the people threatened with embarrassment and distress. Sir, from all participation, sympathy, or fellowship with such a party, may God deliver me now, henceforth, and for ever.

The gentleman says they have tried to relieve the Government from the sarcasm of the newspapers. From the sarcasm of what!—of his own papers—papers that have been established and suborned, and extended facilities to, for that especial purpose? With whom can the sarcasms of such have any effect, except with the light-fingered tribe, who live by their cunning and craft, and who, vulture-like, watch to pounce upon the profits of the industrious and laboring man with a view of feathering and decorating their own nests. Sir, I, in the name of the people—of the honest laborers of this country—of the Government of the people, and not that of the banks, defy their sarcasms. They can have no effect here or elsewhere, when their intent and designs are known; their entire strength is in the deception and imposition with which they practice on the credulity and ignorance of the public.

The gentleman next tells us that there were certain filthy parrots that were always crying banks! banks! etc. Now, sir, that member should be the last on this floor to rebuke any bird for crying in filthy notes, unless, by the long custom of monopolising by his feathered tribe, he would exclusively appropriate this filthy practice to himself and a few such associates. But, says the gentleman, he deals not in personalities, and with a most delicate allusion to a recent event, tells us that others might now seek to do it with impunity. Does the gentleman mean this as a threat to awe and intimidate the cowardly Democracy from boldly repelling his unfounded charges and ridiculous fictions? If so, he may find himself mistaken, and some of the plain Democrats less submissive than might be palatable to the delicate taste of the honorable member. But as to his personalities. He has surely given to the House a new idea on that subject; for though that member may think (from habit, perhaps) that he and his few friends have the exclusive right to abuse others and their principles, and denounce all that as yet may be uncontaminated by the special facilities of his idol, that he is really not personal, because he claims it as a right. Yet, sir, there are others here with equal rights, who, in defiance, will view this conduct in a most unquestionable and different light. If that gentleman be not personal in the extreme, then we have none so in this House.

What, sir, has been his charge against the honorable member from South Carolina? [Mr. RHETT.] Was there no personality in that? What liberal allusion has he made towards the new converts, as he is pleased to call them? I disdain to attempt the defence of the honorable member from South Carolina, while he is so much more able to defend himself. His course has been such as will meet the approbation of every disinterested patriot in the land, who has been unseduced by the foul and contaminating influence of bankcraft. Sir, it was his home thrusts, the thrilling truths that he proclaimed to reluctant ears, that brought honorable members on their feet. It was the plain, practical truths that he announced, that rung like a deathknell in the ears of those emissaries of Mammon, in whose blind pursuit they had lost all sight of the power of those upon whom they preyed. They will like nothing that is to awaken the injured and suffering multitudes whom they have wantonly robbed by the most grinding oppressions and exactions. Sir, they should be thankful for the advice that they have received from the honorable member from South Carolina, and do justice to his motives; but they will not: they are too arrogant for advice, and too much bent on humbling your Government to their power, to be influenced by the warning voice of truth or reason.

The member from Pennsylvania has arraigned a distinguished individual, who is now a member of the other body of this Congress, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and denounced, in most unmeasured terms, the course that he has conceived it his duty to pursue in relation to the great measures now pending before Congress. Let me say to that member, and to the world, that had not that distinguished man pursued the identical course that he has in relation to those subjects, he would have been justly obnoxious to the charge that he has preferred. Had he acted otherwise, he would have been recreant to every principle heretofore considered sacred and essential to the prosperity and preservation of southern institutions. He would have been guilty, from mere party considerations, of bartering for a mere mess of pottage, all that our fathers have heretofore held to them more dear than life. This he could not, he dare not have done, without incurring the black and damning guilt of treason to the South, treason to the Democracy, treason to all those high and disinterested principles which it has ever been the pride of his friends to allow him to possess. Then how could he have acted differently, without forfeiting this high character, and delving in party malice and rancor for low revenge, at the great sacrifice of the dearest rights, interests, and liberties of this people? Nor would his luminous and enlightened mind permit him to be seduced and played off on by the petty arts and crafts that hold in bondage, and wield to their purposes, minds of lesser calibre. No, sir: if they would seduce and suborn men to their unholy offices, let them look out for those composed of less materials, and of more supple and pliant integrity.

The gentleman has spoken of the zeal of new converts. With regard to principle, I deny that there has been any change in the party to which he alludes. The great State rights party are precisely now where they have ever been; and their acting together on this or any other occasion, presupposes no abandonment of principles which, to them, have ever been paramount to every personal consideration, local or temporary. About men they have differed, and may and will differ.

I never have believed that there was any material difference in principle between the State rights party and the Administration party; and the schism that took place between General JACKSON and Mr. CALHOUN, I have ever thought, was merely personal. The latter felt it his duty to oppose his Executive usurpations: he did so, as he no doubt conscientiously believed. The causes of that opposition have now ceased, and of course the effect should cease with it. That gentleman, then, is exactly where he was in 1828; and the great cause of complaint is, that those of the craft have not been able to seduce or force him from his principles, by an effort to excite his prejudice against a party with whom, by mere accident, he had been thrown in conflict. In this, however easily effected with smaller men, they have failed with him. Sir, this is the true clue to the bitter denunciations of the man on whom they have been unable to operate by their arts, to use and seduce to effect their purposes of extortion, exaction, and legal plunder.

It is one of the oldest practices of the craft-fraternity, from the earliest ages, to cry and hunt down all those who have been too virtuous, too patriotic, and too intelligent to be seduced and corrupted by their arts. The cry of schismatics and heretics, and tortures and crucifixions, has scarcely ceased to ring on our ears from those whose habit it has ever been to reign by the deceptions which they practice on the credulous and ignorant.

One word more as to new converts. Here the gentleman would again monopolize. Does he think, even if it were so, that no party has the right to receive new-born converts but his own? What are his Conservative friends? What his distinguished and leading friends from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] and the Tennessee allies which he brings to the assistance of his Federal plalanx? How delighted has he been with the denunciations from that quarter of the conduct of that war-worn soldier, whom Tennessee—yes, once Democratic Republican Tennessee—delighted to honor, but who now, since the formation of her new alliances, can find none, sir, none to do honor to the services of that veteran soldier, enlightened and inflexible statesman, Andrew Jackson, who has contributed more to elevate the character of Tennesseeans, and place around their names a halo of glory and renown that shall be forgotten only when the history is lost that records the deeds of the valor of her sons, as perhaps ever will live again. Sir, oft has this brought me to reflect, on my pillow, amidst the gloom of midnight, on the lessons that I have been taught in early youth, of the black, cruel ingratitude of States and Republics. How early, how forgetful of the noblest deeds of the greatest and best of benefactors!

Sir, were I this day a Tennesseean, my face would crimson at the name of ingratitude, and my heart bleed in sadness to witness the incidents that are passing before me; but there are Tennesseeans who must feel more than I feel—must have seen more than I have seen of this subject, and to them I leave it.

Mr. Speaker, the times are rife in enormities; there is little telling what another day may not bring forth. France—revolutionary France—had her Dantons and Robespierres, by whose machinations and contrivances she was deluged with the best blood of her most patriotic and devoted citizens; and, sir, all, all for office, for power, and for place, were thousands of human butcheries perpetrated before the eyes of a civilized world; and, sir, by what means effected? when reason, that great lamp and luminary of human safety, revolted at the execution of the deed. What, sir, was then resorted to, to effect their purpose by these incarnate fiends? Just such, sir, as has been exhibited on this floor. Caricatures—caricatures—when failing by reason to convince, and would excite to action the most debased and damnable passions of guilt and corruption. We have just seen for the first time exhibited here on the floors of Congress, caricatures of continental bills and Treasury notes, waved on high for the purpose of excitement, when truth and reason had failed to do the office.

Sir, the signs are portentous, and grave men should pause ere it be too late to divert the match that would enkindle the explosion, the horrors of which might visit us, alike indifferent to age or to sex. I would turn from this scene with a heart sickened with disgust, but another circumstance strikes me, which I will relate for the benefit of my Southern friends. The Abolitionists, to effect, too, their fiendish and abominable purposes, have resorted to identically the same means. At a loss for reason, truth, or justice, these demons of discord and of blood have resorted to their caricatures, where Southern planters and slaveholders are held up as monsters incarnate, who delight alone in the torture and oppression of their fellow-beings; and our slaves depicted, by caricatures, in every attitude of entreaty and mercy, writhing under the agonies of the bitter yoke of slavery. Sir, this has been done to arouse to madness the vulgar and the ignorant, to enlist them in the ranks of the crusaders of Abolition. For months and years have their papers been filled with such foul and loathsome representations of our first and purest men of the South. This is one of the nice examples to be followed up by the pure spirits of Whiggery. Sir, the old adage has been, "Any port in a storm;" but with the Whigs it is any thing for excitement and effect, "come weal or wo," or desolation dire to the country, that they would ruin or rule; such is their insane, maddening thirst for office, for power, and for place. From them the South has now but little else to expect than plunder and blood, or chains. Then let them go it; we will look to ourselves and our own resources.

A word to the honorable member [Mr. SOUTHGATE] from Kentucky, who with some zeal addressed the House on this subject; and I shall have ceased to notice what of rancor and madness have fallen from the Opposition in this debate.

This gentleman has denounced the office holders as horse-leeches and blood suckers. I could commend to the gentlemen, that striking fable of the fox and the swallow; its moral may not be very inapplicable to the present occasion. "Drive not off those, (said the witty reynard to the swallow,) whose appetites are gorged and filled, for there are others waiting, more lank and hungry, thirsting for blood, to fill whom might exhaust my already depleted veins."

Ay, sir, there are already lank and hungry expectant office hunters and seekers in wait for the spoils, for which they have so long yearned, and envied others the possession of. It is that possession, let me tell the gentleman from Kentucky, that is the head and front of their greatest, blackest, and abominable crimes—it is the office—the office—the office with its spoils, that I want before I can be reconciled to this or any other Administration. Can there exist a Government without office holders? I doubt it, unless we revolutionize this Government, and have a pure monarchy, and would all be ruled by the will or caprice of one man; else officers and office holders we must have, and surely the freemen of America are not yet so much humbled by bank dicta as to be ripe for a monarchy, and expel their office holders; this I cannot, nor will not, torture myself into the belief of. Perhaps gentlemen are not aware of the extent to which their ultra doctines lead.

I will now call the attention of the House, for a few moments longer, to what I conceive to be the merits and objects of the bill on your table, which has been so much denounced and violently opposed by the Opposition in this House. It has been introduced with an intention of relieving both the Government and the people. This is the merit to which it is entitled, if it answers the purpose of its friends. It is intended to relieve the merchants that are indebted to Government, by enabling it to give further indulgence to them. It is intended, also, to aid the Bank of the United States—that hideous monster of ingratitude and corruption. It is intended as a relief to the deposite banks, by allowing them further indulgence, and thereby to enable each to grant further indulgence to the people who may be their debtors, and to enable the States to refund the amounts loaned them, without producing distress or embarrassment to the country.

Such are the objects of this bill, that has met the bitterest opposition and vilest denunciations from the Opposition, the self-styled Whigs, as a war against the banks. But for this attempt to indulge and give relief to all that are interested, there would have been no necessity for this measure. If the Government was to proceed to collect its dues, it would inevitably bring about that state of distress, embarrassment, and ruin, that has been so often predicted, and no doubt, in my mind, so greatly desired by the friends of the banks and the enemies of the Government. Nothing, in my judgment, would give them more pleasure than to see this attempted by the Government. It would, for the first time, make them all prophets, by realizing their wishes and predictions. Sir, this the Government cannot be forced to do, either by the threats or machinations of its enemies.

At this moment, this Government, which has been so often tauntingly denounced as bankrupt, insolvent, and without a dollar, has the following sums due to its Treasury:

Due on merchants' bonds, about -	$7,000,000
From the United States Bank -	6,000,000
From the deposite banks - -	5,000,000
From loans to the States - -	28,000,000
Making an aggregate amount of	$45,000,000
It will be seen there is due from the Bank of the United States - - -	$5,000,000
And from the deposite banks -	6,000,000
Making an aggregate amount of	$11,000,000

More by $1,000,000 than the whole amount of Treasury notes that are proposed to be issued for the relief of the country. Then if the banks had not failed to have performed their offices, as public agents, there would have been neither necessity nor apology for the bill of relief which is now before this House. If the Government has been embarrassed, it has been effected by the sole action of the banks, and is attributable to both their faithlessness and inefficiency, as public agents; yet, with all this odium attached to them, as the sole authors of all the mischief that has befallen us by their system of deception, and priestcraft policy, they have never failed to shuffle it off on the Government, and thus divert public attention from the mischiefs they themselves have effected, by charging it to the acts of the Government.

The next question is, shall we issue these notes, or borrow the money, which is now required for immediate use, or to force the Government to collect immediately its dues from the merchants, the States, the deposite banks, and the Bank of the United States. That the issue of Treasury notes is the most appropriate and remedial course there can not be a question seriously entertained by any, whose object is in good faith, apart from party considerations, to assist the Government in its relief of the people connected with those great interests. Sir, collection is out of the question, and the risk and expenses and uncertainty of borrowing, and the unnecessary creating a national debt when we have the money due the Treasury, to the amount of forty-five million of dollars, and know not how soon we may be able to collect a sufficiency for the purposes required, it does appear to me, would not only be impolitic in the extreme, but the height of madness to adopt; and which could only find favor, at this time, in the blindness and rancor of the most reckless party spirits.

But, sir, this has been made too manifest by others, for me to dwel on now. This subject has been investigated in another branch of this body, (the Senate of the United States,) in a most masterly manner. There the Opposition have been met, man to man; and the great Ajax of their party has been foiled and routed upon every subject of the finances of the country.

In point of argument, I believe their best friends and most ardent partisans think them defeated, overwhelmed, and routed, horse, foot, and dragoons. The policy of these measures has been so clearly demonstrated in that body, that it would be supererogation in me to attempt now to go into their examination, with a view of adding any thing new. The reasons for, and objections to them, are before the people; and they will, if they have not already, decided on their merits.

Mr. Speaker, I will now notice a single charge against the friends of this bill, of being arbitrary in wishing an early action on the measure. To show with what an ill mien, and awkward one, the charge of arbitrary power comes from the gentlemen of that body, I beg to have the journals of the House read in relation to the motion made to lay the Independent Treasury bill, that was lately sent us from the Senate, on the table, immediately on its introduction into this House, without reference, or allowing its friends one moment to discuss or even examine it, either in principle or detail. [Objections being raised, immediately cries from all quarters of the Opposition, "No, no, no," were heard, and the SPEAKER was about putting the question on the reading of the journals.] When Mr. B. said, I will withdraw the request, sir, since my purpose has been fully effected, by nearly the whole party objecting to hear their names read out, who voted, with an undivided phalanx, to lay that bill, under such circumstances, on the table, without giving to its friends one minute to examine or discuss it. I was aware that this objection would be made. I knew that gentlemen would be unwilling to sit quiet and hear their inconsistency published to the world without remonstrating against it. Yes, sir; these are the men who now gibe and prate about arbitrary power, ever ready to blow hot or cold, as best suits the purposes of their party, or their own convenience. This shows the character of their profession and practice; their duplicity, and the double parts that are carried on here for political purposes. Such as this, connected with other acts more daring, has often led me to say, that I should not be at all astonished at any course they might pursue, here or elsewhere, and that they were prepared for any sort of a revolution or bloodshed, to get themselves into office. Their whole thirst is for power and place; and but for the intelligence, patriotism, and virtue of our people, they would long since have had this mighty Republic involved in the most devastating and bloody revolution; to effect which, it has long been my deliberate and candid opinion that the leaders of that party have been prepared, and have waited only for the sanction of the people, to attempt it. We have heard already, from high quarters, the invocation of "war, pestilence, and famine," rather than a continued exclusion from office and from power. With such feelings and sentiments have they enlisted thousands of hungry expectant hordes under their banners, only waiting the ripening of public opinion by misrepresentation and corruption, to sanction the perpetration of their deeds.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

REMARKS OF MR. PICKENS,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, June 19, 1838.—The bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, tranfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, being under consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

Mr. PICKENS rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In the remarks which I propose to address to this committee, it will be my object and desire to avoid dwelling on those topics that I urged on a former occasion when this subject was under consideration, and also to avoid, as far as possible, touching upon those points which have been elaborated with so much ability on a recent occasion in the other end of this capitol.

The provisions of the bill under consideration are plain and simple. Its leading traits are, 1st, to separate the Government from all bank agency in the collection and disbursement of its revenues; 2d, to collect gradually, in small portions, through a term of about seven years, those revenues in the constitutional currency of the country. It proposes, in the execution of this design, to use four principal receivers, with moderate salaries, and nine additional clerks, with salaries not to exceed two thousand dollars each. It secures their faithfulness by ample bonds and security. It makes it a crime for any of them to use directly or indirectly any of the public moneys, except under the directions of law, and punishable with fine and imprisonment and the forfeiture of bonds. The whole appropriation required to provide proper places for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the money, is the sum of $10,000, and the annual cost, salaries and all, will but little exceed $25,000. These are the features of this bill. And now, I would ask, where are the monstrous forms in which it has been clothed? Is it a crime for this Government honestly to take care of its own revenues? Has it come to this, that we dare not throw off the agency of banks without incurring their denunciation, and the bitter curses of a thousand presses that live and flourish under the patronage flowing from their stupendous and seducing system? Did the fathers of our Constitution ever dream that this Government which they were forming was necessarily to be made dependent upon corporations which were to spring up in so short a time in every State and Territory of this republic? One of the great and leading objects of its framers, was to relieve this Government from this dependence for revenue upon the States, which formerly existed under the old articles of confederation. And the clamor now is, not that we propose to make our revenue independent of the States, but of the moneyed corporations of the States.

We are surely in a singular position. Gentlemen who are imbued with feeling and sympathy for the banking system, and who have been in the habit of tracing our prosperity to its influence, have become rabid with indignation and bitterness under the idea that the Government is waging war upon it. Sir, they only view the surface of things. Look abroad for a moment upon the world, and contemplate daily events. That reform which is now moving the deep foundations of despotism throughout Europe—that skepticism, as it were, in relation to all those dogmas which have so long held a sway over the human intellect—that close investigation which belongs to the age—all, all, are producing the most profound impressions. The Government is only impelled on under circumstances, over which it can now have but little control. It is the spirit of the age moving upon the face of society.

Let not gentlemen push on in their mad career and demand too much. If they do, as certain as destiny, they will finally produce a revolution, which will overwhelm every banking institution in its desolating fury. Let them pause and secure their present position, before they rush fatally into that which is worse. Whatever triumphs of the day may appear to the contrary, it will be but a temporary check. The spirit of a great and free peope is at work on the subject, and to attempt to heckl reform in the banking and credit system at this late day, is as vain as to chain the fretted torrent on the precipice. Gentlemen may be deceived by appearances. True we have a drained and deranged Treasury; the Executive Government, divorced and separated from banks as fiscal agents by recent events, is shorn of much of its power and patronage, and appears prostrate under the bitter war waged upon it by almost a thousand banks. On the other side, we see combined the resources of at least one hundred millions of dollars, with men of talents, and energy, and undying activity, and the bright prospects of success and triumph opening upon the future. With them the road to wealth, and power, and distinction seems clear and broad. These events are well calculated to make the timid waver and the doubtful falter. But, sir, these things have no terrors or temptation for me. I look with abiding confidence to the redeeming spirit of a free and enlightened country.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said in eulogy of the credit system. Sir, I concur in that eulogy to a certain extent. The modern system is to make credit supply the place of capital almost entirely. There is, no doubt, a vast increase of the resources and comforts of society by banks and capitalists loaning their credits to aid those who are without credit, in the purchase of property—and thus exciting enterprise. We see through this operation many gigantic schemes of modern society, which seem to have given a new life to the world; but while we look at this bright side, let us not forget to contemplate the dependence and obligations thus created, and the fearful power which is thereby added to those institutions and those men who manage and control this credit. It gives them the mainsprings of life, and enables them to touch the tenderest fibres which vibrate through the whole body politic. To this I have nothing to say, so long as its operation is confined to the business wants and commercial enterprise of the community. But when this interest seeks to become allied with the Government, and demands that credit and circulation shall be received and treated as money, then it becomes a grave political question, involving the highest principles of liberty. The whole object is, not only to use their own credit, which they have an undoubted right to, but, also, to subsidize the credit of the Government to their operations, and for their benefit. This it is which has heretofore produced an unnatural expansion in the credit system, and widened the circulation, beyond demands, in the actual business of the country.

A sound credit system, not stimulated by a connection with Government, but limited by the competition and enterprise of individuals, or banks upon a safe basis, is the life of civilized society. But when it becomes stimulated and expanded by the artificial fiscal action of Government, then it becomes dangerous, and throws the business and the property of the country under the control of the speculating and the profligate. The whole frame of the body politic then grows bloated and excited, which finally ends in convulsion and paralysis. This is the credit system that I war upon, as vicious and dangerous in the extreme.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said of the sublime merits of the banking system, as the true source of modern prosperity and power; and Spain and Turkey have been held up to us as examples of hard money Governments, while England has been painted in all the glowing colors of fancy, by way of contrast. In looking over the debates which took place some years since, in favor of the restrictive system, I find precisely the same language used, and the same countries held up in contrast, to exhibit the sublime merits of the "prohibitory policy." They seem to be the same speeches that are how delivered, except that every thing in the prosperity of England was then attributed to the restrictive system, while now it is to the banking system. Such a loose range of thought as this is only calculated to widen the field of declamation, and enable some to gather the ornaments that adorn a brilliant imagination. Sir, it is a miserable and contracted idea to attribute the prosperity of England to her banking system. No! it arises from the fact that she has the noble inheritance of the common law, which throws its broad shield over every human being who treads upon British soil; it arises from the fact that her people swear upon the Holy Evangelists, and are capable of enjoying personal liberty; it is because she can produce her Hampdens, and her Sydneys, who have the moral courage to perish upon a principle. These are the causes which have developed her vast resources—enabled her to stretch her power across the four quarters of the habitable globe, and exhibit the moral grandeur of Christian civilization united with physical prowess, in such wonderful combination as to command the study and the admiration of the world. When England is quoted as an example for us to follow and imitate, to make it suitable, you must first make us a consolidated nation, with a Government equal in power to the omnipotence of parliament. What may do for a very compact people under one Government, may be unsuited to an extensive territory, embracing all varieties of interests, with twenty-six separate Governments. England has an annual revenue of $250,000,000, and disbursements to make in all parts of the world. What may be a necessary fiscal system to her, may be utterly unnecessary to us. What may be necessary to make a magnificent monarchy, may be entirely unsuited to a Republican people.

Sir, in many points of view, it is a great blessing that we have encountered this recent shock in our system. It will force us to examine a complicated subject, which deeply affects the distribution of wealth, and the political liberty of all. And it is a little curious to trace out the first commencement amongst us of this system, which has made such rapid strides towards remodeling, not only all society, but even our Government. Alexander Hamilton, about the year 1790, commenced to make the impress of his genius upon every thing around him. He was ardent, bold, and energetic in all his plans. With a full perception of the ground upon which he stood, he always marched to his object with a heart that never faltered. The convention which formed the Constitution, did not make the Government as strong as he desired it to be. He had contemplated the English Constitution with admiration and delight; and, without considering the difference of circumstances, he thought it a perfect model for our adoption. But the Republicans of that day thought differently; and he, coming into the Administration after the formation of the Government, determined to make up by construction what it wanted in specific grants of power The funding system introduced by him created a stock interest, which formed the nucleus that has increased in power, and made a rallying point for that moneyed influence which he desired to substitute for the stability given to the British Government by a fixed aristocracy. I do not mean at present to question the financial ability developed in funding our national debt, and substituting public credit for capital, but only to speak of the political effects produced upon our whole system by these measures. The 30th section of our first revenue law under the Constitution, in 1789, is in these words: "The duties and fees to be collected by virtue of this act, shall be received in gold and silver coin only." There is no doubtful import in these words. Yet, in a very few months afterwards, Hamilton, as Secretary of the Treasury, issued the following important circular to collectors of customs:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 22, 1789.

"SIR: In consequence of arrangements lately taken with the Bank of North America and the Bank of New York, for the accommodation of the Government, I am to inform you that it is my desire that the notes of those banks, payable either on demand or no longer period than thirty days after their respective dates, should be received in payment of the duties, as equivalent to gold and silver, and that they will be received from you as such by the Treasurer of the United States," &c.

Thus we see that the Secretary then construed "gold and silver coin only" to mean bank notes payable thirty days after date. It will be remembered that at that time there were no banks at all in large portions of this Union, and thus, while the importers in one section were compelled to pay duties in "gold and silver coin only," in other sections they could pay in the notes of two banks, even though they might not be redeemable until thirty days after date. There is no man so blind who cannot understand the operation of this system. The Secretary then made his report to Congress at the next session in justification of this circular. This report is dated 22d April, 1790. In that document he uses, amongst others, the following reasons: "That the extension of their (bank notes) circulation by the Treasury is calculated to increase both the ability and the inclination of the banks to aid the Government." And he further says, in the same report, "Bank notes being a convenient species of money, whatever increases their circulation increases the quantity of current money." About three months after this report was made, Congress passed another act, on the 4th August, 1790, and in the fifty-sixth section of it expressly re-enacted the exaction of "gold and silver coin only," contained in the thirtieth section of the last act. And yet, notwithstanding this, the law was disregarded. The Secretary clearly shows that he well understood the operation of things even at that early day. These were the circumstances under which was formed the nucleus of that great stock interest, into whose power the Government has been thrown, and which now demands as a right what was at first granted as a favor. Sir, in tracing out these events it is well for us to consider the motives and the objects of those who then held the future destinies of this Government in their hands. Hamilton used this emphatic language in 1791:

"Purge it (the British Constitution) of its corruptions, and give to its popular branch equality of representation, and it would become an impracticable Government, as it stands at present, with all its supposed defects, it is the most perfect Government which ever existed!"*

Sir, this sentence speaks a volume. It is language of living light that no man can mistake. It is wonderful now to look back and see his sagacity and foresight in forming those measures by which he was to ingraft upon our Government that power and stability which he so much admired in the British Constitution, and in which he thought ours so defective. We have witnessed the progress of this system until it has now spread through our whole country, reaching in its ramifications all interests in society, not only demanding an alliance with this Government, but threatening to dictate law to this confederacy.

Mr. Chairman, in deciding upon the action of a Government, there are far more important matters to be considered than the pecuniary interest of this or that class in society. And let no man deceive himself by the plausible and beautiful theory that all classes in the body politic have a mutual dependence and harmony of interest blended together. Let no man suppose that that which adds power and profit to a species of capital necessarily has a corresponding effect upon labor. I utterly deny the ingenious doctrine, lately put forth from very high authority, that there is no such thing in this country as capital and labor; that all are capitalists and all are laborers. This is certainly a new discovery, left for modern invention. There never was a community, constituted under political power, which would not finally, in the progress of time, classify itself into capitalists and laborers, and that which may be a blessing to one may be a curse to the other. With a view that we may understand that there is a difference in the interests of some in the community, and with no other view at present, let us look at the operation of the banking system on this country in reference alone to the expense of the currency it furnishes. Calculate circulation as it was in January, 1837, at $148,000,000, and then add to that the $72,000,000 specie lying in vault to sustain this circulation, and upon which interest must be made by those who keep it, so as to indemnify them for its use in this agency. And then we have, upon adding them together, $220,000,000, upon which the interest will be $15,400,000 annually. This is equal to the whole tobacco crop of the United States. Who receives this interest—laborers or capitalists in bank stock? And this is but a small item in the amount of their profits and dividends. Banks, too, in modern times claim an identity with the people, as if they were one and the same. No wonder, then, that we hear there are no capitalists, no laborers—that all sections are the same, and all classes the same.

Again, while on this point, let us look for a moment at the peculiar operation of this bank currency upon those who depend upon daily labor, and see if there be no difference of interest. When banks furnish the circulation of a country, they unquestionably have the power to expand and to contract that circulation according to their views of interest or policy. Suppose, then, prices to settle down under a state of contraction, and then expansion commences to take place. What do we see? Stocks go up; personal property rises; real estate rises; and wages for daily labor are the last to rise. The desire of the industrious is to lay out all, over and above what is necessary for supplies, in property. How can this be done when wages are at a stand and property rising, under an expanding currency thrown out by banks, and stimulated to enlarge, as they have been heretofore, by Government deposites.

Sir, it is this desolating operation of expansion and contraction which brings productive industry at the mercy of fictitious capital; and it is all vain to tell me there is no difference. It is a stable gold and silver currency under which labor flourishes, and through which it can calculate with certainty, as to the acquisition of property; and it is a paper expanded currency on which speculators flourish and revel in spoils plundered from others.

No difference between labor and capital!!! Go, in the depth of winter, to the frozen banks of the Miami, or the deep forests of the Mississippi, and ask the hardy pioneer if there be no difference between his lot and that of the princely speculator, who carves out for himself a barony from your splendid domain. Ah! sir, go into the back streets and alleys of your large cities, and ask the tenants that dwell in their thousand hovels, if there be no difference in their lot and those who live under the drippings from the palaces which have sprung up like magic throughout our land to give us the blessings of an expanded paper currency! Perhaps, sir, if you were to pause for a reply, you might hear some one exclaim, in the bitter anguish of a desponding heart, Merciful God, is this the equal justice of a free country! The doctrine, that all classes in society are mutually dependent upon each other, and benefits to one class are benefits to another, is utterly untrue; and the legislator who habitually acts upon such an idea perpetrates cold, heartless, cruel injustice. That is the very doctrine by which the aristocracy of the old world claim to be supported. Those who vindicated an established clergy, do so upon the avowed ground that it sheds corresponding blessings upon all otber classes in society. By the same sort of plausibility a nation may be deluded into the support of the stars and the diadems of royalty. Sir, the profound truth is that there are conflicts in all communities, and that the Government is the wisest and the freest which abstains from creating any artificial class who expect to live by its favor or flourish upon its bounty. Not only are there different classes in society, differently affected, but in this extensive country, there are different sections deeply and vitally affected, in different ways, by the fiscal action of this Government. Look over that balmy land that expands its exuberant bosom under the genial rays of the southern sun, with its rich exports, amounting, in some years, to near $100,000,000, and what do we see? Much of this vast product actually taken to northern ports, and again reshipped, while three-fourths of the returning imports upon this amount are brought back again through the same circuitous direction. Is this a natural operation? No. It arises, in a great degree, from the fiscal action of this Government. Your impost system operates so as to collect, indirectly, two-thirds of your revenues from the exports of the country; and the same interests which have formed this system, also have the power to control the disbursements. The result of which has been to collect two-thirds of the revenue from the exporting interest, and to disburse the same amount in the non-exporting region. This it is that has made your towns and your cities languish and die in one section, while they have sprung up and flourished, to the astonishment and admiration of the world, n another section. Connected with this subject, also, it is a view worthy of notice, that about three-fourths of the paper credits of the country have heretofore issued, also, from the non-exporting region. These credits have circulated as money; and, ever since Hamilton's Treasury order in 1789, the whole power and patronage of the Federal Government have been devoted, in its fiscal action, to give that circulation the profits and attributes of gold and silver currency. This operation has given those who issued these credits precisely the same power over the productive industry and labor of the country, as if they had actually held that much capital in gold and silver. The great struggle now is, whether those exports which have an intrinsic value at home and abroad, shall form the basis of a sound system of credits and exchanges, or whether banks of discount and circulation, aided by, and allied to, the political power of the community, shall produce an artificial and unsound system?

Let us look for a moment into this artificial system. We find at present a shock in the whole trade and exchanges of the country, and in the shock those who hold the paper circulation control the property and the products of the nation. Exchanges have changed their whole nature. They used to be considered the difference between cash and a bill drawn for payment on some distant point. But now it is the difference between paper circulation at one point, and its value in the paper circulation of some other point. The creditor point contracts, and the debtor point remains stationary, or enlarges, and of course exchanges rise. The paper circulation, for instance, in Mississippi, may be thirty per cent. below specie par there, because of its inconvertibility; and from different circumstances in New York, paper may be at specie par, or, by way of illustration, five per cent. below specie par. The difference is then twenty-five per cent. between the capacity of converting the circulation in Mississippi into legal currency, and the capacity to do the same with the circulation in New York. Now, are we by any bounty or power of ours to make it the interest of New York to receive that at only five per cent. below specie par which, from want of convertibility, is thirty per cent. below par at home? Yet this is exactly what is required from the Government in what is now called equalizing exchanges. There never was greater fraud conceived than this operation. It is nothing more nor less than a bounty to the banking interest at the expense of the producing interest of the community. The only true and legitimate basis of exchanges is the trade between different points. Give the banking interest the privilege and power of having the circulation of their credit received and treated as cash or money, and you at once give it the direction and monopoly of trade. Give them the power of discounting upon the public funds as upon specie, together with the certainty that the commerce of the country shall flow indirectly through their hands, both going and coming, and well may they afford to equalize exchanges, by indemnifying themselves through the tribute they levy upon the productive industry of the country. Sir, it is this whole system, allied as it has been with the over fiscal action of this centralizing Government, that has tended to monopolize trade, and force the exports, as well as the imports, through great Northern cities, at the expense of all that section which lies South and West of this place. And the great pressure which has been felt principally in the Northern cities, arises, in a great degree, from the fact that, heretofore, they have received an unnatural and inflated impulse from the vast surpluses in the Treasury, and from their discounts running upon the revenues of the Government, for the benefit of dividends to private stockholders. When this unnatural and unjust state of things is withdrawn, we begin to see trade, like water, finding its natural level, and in receding, it is not strange that many should be left to struggle who have been heretofore sustained by the flood tide from an overflowing public Treasury. Things will now become sounder and safer; and if you do not see such rapid increase, you will see more honesty and stability, and the landed interests will be blessed, although stock-jobbers and speculators may suffer.

Upon this point, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that no part of the country has more interest than the interior West. Their operations are peculiar. Their largest single interest is their live stock and provision trade. The most profitable part of that commerce is their cash sales in the exporting region. It is this which gives them their greatest capacity to purchase elsewhere. Around this interest all others rally. The natural course of all trade is to buy where you sell; but under existing trade, they do not buy where they make their greatest cash sales, and, consequently, they have double exchanges to encounter.

The merchants of the West have been, for the most part, from the East, with Eastern credits, and have given their purchases that direction, at the expense of the provision producing interest. This artificial system, fostered, as it has been, by the action of this Government, allied with those who hold the credit circulation, has raised embankments, and forced their trade into unnatural channels. It is their cash sales into the staple or exporting States which gives them their highest prosperity. That system which benefits or injures the former, indirectly produces corresponding effects upon them. As cotton rises, all their cash produce rises also. If, instead of selling their stock in one market and buying goods in another, they were to buy and sell in the same region, they would save at least one operation in exchanges. And the result of this would be, that the circulation where they made their sales would not only serve their purposes, but would be actually at a premium. And the only reason why this is not the fact now, is from the indebtedness of their merchants, who trade where the farming interests do not sell. This would be reversed, if it had not been for the artificial aid afforded by Government in its fiscal action, to the banking interests, at the expense of the agricultural. The present nominal rate of domestic exchanges is not the slightest evidence of what ought to exist under a sound and healthy state of trade. The toleration extended by the public to the suspension of specie payments, together with the large debtor interest now in society, gives the banks the complete power of the country, and makes it their interest, in many instances, to depreciate their own bills. Many make out of exchanges their chief profits. Exchange now is only the difference in paper circulation at different points. If those who raise the produce would only act in concert, they could command and control proper exchanges. There is no part of the world, the course of whose trade is more unnatural than the West at present. It had its consummation in their suicidal alliance with the protective and tariff interests of the country, and has never yet righted itself. Things will now change, and they will find it eminently their interest hereafter, as it has been with all other sections, to purchase where they make their largest cash sales.

Those schemes of internal improvement, by which we are now proposing to connect the exporting region directly with the provision producing country, are founded upon a natural reciprocity of interest. It is the natural trade between the two regions which is to support them. While they are now struggling for existence, as it were, let not gentlemen give this Government such a direction as again to fall into the hands of that artificial class, who, from their connection with its bounty and power heretofore, have been enabled to monopolize the nett profits of trade, and give it such direction as their interest might dictate. If they do, it will be fatal to the investments of capital which have been made with us, under the calculation that we were to have a fair and impartial opportunity to control that portion of trade which God and nature proclaim to be ours. I desire no aid or favor from this Government. Only do that which is equal and just to all.

In maintaining the position I do on this bill, I consider myself as maintaining one branch of that great free trade system with which it has been the pride and the glory of my State to be identified.

Mr. Chairman; all that I ask is, that the Government will collect its revenues and make its regular disbursements in gold and silver, and thus preserve for all parts a stable and fixed standard of value, and leave every section, as it ought in justice to be left, to rely upon its products for the prosperity of all. Under such a system we could at least have a free and a contented people. This would undoubtedly have considerable check and control over the tendency to excess, which naturally exists in an exclusive credit circulation. But, sir, it is contended that this exaction would produce ruin throughout the land; that its effects would be to destroy the whole banking system in any form. And it is perfectly astonishing to me, that the imagination of any man could be so worked upon as to produce such impressions. The bill proposes that the exaction of gold and silver in payment of public dues shall be very gradual; only one-sixth of the whole revenue the first year, and in the same ratio for six years. Then, suppose the revenue to equal $24,000,000, the amount of specie required will be four millions only the first year, and eight millions the next year, &c. It must always be remembered that, in these operations, the disbursements will take place nearly as rapidly as the collections. The revenue may at least be divided into quarterly receipts and quarterly payments. This would be at twenty-four millions annually, $6,000,000 quarterly. Thus we would require the first year but one million in specie per quarter, which would, in all probability, be disbursed by the end of the quarter, or nearly so; for, in such a state of things, all interests in society would be against any idle surplus, and a reduction would immediately take place, and correspond with what was absolutely necessary. Collect in bank circulation, and the reverse of this will be the case; for any idle surplus collected by Government would be equivalent to hoarding that much of their circulation beyond business demands, and consequently, increasing their profits. Collection in coin throws the banking interest, together with the tax-paying interest, against high revenues; while collection in paper circulation throws the bank interest in favor of high revenues and its attendant consequences. Receive in bank paper, and the more that is hoarded in surpluses the greater the profits. Suppose the revenue to average $24,000,000, annually, and all finally collected in gold and silver, what then would be the operation? Let it be remembered, that this would not take place for nearly seven years, under the bill; and by that time things will have become settled, so that those banks that are sound would feel no dread from its operation. Let it not be supposed that this amount would all be required at one time. On the contrary, all know how many debts may be paid by the circulation of a single hundred dollars. When the hundred dollars have performed their circle through the creditor and debtor interests of society, it is not unreasonable to calculate that they have cancelled debts at least to the amount of one thousand dollars. So it would be in the collection and disbursement of twenty-four millions by Government. One-fourth would be a very large estimate to perform this operation; and this would be $6,000,000. At most, the Government could do no more than accumulate a sum equal to the permanent public funds usually on hand, and not actually disbursed; and this would scarcely ever exceed, at the highest estimate, $8,000,000, except in extraordinary cases of high surpluses, which, from what I have said, never would be permitted to occur permanently, because all interests in society would be against it, and none can be conceived of that would be for it. Now let us examine the effect of even $8,000,000 in specie upon the banking operations of the country. Mr. Gallatin, in 1834, together with an able committee, calculated the payments in the banks of the city of New York alone to amount to $5,000,000 per day, or near sixteen hundred millions of dollars a year. He then estimated the annual collection of revenue in that city at $15,000,000, and the action of Government could not extend beyond its receipt and disbursement, or $30,000,000, annually, which would be less than one-fiftieth part of the whole.

Suppose, upon this basis of Mr. Gallatin, you calculate the annual payments in Philadelphia at $1,000,000,000, New Orleans at $600,000,000, and the same for Boston and Baltimore, and $300,000,000 for Charleston, and so on through other cities of the Union, and what, then, would be the proportion that $8,000,000, or even $20,000,000, would bear to those transactions? Sir, it would literally be as "a drop in the bucket, and dust in the balance." This clamor which has been raised, that the collection of specie in public dues would ruin banks that were on a sound basis, is the shallowest pretext that ever was manufactured to impose upon a credulous and deluded country. But, sir, I do not choose to rest this point upon any thing that I may say alone. I will make some quotations, which will be good authority, at least, with those who seem to follow leaders that draw upon "imagination for facts," and rely upon vapid declamation for argument. First: in the report to which I have referred, Mr. Gallatin says:

"The impossibility of attaining the object, (a metallic currency,) through the action of the revenue alone, is palpable, and results from the immense disproportion between the mass of payments for the ordinary and current business of the country, and those which are affected by the General Government. It has already been stated that the daily payments in the banks of this city, (New York,) amounted to near five millions on the 1st of October, (1833,) and exceeded four millions on the 1st of February last. This includes neither the payments made in each bank in its own notes, or in checks drawn upon it, nor any portion of the retail business of the city, or of any of the other payments made without the immediate agency of the banks. The daily payments in this city alone, amount to at least five millions of dollars a day, or near sixteen hundred millions of dollars a year. The annual revenue collected in New York cannot now exceed fifteen millions of dollars, and the action of Government cannot extend beyond its receipts and its disbursements; that is to say, to more than thirty millions, or less than one-fiftieth part of the whole. All that Government could do would be to accumulate an amount of specie equal to the permanent public deposites. It might, at most, establish a separate metallic currency for Government, by compelling importers and purchasers of public lands to pay in specie, and by paying its creditors in the same currency. But this metallic currency would be used for that, and for no other purpose. It could have no control over the general currency of the country, nor prevent its depreciation, or a general suspension of specie payments. It might only enable Government, if such a catastrophe should ensue, to preserve, through the general confusion, the public faith towards the creditors of the public. We must aim only at what is practicable; and the only rational plan, for the present, must be, without excluding the paper currency, to restrict it within proper limits."*

He further says, in the same report, page 28:

"But, without discussing the constitutional question, it is impossible to suppose that the Government of the United States is so constituted that it cannot perform its most legitimate functions through its own officers and agents: that even for collecting its own revenue, it is compelled to resort to State institutions. Why not at once recur to the Treasurers of the several States, and make them Sub-Treasurers of the United States!"

So much for Mr. Gallatin as authority. I think he under-estimates the effects that would be produced by the collection of specie upon a vitiated state of the paper currency, (not that I believe he would entirely reform it,) but he is true as to the harmlessness of its effects upon banks that do business upon a sound basis.

I will quote the authority of another very distinguished gentleman, to show that he did not consider the collection of Government dues in gold and silver as disastrous upon credit or banks. All remember the state of things in 1816, when the country had just come out of a war, and felt all the dreadful effects of a depreciated and excessive paper currency. In reference to these points, this distinguished gentleman, on the 28th February, 1816, said in this House: "The establishment of a National Bank not being, in his opinion, the proper remedy, he proceeded to examine what was." "The banks, he said, were making extravagant profits out of the present state of things, which ought to be curtailed." After illustrating this point, he says: "With a receipt of forty millions a year, if the Government was faithful to itself and to the interests of the people, they could control the evil; it was their duty to make the effort. They should have made it long ago, and they ought now to make it. The evil grows every day worse by indulgence. If Congress did not now make a stand, and stop the current whilst they might, would they, when the current grew stronger and stronger hereafter, do it? As to the evil of the present state of things, he admitted it in its fullest extent. If he was not mistaken, there were some millions in the Treasury of paper, which were nearly worthless, and now wholly useless to the Government, by which an actual loss of considerable amount must certainly be sustained by the Treasury. This was an evil which, he said, ought to be met at once, because it would grow greater by indulgence. In the end, the taxes must be paid in the legal money of the country, and the sooner that was brought about the better. Such was the operation of the present state of the circulating medium, he proceeded to show, that the duties laid by the United States were at a rate of ten per cent. higher in Boston than in Baltimore, and in Baltimore higher than in Washington, &c. If Congress were to pass forty statutes on the subject, he said, they would not make the law more conclusive than it was, that nothing should be received in payment of duties to the Government but specie; and yet no regard was paid to the imperative injunctions of the law in this respect. The whole strength of the Government, he was of opinion, ought to be put forth to compel the payment of the duties and taxes to the Government in the legal currency of the country." This, sir, was the language, and these the opinions of Daniel Webster, than whom there could be no higher authority with some gentlemen in this country. We see no woful prediction of destruction to banks or credit at that time, by the exaction of "specie" in public dues, even though it should amount to "forty millions of dollars a year." I will quote but one more authority, and then I em done with this point for the present. Another gentleman, on the 27th February, 1816, in the same debate, used this language:

"With regard to the present time, he said, he should be glad to know why the Treasury of the United States had not now the command of specie payments and the rate of exchange in its own hands? How much better, if the Government had this power, as he believed they had, that they should exercise it to compel the resumption of specie payments."

This was the opinion of the experienced gentleman [Mr. SERGEANT] who now so ably represents a portion of Philadelphia upon this floor.

Mr. Chairman, I have quoted these authorities with no other view than to show that if I am mistaken in supposing the collection of gold and silver in public dues can produce no injury, but, on the contrary, the most wholesome effect upon all interests in society, then I err with those who are capable of forming the clearest judgments, and let us not be too rash in denouncing that which very sensible men have heretofore advocated. I shall not quote the sentiments delivered by John Randolph, who, in my opinion, spoke more like a prophet upon these subjects than any man of his day. He, perhaps, might not be considered good authority. No, sir! the clamor raised against the collection of public dues in specie, savors full as much of demagogueism as of sound patriotism. It can do no injury to banks who desire, in reality, to have sound paper, and to do business upon a proper commercial basis.

It is undoubtedly the duty of the Federal Government to furnish a safe standard of value which nothing can vary. This is made a duty under the power given "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin;" and by the Constitution declaring that no State shall "coin money, emit bills of credit, or make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."* This preservation of a fixed standard of value is essential to the protection of property. The Government can, at least, through its collections and disbursements, furnish one sound and healthful artery, whose pulsation shall send forth a pure circulation into all those veins that run from the great points of our system. The great error has been in taking it for granted that paper credit represented coin, from the fact that it was esteemed convertible, when, in reality, it never was convertible. No bank that has all the attributes of deposite, discount, and circulation, can have paper representing, in fact, coin. The truth is, that it can only have a credit circulation, which is vastly beneficial to commercial operations, when confined to a sound basis; but it is not money, nor can it, in justice, be a measure of value for every man's property. No, sir! a specie standard is the law of this country at home, as it is the law of the world abroad. And it is an eternal truth, that nothing but the precious metals, or circulation resting upon them, gilder for gilder, and dollar for dollar, can be made money, in fact, in any nation or in any age. All the powers of despotism have in vain been exerted upon this point, at different periods of the world, and it has produced no other effect but to compel those who held the metals secretly to hoard them, while fraud, perjury, and swindling, have become the legalized characteristics of society. Upon these points, I exultingly triumph in the truth of my position, and defy refutation.

Mr. Chairman, it is poor and contracted declamation to say, that collections in gold and silver would break down the prosperity of the country. As well might you expect the waking lion to be pressed down by the weight of the morning dewdrop hanging upon his mane. Look abroad, and contemplate, for a moment, the vast power of your cotton trade upon commerce; cast your eye upon the thousand sails that annually swell on the bosom of the ocean, freighted with one million five hundred thousand bales of the richest produce that the world ever saw; look to the deep valleys of the far west, unfolding the temptations of a virgin soil, upon which a hardy and enterprising people are developing the resources of new empires! Yes, sir, look from the polar regions even down to the tropics, and behold the Missouri and the Mississippi sweeping through the inheritance of freemen; and then, sir, after you have contemplated those mighty prospects, come and talk to me, if you can, of the contemptible idea, that the collection of a few millions in specie, by this Government, is to throw us back into the dark ages! It is miserable humbugry, that banks, in their anxiety to monopolize all gain, should exclaim that we war upon credit, and are to break down the prosperity of this mighty people, walking erect in all the energy of manhood, and with giant strides, to the empire of the world, under the quickening influences of free and glorious institutions!

Gentlemen sleep under a delusion; they are where the world was twenty years ago. Steam-power has revolutionized all inland navigation, and now the resources of the country, with its cotton trade, will revolutionize commerce. The day is past when bank circulation is again to be considered as cash or currency, to form a permanent system. It is to have value in proportion to the credit and capacity of the institution issuing it, and no more, and will facilitate large commercial transactions. As far as we are concerned, in our foreign trade, cotton is to supply, to a great extent, the place of coins in transmissions, and is to regulate exchanges. The tide is changing, and those who repose under the fatal idea that banks are to regulate the helm, as heretofore, and that the same breeze is to swell the sails, will find themselves wrecked amid breakers, and bleaching under the unrelenting winds of heaven. On these subjects, there is a deep current of thought in the world, and the spirit of reform is abroad. Let not gentlemen move further in their bold career under an idea that the banking interest is to rule this country. I warn them to pause before they bring down destruction from an outraged and indignant people. The responsibility will rest upon them. As to our trade abroad, cotton is to be the great regulator. The bank or banks that ally themselves with that interest, upon a proper commercial basis, will have the means to meet credits in Europe, and will be relieved from all transmissions in coin.

There is no position so dangerous to the banks themselves as to reunite them in any transactions with this Government. It would be the pregnant cause and the pretext for conflict and party warfare, in which the property and the business of the peaceful and the honest would be placed at the mercy of the profligate and the ambitious. All who desire to preserve the usefulness of those institutions which rest upon a sound basis, should dread the fatal embrace of the Government, which will either prove too strong for them, or will make a combination too strong for liberty.

Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to trace out the progress and power of banking operations, not only over the currency, but over the politics of the world. I shall not trespass upon the patience of the committee on this point, except by referring briefly to some prominent events. We can draw from them some important lessons. Even going back but a short time, we see that, in 1792, Clavier, with those who had control of the finances in France, through agents in England, by means of cashing drafts, produced an operation upon the Bank of England, which spread alarm and bankruptcy throughout the nation, and compelled the Government to create five millions sterling of Exchequer bills in aid of the bank and commercial men. This would have been carried much further at that time, but for want of unity in the French councils. Again, in 1796, the advances made for allies and armies upon the continent, and particularly the imperial loan of that time, produced confusion in the English currency, and brought down ruin and desolation to every class in society. Impending invasion and destruction seemed to threaten a total overthrow. The derangement of her currency paralyzed the strength of the nation. The bank could no longer perform its functions. The nation could not bear, at that time, the taxes requisite for defence. The ministry were forced to resort to a method of debasing the coins, and violating the sacredness of contracts, by legalizing an irredeemable paper currency. The bank stopped specie payments on the 26th February, 1797; and Parliament, in its omnipotence, sanctioned the act. The act of 1797 professed to sustain the suspension only "for a limited time." The second section exempted the bank from paying any of its notes, although "issued as payable on demand or otherwise," and provided the mode in which it might apply to the court to stay proceedings against it. This act expressly violated existing contracts, and upon the plea of State necessity; that plea under which profligacy and despotism have claimed a sanction in every age and in every country. This was the first act of the British ministry which, in effect, debased the coins by legalizing an irredeemable paper currency; and this is nothing more nor less than the modern substitute for debasing and clipping them, that ancient prerogative of despotism. This act of continuing the suspension was repeated, from time to time, for twenty-two years. That which at first professed to be "for a limited time," lasted about twenty-five years; and from 1806 to 1823, seventeen years of the suspension, the bank made an average dividend of ten per cent. a year. It has been under the operation of this legislation that the seat of power in England has entirely changed in modern times. Formerly, the aristocracy held four-fifths of the property of the nation, but now they hold only one-sixth. The Government threw itself into the power of those they could not control, and gave ascendancy to capitalists in stocks. It has changed the aristocracy from one of landed interests and hereditary to one of bankers and money. The lords are now numerous, but poor. They were formerly, from their independent wealth, checks upon the Crown—not so now. The wealth of the kingdom has changed, and the real power is in the Commons, representing, as they do, capitalists in manufactures, commerce, and stocks; which will inevitably end, in the progress of events, in an unchecked Crown. The result of all these great movements upon the distribution of wealth was, that, in 1833, Parliament renewed the charter of the Bank of England, and passed this remarkable section: "And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of August, 1834, a tender of a note or notes of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, expressed to be payable to bearer on demand, shall be a legal tender, to the amount expressed in such note or notes, and shall be taken to be valid as a tender to such amount for all sums above five pounds, in all courts and in all places in which any tender of money may be legally made: Provided, always, That no such note or notes shall be deemed a legal tender of payment by the Governor and Company of the Bank of England." Thus it will be seen, by this clause, that the unlimited power of the British Government has made the notes of the Bank of England a legal tender from all persons and all classes, except from the Bank itself. This great principle is destined to consummate that revolution which has taken place in England in the distribution of wealth; whilst, also, it makes the Bank, in fact, a separate estate in political power. It discards the necessary use of gold and silver, to a great extent, and practically substitutes paper as legal currency. The result must be to throw out gold and silver from England, particularly the former, as it is now worth more, in this country, when compared with silver. While she thus discards gold, let us take it; while she takes the less stable currency, let us take the sound; and it will give our capital and industry a permanent ascendancy in the next shock that occurs. If we intend, in our future policy, to run a career with Great Britain, upon the basis which she has established, we must first make our Government as strong as hers, and unite its destiny and power with the paper circulation of the country, or every commercial convulsion must accrue to her benefit. Without this, our system will be too weak to stand the shock. In England, they have a consolidated interest, and the omnipotence of Parliament allows them to delegate, to a separate institution, control over whatever they choose to constitute as currency. Here the reverse is the fact, and every separate sovereignty furnishes circulation; and in the competition there can be no systematic action, but through the simple preservation of the constitutional currency, by the fiscal action of this Government, or the creation of a superintending regulator, to which must be delegated the power of substituting paper for gold and silver. This power reaches the very vitals of all society, for it practically changes the standard of value, and is the highest attribute of sovereignty. The fact is, the power to issue and regulate paper currency, if it is to be made money, ought to be as strictly confined to the control of sovereignty as to stamp coin and fix its value. In England, where they have an annual revenue of $250,000,000, indirectly levied from every quarter of the world, and disbursed, for the most part, upon a small territory with an identity of interests, the Government may need a bank as a fiscal agent. Their interest is for high revenue and extravagant disbursements. It is the reverse with us. With our extended territory and diversity of interests, if you attempt to follow England, you may have a splendid Government, and magnificent wealth concentrated on certain points; but you will have dependent provinces and a corrupt and enslaved people. Instead of the aristocracy of the old world, we will have in its place the practical power of corporations concentrating wealth, and giving that energy to a central Government which Hamilton so much desired. We might have more apparent wealth and gigantic enterprises, but we would pay dear for them. Without this we may be poorer, but we will be freer and happier. The organization of banks, with their credits, fostered and centralized by their connection, through the receipts and disbursements, with this Government, tends to consolidate the Confederacy, and to place us all under the subjugation of those who hold a certain species of capital, without reference to the various interests of the country.

Ordinarily, Government is too strong for liberty, but allied with this tremendous interest it must become despotic. Separate them, and the tendency is for them to check and balance each other. The real danger at this juncture is more from the power and combination of banks and their influence than from the Government. We are, in some points of view, just at that crisis that the people of Great Britain were in 1797, when Parliament legalized an irredeemable paper circulation; and deeply as that affected the change of power and the distribution of wealth there, yet still more deeply will our institutions be affected if this Government does any thing, as a permanent system, towards receiving any treating the credit circulation of the local authorities as money, and making it the measure of value.

Mr. Chairman, independent of the peculiar operation of the vitiated system of modern credit and banking upon our internal and domestic relations as a people, it presents itself to us in an interesting point of view as a nation connected with other nations. The great markets for our exports, particularly cotton and tobacco, are England and France, from whence, through the process of manufacturing, they are reshipped to all parts of the world. We want an expanded currency there, with a contracted safe one here; because we wish to sell high and buy cheap, or convert our sales into available funds. They must come down to our prices, or lose our market. With inflated credit and currency in England, and limited and safe here, English manufactures could never reach our market; unless they came down to our prices under a sound currency. There can be no greater protection to our industry and capital than this; and it forces the English manufacturers to our price, or under our sales of cotton there, enables us to convert their currency into available funds, and thus gives us the control of trade. The struggle is, whether we shall control through our exports of raw material, or whether they shall control through banks and credit. If we contract within safe bounds, and rely upon the former, whenever a shock takes place in the commercial world, it will be felt in England, and accrue to our benefit in the final adjustment. But the reverse will be the fact if we enter into a career with Great Britain for ascendancy over the currency and credit transactions of the world She holds the banking and credit power of the commercial world. All commercial points are debtors to Great Britain. She expands her currency and enlarges her credit. The consequence is, that all other points in commercial connection with her feel the stimulus and the impulse. They are induced to enlarge, too, and receive extension from the bank and bankers of London. And when all points become largely indebted, under high prices from expanded credits, she then contracts, and through the Bank of England, connected as it is with the power and credit of Government, enlarges the proportion of bullion, and limits paper issues. And what is the consequence? She calls in her debts and compels payment in gold and silver or available funds. A shock takes place—credit contracts itself—prices fall—and the great seat of bullion and the banking power becomes then mistress over the property of the commercial world. She puts up every thing to the highest prices, and then purchases at the lowest. Look at recent facts. In the single year of 1836, there were, including branches, two hundred joint stock banks created in England. This swelled the expansion of credits and circulation. On March 7th, 1837, the Bank of England commenced reducing her loans, and by December the 14th, 1837, had actually reduced them in those few months, £7,852,000, or nearly $40,000,000. She increased her bullion in the same time, £4,124,000, or near $20,000,000. This specie of course was hoarded, and reduced the general circulation, which, together with the credit circulation of $40,000,000, made a contraction of near $60,000,000 in nine months. We all remember the disasters which have occurred with us since 12th May, 1837, up to the present time. The Bank of England commenced her contractions on the 7th March, 1837, and we felt the electric shock in May following, and a few months, as the contraction grew closer and closer, we were thrown into convulsions. And so it will ever be, as long as we are urged on in the heedless and mad career which we have heretofore followed. The truth is, this whole system of expanding and stimulated modern credits connected with Government, does nothing more nor less than reduce us again to a state of colonial vassalage to Great Britain. To meet the shocks and the periodical reverses which she has the power to create, we are compelled to three alternatives; either to yield up our gold and silver—or sacrifice our exports for her benefit—or to issue bonds and stocks running upon time at high interest. This last is but an extension of the catastrophe which awaits with more astounding effects. It may now be said that the banks and bankers of England hold the strings of power over the two countries—they even hold the question of peace or war in their hands. And the Government of neither country could this day make war or peace without their consent, and without their interest. Well may crowned heads attempt to purify the blood of bankers, as they have done in modern times, by conferring upon them the empty title of baron, before whose presence courtiers shall bow, and even the diadem of royalty itself shall glitter.

Mr. Chairman, I love the wealth and apparent prosperity of my country; but I love, still more, her independence. Give us poverty and an humble destiny, if you will, rather than to have our people wear the badges of vassals, with all the gorgeous livery of bondsmen. I envy nothing European but their glorious literature. Rude as many suppose us to be, still I love the hills and the valleys of my own country, because it was the home and the country of those who once flashed on high the sword of freedom in the war of our Revolution. Independence forever to my country, is the first and dearest sentiment of my heart.

The writers in Great Britain, with some very honorable exceptions, on these subjects connected with currency and credit, write, for the most part, for the interest and power of Great Britain. I do not blame them, but they are of little authority with me. What is for her interest under an expanded currency and an enlarged system of credits, is precisely the reverse for the United States, unless we should in turn become the great reservoir of commerce, and the banking creditor of the world. A stable and safe currency, and sound limited credit system with us, limits the power of Great Britain. An enlarged and expanded system, stimulated by her, gives her the purse strings in all convulsions. France has perceived this, and wisely abstained from joining in her proud career of fortune and of ambition. If she had fallen into that system at the conclusion of peace, twenty-five years ago, the title of being "King of Great Britain and France," which has been handed down as a proud inheritance to the English crown, would not at this day be a vain and empty sound, but would be felt as something substantial in all its sad and degrading realities.

Mr. Chairman, in the whole operation of this system which I have been discussing, we of the weaker portions of this confederacy hold the same relation to the gigantic stock interest of the North that the whole country bears towards Great Britain. While the confederacy would become commercial colonies in fact, we of the South would be tributary provinces to those who would hold in their hands the destiny of credits and banks, fostered by Government, with all its disbursements. Let those whose investments are in land and labor beware! Their fate depends upon this controversy!

Allow me to say that there are no subjects in the whole range of politics calculated to produce a deeper impression upon our future destiny, as a people, than the very questions upon which we are now called to decide. Let gentlemen who represent the weaker portions of this Union remember that the result of all modern improvement and organization is to consolidate all society into one living mass, where local interests and local feelings are to be absorbed for the benefit of one mighty whole. The tendency of civilization in modern times is to aggregation, where the stronger classes subjugate the weaker. Formerly, the same result was produced by physical force and the conqueror's sword. Not so now. Through combinations and corporations, whole interests and classes are brought to act with the system and energy of a single head clothed with power. Under these circumstances, when I think of the future, and turn my eyes to the land of my forefathers, I confess that I feel my heart filled with the foreboding emotions that rush upon it. Let those whose homes and whose children are there, and there forever, hesitate, long hesitate, before they do any thing, directly or indirectly, to strengthen the hands of others, who may be forced by an irresistible destiny to sweep our peculiar institutions from the face of the earth; and if any of us should survive the shock, it will only be to drag out a miserable existence of degraded impotency. But I forbear to pursue this painful subject.

It is unpleasant to be arrayed, as I am, against the supposed interest of any class or any party, and to encounter their fierce hostility. But viewing things as I do, he who falters is false to his duty. Those who suppose that I have taken my course from any partisan feelings, little understand the emotions of my heart. I would not turn on my heel for all the party triumphs of the day. I took my position without consulting any politician living; and there are those around me who know that I took it immediately after the suspension of specie payments. I should never have deviated from it, if I had stood alone; and, under existing circumstances, I am resolved to maintain it, be the consequences what they may. Thank God! I ask no favors of any man, or set of men living, save my own constituents. I scorn and defy power, whether it comes from this Government or from the banks. All I ask is a fair hearing; and if the cause I advocate is to be vanquished, let it be done by the power of truth, rather than by party drill; for remember, upon this great subject, the triumph of error may prove fatal to the best interests of our common country.

In all free communities, it is upon the fiscal action of Government that great parties divide. There may be divisions under individual leaders for personal objects; but, from the nature of things, all such must have a temporary career. There are those who naturally love a strong Government, and those who fear it. They will stand on different sides. Jefferson and Hamilton, the two master minds of their day, separated in 1790 on fiscal questions, and the consolidating action of this Government; and such, in my opinion, will again be the division of parties at this momentous juncture in our affairs.

I return my thanks to the committee for their kind attention, and beg pardon for having trespassed so much longer upon their time than I had intended.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

SPEECH OF MR. BRONSON, OF NEW YORK.

In House of Representatives, June 27, 1838—The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill providing for an increase of the army of the United States,

Mr. BRONSON addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: the increase of our standing army at any time, and under any circumstances, is a measure that should receive the mort deliberate reflection and anxious consideration. No hastily formed opinions or slight reasons should be relied upon for a step of this kind, and the necessity, as well as sound policy of such a measure, should be quite apparent, in order to justify a vote in its favor. I have endeavored to bring to the consideration of this subject, the most dispationate and patient investigation. I have reflected much upon it, and being satisfied, both of the necessity and policy of this increase, and that it is a measure loudly demanded by every consideration of prudence and policy, I shall give it my support.

I am satisfied that the present force of our army is entirely inadequate for the protection of our extended frontier; that it is too small to render that efficient service to the country which is expected from the army, and most particularly inadequate for the present emergencies.

We are told by the chairman of the Military

Committee, that the present military force as authorized by law, is 7,958, including all the staff departments, and every person in any way attached to the military establishment. The bill which has passed the Senate, and which we now have under consideration, would give an increase of 6,692; making the total 14,650. This, perhaps, would not be too much, according to the estimates of the best authorities; but the amendments proposed to the Senate bill by the committee of this House, reduce the number proposed by the Senate bill to be added to 3,689, which added to the present number of the army, would give a total of 11,647; but I am informed by the chairman of the Military Committee this morning, that that committee have come to the conclusion to recommend an additional regiment, and that an amendment will be offered by him from the Military Committee to that effect, so that if this House shall adopt the amendments proposed by their Military Committee, the result will be as follows:

Present force of the army - - - -	7,958
Additions proposed by Military Committee,	3,689
One new regiment—80 privates to a company, (say) - - - - - - -	940
Total	12,587

Making in all a force of 12,587; and although this amendment does not give as large a force as the Senate bill, yet for the reasons which I will hereafter give, and which are principally founded on the belief that the amendments as proposed by the House committee provide for a better arrangement and organization of this force, and that the lesser number may be rendered more efficient than the larger number proposed by the Senate bill, I prefer the amendments of our committee, although I am not prepared to say that the increase as proposed by the Senate bill, is too large. But, sir, in order to estimate the importance of an increase, and to determine with such accuracy as we may the extent of that increase, it is necessary that we go into an examination of the state of our frontiers, that we look at the condition of the Union, and see whether any and what causes exist, which render this measure necessary. On this point, I beg leave to call the attention of this committee first to the condition of the Western frontier; and when I speak of that frontier, I mean to include only the western frontier proper—beginning at the mouth of the Sabine, and extending along the west bounds of Arkansas and Missouri, and from thence to Fort Snelling on the upper Mississippi, near the falls of St. Anthony. Along the whole line of this frontier the savage tribes of the West are congregated, and not only those who originally inhabited those regions, but also the various tribes which have been removed west of the Mississippi. The removal of the tribes from the east side of the Mississippi, to the west, has been gradually going on year after year, until there are now but few left on this side of that river, excepting the Cherokees, whose removal is now in progress, and a few in Wisconsin, with a remnant of the Seminoles in Florida. The estimated number of Indian warriors now west of the Mississippi, is upwards of 50,000; and when the removals now in progress shall have been completed, there will be, according to the estimates of the head of the Indian department, about 66,000 warriors among all the Indians west of that river; many of them, too, of the most fierce and warlike tribes that ever existed in North America. This, sir, is a most portentous congregation of savage force on our Western frontier; a force which, under any circumstances, would make it the duty of this Government to afford a strong and powerful protection to our border settlers, by means of regular troops. But when we bear in mind the causes of disaffection which exist among these tribes, particularly those who have been removed from this side of the Mississippi, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the danger of a speedy and most bloody Indian war, on that frontier, is imminent in the extreme. Some of the Indians who have been removed, have gone peaceably, and with kindly feelings towards our Government, but with most of them such is not the case: they are brooding over their supposed or real wrongs and injuries; they have been forced across the Mississippi against their will, although in pursuance of treaties entered into by them. I say against their will, because, in most instances, when the time has arrived for them to depart, under these treaties, they have not been ready to go. But the circumstances attending the removal of these tribes I will not advert to, further than to say that their worst passions and prejudices have been aroused, and that the inherent, and almost instinctive, hatred of the white man, which they possess, is increased; and they go to their new homes goaded almost to desperation by their fancied wrongs, and with their feelings of enmity and wrongs whetted and sharpened to a degree that forbids all idea of peace on their part. Sir, there is, at this moment, no sign of peace on that frontier; on the contrary, the indications are of war—of murderous, savage border war. Scarcely a mail or a messenger arrives from that region by which these indications are not confirmed. Hardly a breeze blows from that quarter that does not bear on its wings the rumors of a savage war. In truth, sir, if we are to credit the reports, the war is already declared; the tomahawk is dug up; the scalping knife is whetted; and the war-whoop is sounded. The chiefs and warriors of some of the tribes on the Arkansaw frontier, it is said, have already given notice to the officers of our army there that they intend to go to war with us. They make no concealment of their designs. The question that they will fight is settled; and it only remains to be determined by them when they shall commence; and this point, they say, is to be determined when they assemble for their green-corn dance in July. Sir, every consideration of mercy and duty call loudly for the immediate and prompt display of more military force on that frontier.

And how is it with the Atlantic coast? From the northeast corner of Maine to the mouth of the Sabine, or at least to Florida, there are no troops, or comparatively none. Every fort and every military post on the whole Atlantic coast has been stripped to carry on the war in Florida, and to garrison the Western posts. There are hardly men enough at any post on the whole coast to fire a salute. Many of the posts are entirely abandoned, and fortifications and other public works are going rapidly to decay for the want of sufficient men to keep them in repair. Millions have been expended to construct these fortifications, and unless men are provided to take care of them, dilapidation and decay will render them wholly useless. But, sir, I do not intend to dwell upon this topic. The impolicy of leaving our Atlantic coast in such a defenceless and unprotected state must be apparent; and as my colleague [Mr. KEMBLE] has already dwelt largely upon this point, I shall leave it by merely calling the attention of this committee to the language of the Secretary of War, in his report, on the 5th March, 1838; wherein he says, that "there is not a fortress on our long line of sea defences capable of resisting an armed brig;" that "the works are unfinished, unarmed, and not even men enough to preserve them from dilapidation, or protect them from plunder."

And then, sir, let us turn our attention to the Maine border. Is there no necessity for troops there? The exciting and hitherto unsettled question in relation to the boundary line between Maine and the British provinces would seem to require some force on that frontier. Great Britain has already 5,000 troops along that line, or in the adjoining province. The question of the boundary is still not only unsettled, but daily becoming more troublesome, and the feelings of the inhabitants on both sides of the line becoming more excited. I would refer to the gentlemen from Maine on this floor, and ask them whether they are willing that that frontier should be left in its present unprotected state; whether they see no necessity of troops upon that frontier.

Next, Mr. Chairman, I propose to call your attention to the Northern and Northwestern frontier—to the line separating the Union from Canada, extending from the foot of Lake Superior down through the Lakes and river St. Lawrence, and from thence easterly to the west line of the State of Maine. Along this whole frontier, comprising an extent of nearly two thousand miles, the whole military force had been withdrawn previous to the opening of the present year, with the exception, perhaps, of a very few troops at some of the posts above Detroit. I admit, sir, that the profound state of peace and quiet which reigned along that whole border until within the last few months, might and did justify the withdrawal of the military forces from that line when their services were so imperiously required in Florida and elsewhere. They were withdrawn; and the fortifications, cantonments, and military establishments, along that border, exhibit the inevitable and speedy result of such a state of things. Dilapidation and decay, and, in some instances, almost the utter ruin and destruction of such works, has been the consequence. In the mean time, the British Government has been busily engaged in rebuilding and repairing their military posts on the Canada side, and, although in a state of profound peace, keeping up a very considerable military force. But this has been a subject of no particular alarm to our citizens on that border. Conscious of their own strength, as well as of the rectitude of their conduct towards their Canadian neighbors—hardy and brave, and prompt to repel aggression—they have entertained no fears, nor do they now entertain any doubts, of their ability to protect themselves against any open hostilities from any quarter. Moreover, the business and social relations between the citizens on the different sides of the line were of the most friendly character; their intercourse easy and frequent, almost constant; so much so, that a rupture of these friendly relations was hardly imagined, much less expected. But a sudden change has been wrought. The torch of civil war has been lighted in the Canadas, along the whole of this frontier, and strong efforts have been made to involve our own citizens, and, through them, our country, in these civil disturbances of a neighboring and friendly power. The proximity of our territory to the Canadas, and the easy and frequent intercourse thereby afforded, and the facility with which those disaffected to the present Government in the Canadas can communicate with our citizens, has aided to produce a degree of sympathy, on the part of some of our people, towards the Canadian patriots, not by any means favorable to a strict observance of neutrality. Vast numbers of the Canadian refugees, who have been driven out of Canada during the past winter, are scattered along the frontier, as it is believed, busily engaged in enlisting the sympathies of our own citizens, and exciting them to espouse their cause, and appealing (perhaps, in some instances, not in vain,) to our citizens to redress those flagrant outrages which were committed at Schlosser, and others of a similar but less atrocious character. In the mean time, the frontier citizens on both sides have become much excited; offences, retaliatory in their character, have been committed, and an exasperation of feeling prevails imminently dangerous to the peace of the frontier, and seriously threatening our neutral relations.

Under these circumstances, the presence of United States troops on that frontier is deemed to be indispensably necessary. The military posts should be garrisoned, and effectual measures taken, not only for the due protection of the frontier and our own citizens, but also to maintain our neutrality, enforce our treaty stipulations, and to prevent those disturbances which are likely to occur in the present posture of affairs.

With this view, or to these ends, the inhabitants from that region have called loudly for a regular military force. And I have repeatedly, during the winter, urged the Secretary of War to send troops to that frontier; and so late as the 5th inst. after the affair of the "Robert Peel," and in answer to my renewed request to send troops there, and to an inquiry made by me of the Secretary, whether a regiment could not be withdrawn from the Cherokee country, or Florida, I received an answer, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and from which I beg leave to read the following extract:

Extract of a letter from the SECRETARY OF WAR to ISAAC H. BRONSON, dated June 5th, 1838.

"To remove any part of the forces from the Cherokee country until we know more of the disposition of those people, and ascertain positively whether they will accept of the liberal offers of Government, and remove peaceably to their new homes in the West, might be attended with the most injurious consequences. Nor can the Department consent to withdraw any part of the army destined to protect the inhabitants of Florida, as it is conceived that such a movement would expose that Territory to the depredations of the savages. The accounts from the Western frontier are of a character to render it very desirable to augment our force there; and it cannot, in my opinion, be diminished, in the slightest degree, without danger to the peace of that country. You will perceive, from this statement, that our little army is actively and usefully employed elsewhere, and cannot be withdrawn from its present stations without serious injury to the public service. I am convinced, however, that it is of the last importance to place a complete force upon the Northern and Eastern frontier. The character of the country, and the obligations of the Government to maintain its treaty stipulations, to protect its own citizens, and to execute the laws, all require the presence of a regular force, under the command of prudent and discreet officers. Having these objects in view, and aware of the exigencies of the service, the Department has recommended, most urgently, an increase of the army, and an additional number of regiments."

I am aware, sir, that it is, or may be be said, that these Canada disturbances are drawing to a close; that there is no danger of any further trouble on that frontier; but gentlemen deceive themselves on this subject, if they so believe. If the revolt in the colonies is entirely suppressed, and all further hostilities cease, still many years must elapse, even under the most favorable auspices, before that state of peace and quiet and neighborly feeling can be restored which existed previous to the recent troubles. But I have yet to learn that the present disaffection and struggle for a change of Government, will be suppressed. I know, sir, that Great Britain has poured in her legions of armed men, and almost filled the Canadas with her chosen cohorts; that some fifteen thousand of her choicest troops, aided by twenty-five thousand local militia, are now under arms in those provinces, and that it is expected that this spirit of freedom (or revolt, if you choose to call it so) will speedily be crushed beneath the strong arm of power. Smothered, for a time, it may be; but, unless I greatly mistake the nature of that spirit, it cannot be crushed and destroyed. The maxim, that "revolutions do not go backward," is not an idle saying. There is truth and history in it. Why should we suppose that this maxim will be falsified in this particular instance? The inhabitants of the upper province particularly, are an intelligent and worthy people, reputed to be brave and persevering, and capable of appreciating and enjoying a free government. They claim to be actuated by a love of liberty, and a desire for free government, and to be struggling against oppression. But, sir, as to the merits of the quarrel, I have nothing to say, because that is not necessary to the argument. It is sufficient for us to know that such a contest was commenced, and is going on, in a neighboring country; and knowing that, we know that the experience of latter times forbids the idea that people engaged in such a cause can be completely conquered or crushed. The march of civil liberty and free government, particularly on this continent, is not backward; and in the consideration of the present state and future prospects of that frontier, we should be careful not to deceive ourselves with the supposition that all trouble in Canada is at an end. We must take things as they are; and our policy in relation to the protection and garrisoning that frontier, should not be based upon the supposition that all disturbances there are destined to be of short duration. I have already alluded to the proximity of our citizens on the northern frontiers to their Canadian neighbors, and the facility of intercourse, etc. and the great number of refugees along our line, all conspiring to enlist the sympathies, and arouse the kindly feelings of our citizens on the frontier, in behalf of the patriots; and, sir, it would be strange indeed if such sympathies were not aroused in the breasts of our countrymen. They would be less than freemen, less than Republicans, if they could, without one kindly feeling, see a struggle going on, in which they supposed a question of civil liberty and free government was involved. Sir, if they were entirely indifferent to such a contest, they would lack that Republican spirit and principle which attaches men to free government. How was it in the Southern and Southwestern States, when the Texan revolution was in progress? What feeling was excited in behalf of the Texan patriots, particularly in Tennessee, when that struggle was going on?—a contest, too, which was not on their immediate borders, but which was waged hundreds of miles from them, and whose proximity of territory lent no aid to the sympathetic feeling exhibited. The events of that day evince too plainly what feelings our own citizens individually entertain. When such struggles are going on, and they warn us also to what dangerous and improper interference such feelings may lead them in disregarding the rights of a neutral and friendly power. But while I would warn you of the existence of such sympathy, and while I would hope that the citizens of this Republic may never be so dead and stupid as to have lost all feeling and friendly regard for those who may be struggling for free Government, yet, sir, I should most deeply deplore any, the slightest, interference on their part, either in word or deed, which would be inconsistent with our neutral obligations. On this point I trust that I shall not be misunderstood. Our treaty stipulations and neutral obligations to neighboring and friendly powers, are not only some of the most sacred laws of the land, but the strict observance and enforcement of them are among our highest duties, both nationally and individually; and no considerations of sympathy, or respect for abstract rights or free principles, should for a moment tolerate or excuse a few of our citizens, in the violation of duties so plain, and obligations so imperative; and when it is borne in mind that their violation is not only an act of such manifest wrong to a neighboring friendly nation, but tends so directly to involve our whole country in all the horrors of war, the severity of censure and condemnation can hardly be too strong against those who would thus foolishly and recklessly endanger the peace and happiness of their own countrymen. To possess such feelings of sympathy is one thing; but to express them by improper overt acts of interference is another, for which I would offer no apology or excuse. I am aware that, under the present excited state of feeling on the frontier, a cool, judicious course of conduct may be difficult with some, but I trust and believe that with the great mass of our citizens it will not be found so. I have confidence to believe that a high sense of national and individual justice will actuate them, and that they will be as ready to aid the arm of the General Government in enforcing our neutral obligations, as I know they will be in repelling invasion, or protecting our own honor if necessary.

I have thus sketched briefly the state of our frontiers, but I have not adverted to the northern part of the Territory of Wisconsin, and to the necessity of keeping up some military force in that Territory, particularly at Forts Winnebago and Howard, and at some point on Lake Superior, near Fond du Lac. A large number of Indians still remain in that Territory north of the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, and a force is considered indispensably necessary at those forts, as well as on Lake Superior.

I now propose to show what amount of force is considered necessary for the efficient protection of our extended frontier; what number of troops is supposed to be needful for a peace establishment, and to guard and protect all the various interests of the Republic; and on this point, I must necessarily rely upon the opinions of military men and others, who have bestowed much reflection on these subjects, and who, from their great experience and peculiar position, are supposed to know, or ought to know, best, and to give the most satisfactory opinion; and in going over this ground, I will avoid, as much as possible, the details mentioned by the chairman of the Military Committee, though I must necessarily advert to them, and to some of them particularly where he did not mention some facts in relation to them, which I conceive important.

In the first place, we have the recommendation of the Secretary of War, in the documents annexed to his last annual report, showing what number of troops he deems necessary for a peace establishment in the present state of the country, and amounting, in all, to 14,240, viz:

For the forts on the Atlantic, erected, in course of erection, and repairing	2,300
For works projected	1,565
For Western frontier proper	5,600
In Wisconsin, at Forts Howard and Winnebago, and at Prairie du Chien	1,000
For Canadian frontier, from Hancock barracks, Maine, to Fort Brady, at the Sault St. Mary	900
	11,365
At points requiring protection along the Atlantic coast	2,875
	14,240

In this calculation, however, it will be observed that only 5,600 men are assigned to the Western frontier, (which is a much lower estimate than is made by any other person) and only 900 for the whole Canada frontier, which, at the present time, is altogether too small, though, at the time the report was made on the 5th of December last, it might have been deemed sufficient. The item of 2,875 for other points on the Atlantic, however, I do not deem necessary; so that on the whole, perhaps, the aggregate is sufficiently large.

General Scott's estimate, made on the 19th of November last, as contained in his letter of that date in Doc. No. 199, is as follows:

For the Atlantic coast, including Baton Rouge at the south, and Hancock barracks at the north	7 regiments.
For Fort Brady, Fort Mackinaw, Fort Howard, and Fort Winnebago	1 regiment.
For western frontier	8 regiments.
Making, in all	16 regiments.

Which, estimating 80 privates to a company (as he does) with the usual quantum of officers, would make a force, in all, of about 15,500. But in this estimate, it will be perceived that the Northern or Canada frontier is entirely omitted, with the exception of Fort Brady and Fort Mackinaw; and the letter was written before any of the recent disturbances in the Canadas had taken place. But still General Scott proceeds, in that letter, to give an estimate of a provisional army for that frontier, and remarks, that "taking the peace establishment numbers as before, additional companies will be required as follows, viz:

At Fort Brady	1
At Fort Mackinaw	1
At Fort Gratiot, foot of Lake Huron	2
At Detroit	6
At Fort Niagara	2

companies, or about 3,800 troops in the aggregate for that frontier—a number too large, in my opinion; but even reducing it one-half would give an aggregate of 17,400 for the whole army: and in this estimate it will be seen that Gen. Scott assigns 8 regiments, or nearly 8,000 men, to the Western frontier.

I will now advert to opinions of other military men, as to the force necessary for the Western frontier alone.

General Atkinson, under date of 22d August last, (document 276,) says:

For the protection of the Lake country, including Green Bay and Fort Winnebago, I should assign one regiment of infantry (1,000 men)	1,000
For posts on the Upper Mississippi, one regiment of infantry and two troops of dragoons	1,200
For posts on the Missouri river, and intermediate posts on the Osage or Neosho river, one regiment of infantry and eight troops of dragoons	1,800
For Arkansas and Red river frontier, one regiment of infantry and six troops of dragoons	1,600
For posts on the Red river and Sabine river, two regiments of infantry and four troops of dragoons	2,400
Making	8,000

This would give, for the Western frontier proper, about 7,000.

In the document last alluded to, (No. 276,) Mr. Dougherty, the Indian agent at Fort Leavenworth, expresses his opinion that 6,000 troops are necessary for the defence of the Western frontier proper.

Col. Kearney, of the dragoons, in the same document, under date of June 20, 1837, estimates the necessary force for the protection of the Western frontier at 4 regiments of infantry and three of dragoons, or about 7,000 men; but in this I do not understand him to include the posts on the Upper Mississippi.

General Gaines says, under date of August 17, 1837, (vide same document:)

"I am decidedly of opinion that, in addition to the posts and garrisons already placed on the frontier between the mouth of the Sabine and Missouri rivers, inclusively, there should be held ready for action a dispesable force of six thousand men."

The amount of force already there at that date I am not able to state, but I conclude it could not have been short of two or three thousand. Subsequently, under date of February 28, 1838, (Doc. No. 311,) General Gaines recommends a force of 8,910 men for that frontier.

General Gratiot (vide Doc. 59) estimates the force necessary for the protection of the Western frontier at 12,910, and General Cross, Acting Quartermaster General, estimates it at 7,000 men.

I might give the opinions of many other distinguished gentlemen on these points, but enough, I trust, is shown by those already quoted. They are the opinions of gentlemen who are well acquainted with the subject, and entitled to the most respectful consideration; and, from all these, it is quite evident that the lowest number of troops requisite for the protection of the Western frontier would be 6,000, or upwards. For the Atlantic coast, I will take the estimate of the chairman of the Military Committee, which is 3,400, and which is the lowest estimate, and some 1,500 below the Secretary of War; and then, if we allow three regiments, of 1,000 each, for the whole Northern or Canada frontier, including Maine, and including the forts in Wisconsin, which is a very low estimate, and we shall have a force of 12,400, which is just about the amount to which the army will be increased by adopting the propositions now before us, and including the new regiment to be reported by the Military Committee; and all this is without any estimate for, or reference to, Florida or the Cherokee country; where, I believe, upwards of 4,000 troops are now employed, and where, in any event, considerable force will yet be required for some time to come. I know it is said that the Florida war is nearly ended; but, sir, it is not yet ended, and will not be while a single Seminole or Mickasuky remains in the everglades of that peninsula.

It must be evident, therefore, that a force of from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand is not only indispensably necessary, but is the lowest possible number of which our military establishment should consist, if it is intended to afford by it any thing like adequate protection to the country. Without an increase of the army, it seems inevitable that we must resort to volunteers and militia, not temporarily merely, and for emergencies, but for a permanent standing force.

Within the last six years, no less than forty-three thousand eight hundred and eighty-five volunteers and militia have been employed at different times, and for different periods, in the service of the United States, as appears by rolls of the Pay Department. The average would be upwards of seven thousand per annum; and I think, from a careful examination of the documents showing this fact, that it may be safely stated that the number for the whole of that time has been equivalent to four thousand constantly in service; though much of the time during the Florida war the number has been much higher than that. Is there any probability that for the next five or six years we shall want less military force than we have for the last six years? Are there indications of a state of such profound quiet as to warrant such a belief? On the contrary, sir, is it not evident that in all reasonable probability we shall require a greater military force? I have already alluded to the situation of our Northern and Western frontiers particularly, and it seems to me that no man can shut his eyes to the necessity of a considerable and speedy augmentation of force on those frontiers. I will not institute a comparison as to the relative efficiency of volunteers and regular troops. If we are to have a standing army, it should be such a one, in point of numbers, as the interests of the country and the exigencies of the public service require, and such a one as to obviate the necessity of constantly calling, and almost permanently keeping, in the service the militia of the country or volunteers, which is alike detrimental to the productive industry of the country, and ruinous to the National Treasury.

If an increase of the regular army is necessary to enable the General Government to keep a national police to enforce its treaty stipulations and obligations, and, above all, to afford that protection and security to its own citizens, which is the first object and highest duty of all Governments, then such increase must take place, without reference to the question of expense, or without stopping to inquire how much may be the cost; but, as I have shown that either such an increase is necessary, or that we must resort to the volunteer system, I deem it, therefore, not improper to call the attention of the committee to the relative expense of volunteers, militia, and regular troops, and to the vast disparity in the cost of maintaining volunteers and regulars.

By a report from the War Department (Doc. No. 271,) in answer to a resolution of this House at this session, it will be seen that the expense of a company of volunteers, not mounted, is about double that of an infantry company in the regular service, under all circumstances; but if the volunteers are mounted, as most of them are, the difference is still greater, and is, in fact, nearly six to one.

The following extract from Gen. Towson's letter to the Secretary of War, in the report above alluded to, exhibits this matter very clearly, and I beg the especial attention of members to this extract; which is as follows:

"Mounted volunteers or militia are not wanted to supply the place of dragoons or cavalry: they are armed as infantry or riflemen, and, in battle, act on foot as infantry. Horses for such troops are unnecessary; and so far from facilitating the movements of an army, they retard and embarrass it, especially in unsettled countries, where the forage must be transported in wagons, and the roads opened by troops. Notwithstanding this most serious inconvenience, three-fourths of the volunteers that have served in Indian wars have been mounted; and, to form a proper estimate of the relative expense of such troops, the comparison should be made with the United States infantry, to which the proportion is as 14,570 76 to 2,590, or very near six to one.

This enormous disparity in the expenses of the two forces is not owing to the extravagant allowances made to volunteers; for, except in the article of clothing, they are not better paid than regular troops, and altogether insufficiently compensated to reimburse them for the pecuniary sacrifices they make in leaving home and employment, to say nothing of the danger and hardships they encounter. It is caused, principally, by expenses for travelling to and from the place where the services of volunteers and militia are required; to the hire, maintenance, and indemnity for horses; and to furnishing them a full supply of clothing as a bounty, without regard to length of service. The statements also show the expense of volunteers serving on foot, and of militia. The term of service of the latter never exceeds three months, unless specially provided for.

There is one comparison that would place the contrast between the expenses of regular and irregular troops in a much stronger light, if I had the data to enable me to state it in figures; and that is, the comparative loss and destruction of military stores and public property by the two forces. The immense importance attached to this subject by European Governments as a principal means of sustaining war, has led to the most rigid economy, and the strictest accountability in every thing connected with the materiel of an army. We have profited by their experience; and it is probable a more perfect system of accountability is no where to be found than in our little army; but it requires the study of years to understand, and the exercise of martial law to enforce it. This cannot be expected of irregular troops, that serve at most but a few months. As volunteers are frequently relieved, and their places supplied by others, it requires a large number to keep up a moderate force in the field. This increases in proportion not only the travelling and clothing expenses, but adds greatly to the pension list.

"There is another subject which I would respectfully suggest should be considered in connection with the employment of volunteers; and that is, the great inconvenience to which it subjects that useful class of citizens, the heavy tax imposed on their patriotism, and the loss the country sustains by diverting labor from its proper object, and turning producers into consumers.

Respectfully,
Your obedient servant.
N. TOWSON,
Paymaster General."

Hon. JOEL R. POINSETT.
Secretary of War.

So far, therefore, as expense is concerned, every consideration of economy would indicate the impropriety of employing volunteers. This has been one of the causes of the enormous expenditures of the Florida War. In March, 1836, the Executive called upon Congress for an increase of the regular army, to enable him to avoid the expense and difficulties which have occured in the volunteer system. Congress, however, refused to increase the army, but passed the act of 23d May, 1836, authorizing the employment of 10,000 volunteers.

Volunteers were accordingly employed, and it may not be irrelevant to trace, for a moment, the history of their employment and service in Florida, for a little more than two years past, and see how army after army has been marched into and out of Florida, at the most frightful expense, and with comparatively small results.

1st. In January, 1836, when the news of Dade's massacre reached New Orleans, General Gaines raised a corps of volunteers, and, united with a few regulars, marched them from Louisiana to Florida, where they served till the ensuing May, when they were marched back to their homes and discharged.

2d. In the month of February, of that year, an army of militia and volunteers, about 3,000 strong, was organized by General Scott, in South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama, and marched to Florida, where they served about sixty days, and were then marched back and discharged.

3d. In June following, Governor Call undertook a "summer campaign," and a brigade of mounted volunteers was organized in Tennessee, and put in march towards Florida. As his appeal to the people of Florida for an auxiliary force proved unavailing, the summer campaign was abandoned, and the Tennessee brigade halted for a while in the Creek country. It entered Florida late in September, and its term of service expired in December, when it took up the line of march on its return to Tennessee, in the midst of the campaign then in progress under the chief command of General Jesup.

4th. This departure of the Tennessee brigade imposed upon General Jesup the necessity of calling upon Georgia and Alabama for another contribution, and, accordingly, a corps of volunteers was organized in each of those States, and marched from thence to Florida, where they served until May, 1837, when they likewise took up their line of return march to their homes after a little more than three months' service.

5th. Next came the preparations for the campaign of the past winter, in which a very large volunteer force was drawn from Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Missouri.

From this brief retrospect of the last two years, it will be seen that five volunteer armies have, during that time, been organized and marched from distant points to Florida to serve for short periods, and then to march back again to their homes. The nature of the country and climate is such that no military operations can be carried on there in the summer, consequently these levies have generally been only for short periods, and during that part of the season when the war could be prosecuted.

The expenses of militia and volunteers, by the act of 20th April, 1818, commence the moment they leave their homes, and while marching to the place of rendezvous, and continue till they are marched back again to their homes. Sir, it is no cause of wonder that the expenses of that war, under this state of things, have been so enormous; and it is believed by some that one half of the expenses of that war have resulted from this volunteer system, forced upon the Executive by the act of Congress above referred to, which, instead of providing him with regular troops, compelled him to resort to the employment of volunteers and militia.

General Towson, in the extract above quoted, alludes to the great importance of a rigid economy and accountability in relation to the military stores and MATERIEL of an army, and of the great difficulty of infusing that spirit of economy in raw and irregular troops. As germane to this point, and to show the profuseness and extravagance which is likely to prevail with such troops, I will read an extract, or a few of the items, from an account against the United States, a copy of which, among one or two others in my possession, are certified by the Acting Quartermaster General to be "true copies of originals in the hands of Col. H. Stone, Quartermaster, to whom they were presented for payment, and that they are retained as fair samples of the kind of expenditures incurred by volunteers and militia."

The items to which I refer, are as follows, viz:

1 basket of Champagne Wine	-	$28 00
4 boxes Champagne Cider, at $6	-	24 00
1 keg Newark Cider	- -	10 00
1 bbl. Cognac Brandy, 40 gallons at $2 and barrel	- - -	81 75

1 bbl. Malaga Wine, 32 gall's, at $1 25,	40	00
6 quarter boxes best Cigars, at $6 -	36	00
½ box honey-dew Tobacco, 64 lbs. at $1,	64	00
120 bottles of Porter, at 40 cents -	48	00
1 bbl. Claret Wine - - -	38	00
½ dozen Cologne Water - -	3	00

The account was incurred by a corps of the Alabama militia, who were called into the service of the United States; and at the foot of the account, the quartermaster of the corps certified that the above account is true and correct, and that the articles were purchased agreeably to his order for the service of the United States; and then, at the foot of that, the commanding general of the division certifies that "the above account is true and correct." [Here a number of gentlemen asked, "Who is it signed by? whose name is to it?" and Mr. B. handed it to them for examination.] It is not material to the argument what particular person signed this account, or for what corps the articles were purchased; the account is open to the inspection of any gentleman who chooses to examine it. The object in exhibiting it is not to reflect upon the officers or the corps who incurred it, but to show the laxity that prevails among such kind of troops in the matter of economy, and as a sample of the kind of expenditures incurred by them. This account was not paid, however, by the department.

But, sir, should any gentleman entertain any doubt on the subject of the greatly enhanced expense of militia or volunteers over regular troops, I would refer him to the document on that subject, (No. 271) where the details are given, and the expenses of the different corps minutely compared.

In any light in which we can view this subject, the proposed increase of the army, as recommended by the Military Committee of this House, and which, with the additional regiment, will bring up the army to about 12,500, is not only an increase which is rendered necessary by every proper consideration of expediency, policy, and economy, but, in the present condition of the country, seems to be unavoidable, and is the lowest possible number which can be considered sufficient for the proper protection of our frontiers; and the additional regiment is particularly necessary, at the present time, in order to enable the Secretary of War to organize a force on the Northern frontier. At present the force on that frontier consists mainly of new recruits, not regularly attached to any regiment, and the skeleton companies to which they should be attached are mostly in the South or Southwest. I believe only one or two regular companies are now on the northern lines; but, by authorizing a new regiment to be raised, the Secretary can at once cause it to be organized on that frontier, and fill it up, almost immediately, with the men now there; and without disturbing the present forces in the South and West; and this, among other reasons, induces me to prefer the bill as amended by the committee of this House, to the one which came from the Senate.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot imagine any reasonable or plausible objections which can be urged against this increase, unless it may be the old and oft-repeated warning of the dangers of a standing army—a warning, sir, to which I would give as much heed as any other man; but that point is not now involved in the question under consideration, and I do not propose to discuss it farther than to say that the policy and propriety of keeping up a small standing army has been long admitted and settled, and the measure is one which has for a long time received the sanction of the people, and which is universally conceded to be necessary; and, as to the dangers to be apprehended from such an increase as the one now proposed, I have only to remark, that I think gentlemen must be laboring under a very unnecessary alarm, if they have the slightest fears that the liberties of fifteen millions of people—free, brave, and intelligent, as the people of this Union are—can be endangered by a standing army of less than 15,000 men, and that army scattered along or around a frontier of upwards of 8,000 miles in extent.

I had intended to discuss more at large the merits of some of the details of the bill now before us; but time presses, and I will only allude to two or three of the most important and deserving of consideration.

This bill allows cavalry pay, which is the highest grade of pay, to all the staff officers of the army who are not already entitled to it, and particularly to all those who are to be appointed by this law; and, if I correctly understand, every officer of the staff department will be entitled to cavalry pay if this bill becomes a law, but no provision is made for the officers of the line; their pay is to remain the same. Now, sir, this is an invidious distinction, and one that ought never to be made, and, in my opinion, extremely unjust towards the officers of the line. If any increase of pay takes place, it should be to them first. They, sir, are the working men, (if I may so term them,) at all events the fighting men, of the army. It is your line officers who are exposed to all the dangers of field service, and to all the privations and hardships of a military life; one year, perhaps, stationed on the Northern boundary of Maine; the next, transferred to the swamps and sickly climate of Florida; then watching the Indian on the Western frontier of Arkansas; and anon cooled off, perhaps, by a winter's residence at Green Bay. And it is your officers of the line, too, who, on many a well-fought field, have borne their country's flag to victory, and who have, on all occasions, exhibited a devotion and zeal for the service of their country, seldom equalled, and never surpassed. But they need no eulogium from me. They are known to be brave and meritorious; and it will be found, on examination, that their present pay (particularly for those who have families) is hardly sufficient for their ordinary support. It was fixed as long ago, I believe, as 1802 and, with some slight exceptions, remains now as then fixed; while, in the mean time, the expenses of living and the cost of almost every article necessary to their comfortable subsistence, have nearly doubled. It would be most gross and manifest injustice, then, to raise the pay of other officers whose duties are not so arduous or so dangerous, and omit the officers of the line. My colleague [Mr. KEMBLE] has already laid upon the table an amendment calculated to remedy this defect in the bill, and I trust that it will receive the hearty concarrence of the House.

The 15th section, Mr. Chairman, provides that officers of the line shall not be detached from their proper duties to serve in the Indian or pay departments, or on engineer duty. In other words, that they shall not be taken from the line for extra duty. This is, no doubt, an excellent provision, and will tend to remedy one of the evils that has of late years very much weakened the efficiency of the army; but I find a proviso tacked to the end of that section, which, in my opinion, will defeat the whole object of the section; and that proviso is, that when officers of the line are now detached on such extra duty, they may be continued in such employment until they can conveniently be spared therefrom, or until they can leave it without detriment to the public service. Now, sir, you may depend that the convenient time for these men to return to their duties in the line will never arrive, under this proviso, and the result will be that, by one excuse and another, they will remain as now employed, and the real service of the army will continue to suffer as it has done. This proviso should be stricken out, or at least so modified as to state some precise period beyond which they should not be continued on such extra duty.

There are also other details of this bill equally interesting and important, which I had intended to discuss, but I have already occupied much more of the time of this committee than I had intended; and the mass of other business yet before the House to be acted upon within the very few days that yet remain to us of the present session, admonishes me that I ought not further to trespass upon their patience at this time.

REMARKS OF MR. SMITH, OF CONNECTICUT,

In Senate, June —, 1838—On the bill to appropriate alternate sections of land to the construction of the New Albany and Mount Carmel Railroad, in the States of Illinois and Indiana.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut said that large sums of the public money, which belonged to all the people of the Union in common, had been appropriated from time to time to construct and build roads, and make improvements, in different States in the Union, which were of a local character, and which belonged to the State in which the improvement was made, though done at the sole expense of the General Government. Mr. S. said it was difficult for him to see from what source Congress derived the power to make these appropriations. He was confident the Constitution conferred no such power; and if it did not, no such power existed. So confident was he that no such authority was vested in Congress, that he was very unwilling to attempt to exercise it, and had always refused to support any such bill while he had had the honor to be a member of this body; and he felt bound, at all times, to vote against such bills, though he was quite friendly to the projects which were sought to be sustained by appropriations from the public Treasury. If this bill was of that character, he should feel himself bound to oppose it; but this he conceived to be far different, in every aspect in which it could be presented. A company, by the aid, and under the auspices, of the State in which the work was to be done, proposed to build an expensive railroad through the public lands, which have been in market, and offered for sale at the minimum price, more than thirty years, and no purchasers have been found to take them up, or settle upon them. There must be some good reason why these lands have not been sold; there may be different causes for it. One may be, that the lands are not of the first quality; but he was apprehensive that the principal reason was, that the lands were too far from market to come in competition with those which were much nearer market, and at least equal in quality Be it either the one or the other of these causes, or both, the influence which the proposed improvement would have upon these lands would be very great beyond a doubt. The facilities that the railroad would afford in transporting the productions of the country would add greatly to the value of the land, and induce settlers to take them up, and improve them, and without some such improvement, which must be conducted by private enterprise, there would be, perhaps, no more prospect of a sale and settlement of the lands for thirty years to come, than there had been for thirty years past. If this is a just calculation, what then are the lands, without the improvement, worth to the Government? They are literally worth nothing. If individuals owned the land, and could much improve the value by giving a portion of them to some enterprising company to build the road, would it not be just to himself to do so? No one, [Mr. S. said] he apprehended, would doubt it. And is not the Government justifiable in taking the same course to raise the value of the land? If it was not, Mr. S. said he was not able to discover the reason. These lands belong to the people, and whatever the Government does in relation to them, is in behalf of, and for the benefit of, the people, or should be so. Mr. S. said he had no hesitation in saying that if the railroad would raise the lands to the Government price, it would be an excellent bargain to give one half of the lands, for a mile in width, as was proposed by the bill, retaining the other half. The Government would then get the rise on one half within that space, and on the whole beyond that. But is the Government were to receive no other benefit from the railroad than the rise of one half of the land, the half would be worth infinitely more than the whole is in its present condition. There is every reason to believe that the lands to be affected by the improvement, would rise in value to three times the amount of the value of the land which is proposed to be given to the railroad, or to the States, for the improvement. The object of the bill is not to appropriate money, or apply lands, in constructing a road by the Government, but by receiving a fair, full, and adequate compensation for the lands to be conveyed to the State, by the improvement and consequent rise in the remaining land, which would be as well for the Government, as it would be if the Government were to convey to an individual or company an equal moiety of land, in consideration that the grantee would sell the other moiety for the same price that the whole would produce on the sale of

it. The sale of the land through which the road is proposed to be made, is not the only interest which the Government or the people has to advance; indeed, the value of the land has always been considered of but trifling consequence, compared with the important consideration of settling and peopling it. The nation is yet in its infancy; but a very small portion of the public domain is yet settled or cultivated. To cause the new lands to be settled with a virtuous and industrious people, is an object of the first magnitude. Will any one doubt but this bill has that tendency? All will agree that it is vastly more important, and the nation would be a greater gainer by giving away all the public lands, if it would be the means of bringing into the country a wholesome population, than it would be to sell the lands at an extravagant price, if, by that means, a corrupt and base population would follow. Adding to the means, and facilitating transportation, Mr. S. said, in his opinion, would be a very important step in inducing the settlement and cultivation of the new lands with an industrious people. The people could see the manner in which their industry was to be rewarded; the whole country within the vicinity of the road would soon feel its vivifying influence; good and valuable inhabitants would find their way on to the lands; the lands would be highly cultivated; the produce would go to market, the people would grow rich; and the prosperity of the country would be easily traced to the improvement, to which we should contribute by the conveyance of a small portion of our vast uncultivated territory, and which, as it now lies, is, to the nation or individuals, entirely useless, and without any prospect of a better condition. Will it be said that the aid of Congress in this enterprise is sectional, and therefore ought not to be given, because it does not immediately redound to the benefit of all the people in the Union? Be it so; and what does that prove? Why, nothing at all. Erecting light-houses, forts, buoys, breakwaters, &c. may, in the same sense, be said to be sectional, and that such expenditures contribute to the advancement of the interest of but a portion of the people of the Union, and yet, virtually, all are benefitted; and so it is with the present project, for the promotion of which the aid of Congress is invoked.

Any such appropriation as can be made consistently with the powers and duty of Congress, and judiciously applied, though it may not directly advance the interest of but a portion of the people, if it indirectly promote the general interest, it is not unjust to make the application. The most of appropriations made by Congress operate directly partially, but indirectly impartially; and this is necessarily the effect when applied to the various departments of the business of our country; but as the whole constitutes one great interest, in the benefit of which all participate, contributing to one branch, in a greater or less degree, promotes the interest of the whole. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN] opposes the bill for reasons which appear to be wholly unsound. He objects because he is averse to the General Government becoming a partner with individuals in private business or enterprise. Mr. S. said he could not be more hostile to this principle than he was, or would lend a more unwilling hand to aid it; and if the action of Congress, in the support of this bill, required the countenance of any such principle, he was sure it could not have his support. He should be the last man to give countenance or support to such a principle. If this bill brings us within that principle, Mr. S. said he acknowledged himself incapable of discerning its application. What interest does the General Government, by parting with the lands, take in the corporation? None at all. The principal objection which appears to be made to the bill is, that the Government is giving away the lands which belong to the people, and not that the Government is subscribing for stock, and becoming a partner in a private enterprise. The former objection he had endeavored to obviate, and the latter needs no effort of his to remove, because there did not appear to him to be a plausible foundation for it. Mr. S. said he thought he could, without any violation of, but in strict accordance with, his duty, support the bill.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

SPEECH OF MR. HUNTER, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, June 22, 1838—In Committee of the Whole, on the bill to establish an Independent Treasury.

Mr. HUNTER addressed the committee as follows:

It is unfortunate for the country that this measure did not receive the support of some of its present friends when it was first proposed, and when its adoption would perhaps have contributed much towards saving the community from that explosion in the banking system under which it is suffering. Nor is it less to be regretted that many of its original friends should refuse to practice upon their theory, now that experience may be said almost to have verified its truth. But it is not my purpose to make this circumstance the occasion for pointing that moral in relation to the baneful influence of party spirit upon our counsels, which, as I firmly believe, our people must read before they can so reform their institutions as to make their Representatives what they ought to be—the representatives of the wishes and interests of their constituents, and not of the will of a party. Neither shall I remark, sir, upon the singular fact, that the few friends of the present measure who retain their original position, are precisely those who are most denounced by the opponents of this bill. It was Cardinal De Retz, I think, who, after remarking upon the strange inconsistencies of human conduct, and the manner in which they are received in their day, has hazarded the conjecture that the appointment of a horse to the consulship, by Caligula, excited none of the wonder in its time with which it was viewed by posterity. But, Mr. Chairman, I leave it to the historian to state the case as between these parties, and posterity will pass judgment upon it in that spirit of justice and impartiality to which perhaps it would be arrogant in me to pretend. For myself I shall be content if I can vindicate the propriety of my own conduct, without assailing that of others. I am too well aware of the difficulties of my position to be willing to increase them unnecessarily. The history of all great reforms teaches us that they are full of dangers and trials to their projectors and early advocates. The one before us seems to be attended with its full share of difficulties. The friends of the bill are already reeling under the load of denunciation which has been hurled at their heads. The banks, it can scarcely be doubted, have taken the field against the measure with all of their tremendous power and mighty machinery. They have a direct political interest in its fate, which they at least must both know and feel; an interest to be measured by the value of the power to control this Government, so far as its operations can possibly affect them. Connect the Government with the banks by receiving their paper in its dues, and by depositing its funds with them, and they hold the sinews by which it moves. The Government must share in their embarrassments, and as it cannot well move without them, they hold in this connection an effectual security against all change or reform. Nay, more sir: they have thus the power to force the Government to furnish them the means of moving, that it may itself proceed without hindrance from them. We have been lately compelled to lend them our funds, although that very loan imposed upon us the hard necessity of borrowing money to supply the pressing wants of the Government. Whilst this connection exists, they have nothing to do but to make common cause in their delinquencies, and they may commit them with perfect impunity. At such a period, the Governments, both State and Federal, are so far from having the power of forcing them to perform their most obvious duties, that they cannot even collect their own dues from the banks, except upon terms which they may choose to dictate. And why, sir? Because they say, and they may make it so if they will, "any burthen laid upon us will communicate the pressure through our feet to the necks of the whole debtor class of the community upon which we stand." If any man doubts the truth of this picture, let him look through our land to the spectacle of charters violated with impunity, and of promises broken almost without reproach, with an attendant train of sufferings almost as great as if the trace of an invading foe were fresh within our borders. Let him listen to the clamors for a renewal of that very dependence of Government upon banks which is to enable them to re-enact these scenes at their pleasure, and with perfect impunity. Mr. Chairman, if it be true that a political necessity sternly requires of us to renew this dependence of the Government upon banks; if it be true that, like the Siamese twins, they must forever continue to feel the same sympathies, to make the same movements, and to partake, in common, of all the vicissitudes of this life, because any severance of the tie which binds them would be death to both, I may at least be pardoned for looking into the effects of the operations of this Government twin upon the body politic, and for examining the nature of that necessity which binds them together indissolubly and forever. As it seems to be claimed that these banks are indispensable to the people, and that the banks cannot well exist without this connection with Government, it becomes us to examine the truth of these propositions, and to ascertain the nature of the pecuniary and political action of this system upon our people, both with and without this connection, or, in other words, both with and without the bill now under consideration. In conducting this examination I shall endeavor to exercise a spirit of impartial, but of candid and fearless inquiry. I shall not knowingly excite any unjust prejudice against these institutions or their rights; but I shall not be deterred from exposing what I believe to be the evil tendencies of the system, from the fear that the task is unpopular. The time has come when I must speak out what I believe to be the truth, without regard to personal consequences.

The first step in this inquiry, Mr. Chairman, will be to examine the operation of the banks upon the commerce between this and foreign countries, and then to point out the extent to which that operation will be modified by the bill now under consideration.

When we first adopted this banking system, the mighty energies of this country were beginning to develop themselves, and its great want was capital. A new and vast field was opened to human enterprise; its resources, which seemed to be untold, because they were innumerable, afforded all the natural elements of credit. With the capacity to reproduce with interest a vast amount of capital in proportion to our labor, the great object was to invite its investment on our shores. And here, sir, I wish to avoid the confusion of terms by which capital and credit are so often confounded. By capital I mean the accumulated productions of labor, which always constitute, at any one time, a certain amount, to whose sum no human legislation can add. This, if left to the natural laws of trade, will distribute itself between different nations, and between the different classes of productive industry, in proportion as they offer most profit, or pay most interest on its investment; and this process, if Government did not interfere, would go on until all profits attained the same level. This capital is invested upon the faith or credit that it will be reproduced with interest. This credit depends upon the nature of the material and mental agency engaged in the work of reproduction. Nature had given us every thing to establish our credit so as to invite an exchange of capital for it. Unfortunately for us, however, these ideas were confounded, and artificial means were used to disturb the healthy operations of nature. As the field for the profitable employment of capital was greater here than in the older countries of the world, so it was with the natural rates of profit and interest. This, of itself, would have attracted foreign capital to our shores upon terms profitable to both parties, if Government had not attempted to have regulated this branch of trade. By a strange mistake of the inherent difference between capital and credit, our Government seemed to suppose that credit could be transmuted into capital by modifying its form in the shape of a circulating medium. Their real wish was for capital; they saw there was a want of money, and set to work to satisfy that want by increasing the issues of paper having that form. They first fixed the rate of interest by law so far below the natural rate in this country—although it was still above that of older nations—that it almost amounted to a prohibition to the citizens to borrow directly from abroad; and yet they managed, by a circuitous mode, to force upon us the use of foreign capital, at an exorbitant rate of interest, and in a manner which charged with this expense the great mass of the community, whilst a few only enjoyed the peculiar advantages of the loan. Banks were incorporated, with the power to make the money which they were to lend; they were permitted to issue twice or thrice the amount of their capital; and although they were not permitted to charge more than the legal rate of interest upon any one loan, yet the device was created by which they might derive twice or three times that rate of interest upon their capital. The effect of these double laws was to force the greater portion of the demand for capital upon the banks, and this demand was for as much capital as could be employed profitably at the legal rate of interest. The natural demand for capital, of course, was for as much as could be profitably employed at the natural rate of interest, which was always higher than that fixed by law. The natural demand, therefore, was smaller in amount than that thus created by artificial means. As if the vigorous appetite of high and youthful health was not sufficient, we offered unnatural stimulants, that it might be ravenous enough to devour the food which we were about to provide for it, and which otherwise it might have refused. In tracing, then, the operations of our laws regulating the banking system upon our people, this was the first step. There was a difficulty in procuring food enough to satisfy the wants of natural hunger, and we began the task of supplying it, by provoking this appetite to further excesses.

Let us look, now, to the nature of the food which we were preparing for its use. These banks were endowed with the exclusive privilege of issuing paper money, which was received by Government for its dues, whilst all artificial means were used to give it currency. The entire amount of money loaned by the banks beyond their specie capital consisted of their own credit, issued in the form of a circulating medium. Bank credit, in the shape of a circulating medium, was placed on the same footing (so far as Government could make it so,) not only with specie as a currency, but with real capital, inasmuch as no more interest could be charged upon a loan of real capital than upon the loan of this species of credit. The consequence was, that the cheapest currency took the place of the dearer, but better, and the cheaper substitute for capital was used instead of real capital, because the latter could not come into competition with the former upon fair terms; and because those who held the latter, would prefer to invest it in banks, through whose peculiar privileges they might derive more than the legal interest to which they were confined if they had attempted to loan it as individuals The effect of these laws was to force the great portion of the demand for capital by the community upon the banks, where they obtained credit as its substitute, which was received, too, in the shape of currency. Of course, these regulations naturally produced an inflation of the currency, and a rise of prices, not real, but nominal. I have once before endeavored to demonstrate the process by which this expansion of the currency produces a rise in prices, which, reacting again, by increasing the nominal amount of capital demanded by the community, causes another expansion of this bubble of currency until it bursts, and, therefore, I shall not now weary the committee by repeating the view; it is enough for me that we all see how these banks, finding it to their interest to issue as much currency as they can, expand it, without regard to the level of the currencies in other portions of the world. This, then, is the second step in the operation of this system; and here the foreign capitalist, who had been excluded before, except as the stockholder of a bank, comes in to claim his usury under the fiction of price. The money price of his commodities becomes not only higher than its natural price here, but so much higher than the nominal price in other countries having a less inflated currency, that capital laid out abroad in commodities, to be sent here, is more profitable than in any other investment. So long as the foreign merchant sold more than he bought here, it mattered little that he took such of our productions as furnished the raw material for his manufactures at a price enhanced somewhat beyond its real value. The balance of trade was in his favor, and the artificial rise in prices afforded him an enormous interest upon his investment. This balance, if regularly withdrawn as it accrued, would have operated as a check upon the issues of the banks, by producing a run upon them for specie, which is the only money of the whole world. But there are several causes which would always prevent this, for a time at least. In the first place the foreign merchant would not care to withdraw these balances so long as he could keep up his stock in trade by borrowing at home; because the legal rate of interest here, though below its natural standard, was still above that which was paid upon capital borrowed in older countries; and because, too, he would be naturally averse to disturbing a trade which was so profitable to him, by making it, in any avoidable respect, inconvenient to his customer. In addition to this, the expense of withdrawing this capital was something, whilst another cause, also, operated to prevent an early settlement of these balances, which might have checked, gradually, the mischievous effects of this artificial rise in prices. Our Governments, State and Federal, from time to time, have issued large amounts of State stocks, negotiated generally through the banks, and in exchange for their paper. The transfer of this Government credit abroad absorbed a large amount of the debt due upon the balance of trade, and thus its payment in money was avoided by charging posterity with the debt. The banks, too, by this liberal use of State credit, were enabled to continue the process of expansion, and the foreign capitalist was allowed to extend his usurious operations upon this country, under the legal fictions of artificial prices. But notwithstanding this extravagant use of Government credit, through which a mortgage, estimated at $100,000,000, upon the property of the country, is held by foreign capitalists, the day of payment came at last. When it did come, and the money of the world was demanded, it was found that, for any real practical purpose, the pretence of convertibility was a fiction. The banks were unable to meet their engagements. It was impossible to procure specie, which alone answered for remittances abroad, except at the heaviest expense; and we were forced to rely upon the productions and property of the country, at prices reduced to the specie standard, for the payment of the debt thus contracted to foreigners. Upon whom, then, did the loss fal? Why, sir, chiefly upon the producer. The fall of 50 or 100 per cent. in the price of his productions was the rate of usury which he had to pay for money borrowed abroad under the fiction of high prices, and by means, too, which gave no extraordinary benefit to any but the few who enjoyed the banking privilege and received its favors. Trace, Mr. Chairman, the entire circuit of capital as it passes from the bank to the wholesale merchant, thence to the retail dealer, and thence to the consumer, who, not having cash to pay for the articles which he wants, obtains them on the credit of his future productions; and you will find that the great mass of credit rests with the producer, and is to be redeemed out of his future productions. I say the great mass, because the spendthrift class, who live, not upon income, but upon principal, is always comparatively small in any community. Credit is that by which the present use of capital is obtained upon the faith of its reproduction, with interest, and this process, ex vi termini, is conducted by the producer. He thus obtains capital worth to him about the average bank interest, say six per cent.; and, under the process of an artificial state of price, is forced to pay abroad, in the fall of his productions, fifty, and sometimes a hundred per cent. for its use.

It has always been thought the master-stroke of financial policy to lay taxes so as to operate upon consumption. This, however, is a tax laid upon production; and for whose benefit? For the Government? for the people? By no means, sir. The only extraordinary advantages derived by any during the process, is derived by the banks. They alone receive more than legal interest upon their capitals; and when the suspension of specie payment takes place, theirs is not the suffering. If they make common cause their charters are safe, because no Government dares take them away; and, in a pecuniary point of view, their extraordinary profits continue, if they have been conducted with tolerable prudence. If they are not forced to curtail, they derive interest upon more than their capital; and if they do curtail, they buy in the property of their debtors at low prices, which was mortgaged to them for money when it was cheap and prices were high. Nay, sir, there are various means by which they can make this period of suspension their principal harvest, although I hope there are many which have never practised this fraud. They may use their specie, by means of secret agents, to buy in their own paper at a discount; or, if this be thought too dangerous a game, they may transfer their specie funds to distant cities, and, under a pretence of exchange, buy in their own notes, so as to make a profit by their depreciation. If I am correct, then, Mr. Chairman, in these conclusions, this is a system which taxes the entire productive industry of the country for the benefit of the few; and the class upon which this burden falls first and heaviest is the laboring class, for it is an established maxim in political economy, that labor is the last thing to feel a rise in prices, and one of the first affected by their fall.

And this is the system which we must strain every sinew to foster, or we are told that credit and commerce will perish. This is the appetite which we must exhaust the means of Government to gorge, or we are to be called Loco Focos, Agrarians, Levellers, and I know not what else, that is opprobrious. These are the institutions so necessary to the community that we must make our very Government dependent upon them to obtain their good offices. Mr. Chairman, if it be so odious and criminal, as I admit it to be, to take the property of the few to distribute amongst the many, I ask how is it with him who would reverse the proposition, and take the property of the many for the benefit of the few? In times long gone in merry England, it was recorded in the epitaph of Robin Hood, as one of the virtues of this renowned freebooter, that

> "For fifteen years and something more,
> He robbed the rich to feed the poor."

For one, sir, I never admired the sentiment, notwithstanding the excuse to be found for it in the age which gave it birth; but I think I should have admired the eulogy not more, or scarcely as much, if its sentiment had been reversed.

Mr. Chairman, I hold no Government as better than a system of licensed robbery, which does not respect as holy the private rights to property, and which preserves not inviolate its own engagements. For this reason I would encourage no measure whose object was to deny the banks their just rights, or to encourage Government in the violation of the faith which it has plighted to them; but, on the other hand, I will expose what I believe to be the vices of the system, because I would effect, by all legitimate means, a just and temperate reform in these institutions. I will never consent to any system of privileged plunder either in the many or the few; and the banks themselves may at last find more steadfast friends in their just rights, in those whose views of justice extend to all classes of the community, than in those who regard only the claims of a few.

Sir, I have heard but one answer to the view of the banking system, which I have just presented, that seemed to my mind at all plausible. That is an argument which I have not heard within these walls, but which is used by some of the bullionists of the English school These maintain that convertible paper currencies in different countries fluctuate according to the same laws which govern specie, and preserve the same comparative levels. They insist that if currency rose to different levels in different countries, this difference would be shown in the rate of exchange, and the rise in exchange would produce a demand for the conversion of the paper, which would check its issue, and reduce th two currencies to a common level. If this were so, it would be a sufficient answer to my argument, because the foundation would be taken from it.

These persons, Mr. Chairman, mistake fiction for truth, and confound a nominal with a real convertibility. If this paper rested upon an actual deposite, dollar for dollar, of specie, then their position would be true. The value of such paper would depend upon precisely the same laws which regulate that of specie. But they forget that this bank paper rests upon other credit substituted in its place, and that the value of this credit depends upon circumstances entirely different from those which regulate the value of specie, the money of the world. The value of specie depends upon a few circumstances, which are generally the same over the world, whilst that of credit depends upon many circumstances, which vary in different places. Because they sometimes see bank credit equivalent to specie, they forget that many things may occur to make it worth less, or even more. In short, they forget that they must suppose the secret of alchemy to have been discovered, if they believe that a form of credit has been devised, which is precisely equal to specie. There are notorious facts, which, without explanation, or the aid of theory, ought to have shown them the confusion of ideas upon which they are acting. It is known, for instance, and every one admits the fact, that no bank, constituted as ours are, can redeem its bills in specie, if all were presented at once. It is only claimed that they can convert the amount which will probably be offered them at any one time; and this probability has to be determined by conjecture. The amount to be presented for conversion depends confessedly upon accident; and there are no known and general rules by which it can be determined, so as to enable the directors to provide for the emergency. They may provide that their bills shall be ultimately redeemable if they are prudent, but the promise to convert them upon sight gives them a part of their value; and as their ability to do so depends upon circumstances which the community cannot foresee or know, so a thousand accidents may take from the bills of the very best banks this portion of their value; false as well as real alarms, because none of them can stand an extensive run, which may be sometimes produced by accident. Here, then, is one fact, which shows that the values of bank paper nominally convertible, and of specie, depend upon different circumstances, and, therefore, cannot fluctuate according to the same laws. Another fact of the same nature is also familiar to the history of banks. Their paper may be convertible to-day, and inconvertible to-morrow, although nothing can have happened in that time to have changed its real value; and here, sir, I might rest the replication of this answer to my original position; but the subject is one of much importance, and with your permission I will pursue it a little further, to show why it is that this difference in the levels of currencies is not always exhibited by the rate of exchange.

The value of exchange, like that of every thing else, depends upon the relative proportion of demand and supply; and, accordingly, the price will not rise until the demand for it begins to exceed its former proportion to the supply. Now the currency of one country may rise above the level of another; the balance of trade, too, may be against it; and yet, if there be no desire on the part of the creditor to withdraw this balance, the demand for exchange may not increase, and the price, therefore, will not rise. I have before endeavored to explain the reasons which have prevented this desire to transfer the balance due from us; and if I was successful, I have shown why the rate of exchange did not express the full difference between our currencies, because I have shown that the natural demand for it was suppressed, and therefore its real or natural price was diminished. The other branch of the proposition which I undertook to meet, is, in my opinion, equally untrue with that from which I have just passed. It is not true, Mr. Chairman, that a difference in exchange will always produce a demand for the conversion of bank notes. The merchant generally owes the banks, and he will not run upon them if he can avoid it, when he knows that they will return upon him. Abstract considerations of profit do not always govern him in this case, although exchange may be unfavorable to him. A regard to his own interest induces him to forbear with the banks. In addition to this, the gradual rise of prices enables him to charge for the greater part of this loss on exchange to the consumer, especially if that loss be not large. As some confirmation of this theory, permit me to advert to the fact mentioned by Mr. Gallatin in his review of the currency, written in 1830. He informed us then, that for nine years previous to that time, the exchange between this and England had been 2 3-5 per cent. above the true or real par. In other words it was 2 3-5 per cent. above the value of the precious metals with all the costs of transportation, etc. added to them. And yet this produced no such run upon the banks as to reduce the currencies to the same levels. This state of things continued for nine years, and that, too, during the existence of the United States Bank, and at a time so often represented here as the most palmy period of our currency. So much, then, Mr. Chairman, by way of argument, to show that the natural tendencies of our banking system are to expand our currency beyond the levels of those of some older nations. And yet I cannot dismiss this branch of the subject without referring to some remarkable facts which would seem to establish the truth of my conclusions. In examining Mr. Woodbury's report upon the subject of cotton made in 1836, it occurred to me to look into his statement of the average annual prices of that article in the United States and England. I ascertained from that examination that there were two entire years, 1829 and 1831, (and I believe I might have selected others,) during which the English price was considerable less than the price given, with the addition of freight, and other charges to which the article was liable. In 1829, the price in England was eleven and a half cents of our coin, while here the price was ten cents in our money. Add two cents for freight, five per cent. for insurance, commission, and guaranty, and throwing out of consideration the duty which is repaid in drawbacks upon that portion which is manufactured for export, and you have the result, that during this year our merchant lost one cent upon every ten laid out in cotton. In 1831 the result is of the same character, though the loss is not so great. We find, then, that this trade was conducted by our merchants at a loss of ten per cent. or of seven and two-fifths per cent. if you estimate the difference of exchange at two and three-fifths per cent.—a result perhaps only to be accounted for upon the supposition that the American and English currencies were of different value, inasmuch as it is not likely that a losing trade would be steadily carried on by our merchants for so long a period as a year. The fact, however, of the difference of exchange to which I have before referred, as stated by Mr. Gallatin, conclusively establishes the existence of a difference between the value of the two currencies, although, in my opinion, it was not, under the circumstances, a measure of the precise degree of difference. When capital is distributed between the different nations of the earth, and between the different classes of society, according to its natural rate of profit in the employment of each of them; and when the whole world uses one and the same currency, then, and then only, in my opinion, will the rate of exchange be the true measure of the difference of level in currency. Mr. Chairman, when I trace what I believe to be the evil tendencies of this banking system upon the commerce between this and foreign countries, whose currencies approach more nearly the specie standard, I am not deriving my conclusions from mere theory. Remarkable facts, whose existence no one can deny, have led me to these opinions—facts which, as I believe, can only be explained by supposing a drain in the currency, brought about most probably in the mode which I have suggested.

Sir, we have all seen the immense balances accumulating against us in our trade with England. The great sacrifices which our country has made, and is making, to satisfy them, are equally notorious. The English merchant has been the great tax-gatherer amongst us for years, and that, as I believe, flows through the operations of this banking system, which we are called upon to make so many sacrifices to sustain. It is a remarkable fact in the history of power, that when driven from its olden haunts in one shape, it is apt to return under another disguise. When the star of the Roman empire descended in the west, it would have seemed that it had set for ever. Its dominion of force was gone before the fierce approach of the wild barbarians of the north. But the subtle genius of Roman power appeared under a new transformation, and assumed another disguise. It went out in the panoply of the warrior; it reappeared in the habiliments of a priest. It went out sword in hand; it returned with the crucifix. It disappeared with the haughty air of the soldier; but it came again with the lowly mien of the disciple. Its instruments were changed, but its object was the same. It no longer carried fetters for the limbs; but charmed with spells the human mind which became its subject, whilst empire was still its aim. The banner of the cross was borne beyond the furthest flight of the imperial eagle, and the Leos made conquests by their arts, which the Cæsars had never achieved by their arms. There is no saying what might have been the limits of its conquests, if the spirit of the north had not arisen, like a genius of opposing destiny, to dispute its empire over the moral world. But this spirit did arise with the Reformer's wand, with which it claimed, like Ithuriel with his spear, to detect the spells of southern enchantment.

Mr. Chairman, the history of our political and commercial relations with England affords, in my opinion, another remarkable instance of this disposition of power to revisit its old abodes under a new disguise. When Great Britain was no longer able to enforce a tribute from us by her arms, she determined to gather it by her arts, and eminently successful has she been in that attempt. She discovered the secret by which our own banks might be converted into her stampmasters; and keeping her currency below the level of ours, she was able, not only to profit by their expansions and contractions, but almost to produce them at pleasure. So long as she remains the single focus of the credit system of the world, she will centralize its trade, and rule a far more extensive empire by her policy than she ever acquired by her arms. Within the course of a year we have felt the shock of a vast convulsion in our credit system, and we have seen that it was hastened, at least, by the action of the Bank of England upon what were called the American houses in that country. Sir, he has looked but little into the spirit of this age, who does not see that trade is becoming more and more the object of contests between nations, and that these contests are to be decided more by strokes of policy than of arms. For one, I believe that the day is not very far distant, when there will be a struggle between nations as to which shall reduce their currencies by gradual means the nearest to the specie standard. It becomes, then, a question for American statesmen to consider whether they will enter into this line of policy, and be the first or the last to prepare for the contest. But here, sir, I shall be asked if I am for a specie currency, by gentlemen, who at one time maintain that no one is absurd enough to entertain such a proposition, and at another, would have it believed that many of the friends of this bill are secretly in favor of the doctrine, but dare not avow it. Sir, I turn upon these gentlemen to demand of them the meaning of their question. Do they mean to ask, whether we would return suddenly to the specie standard? whether there are any who would at once reduce the obligations made upon the inflated paper standard to a specie settlement? Sir, I have never seen or known the man who advocates such a sudden change in the measure of value—a change which would affect so injuriously the relations between creditor and debtor. It is one of the great objections to the banks, that their operations produce changes in the measure of value, such as no Government would ever dare directly to attempt. It is the very evil which the friends of reform wish to prevent. They cannot mean, therefore, to ask if we entertain this doctrine, which, it is known, is held by none in this country.

What, then, is it that they mean to ask? Do they inquire if there be any one so absurd as to believe that, as an abstract question, a specie currency is the best? If so, I say for one that I maintain the proposition, and am not afraid to avow it. Sir, I say further, that the arguments in favor of the superiority of this standard of value are such as never have been answered, and such as gentlemen do not choose to meet, except by the stale jest of a projected return to black broth and Spartan money. They may evade the issue, but they cannot dispose of the argument by such a jest. The true use of currency is as a measure of value. To be a true measure of value, the proportion of the currency to the material wealth, or to the exchanges, must be uniform between the different nations of the earth, and must also be uniform from time to time. To be a convenient measure of value, currency must be portable; and to be safe, it must be durable. Now, sir, it stands confessed that none but the specie standard has ever come to the first requisite, of uniformity between nation and nation; for it is the only money of the whole world. As between age and age, it is not perfectly uniform; but experience has shown not only that it was near enough for most practical purposes, but that no other money standard has ever approached it in this respect; and so far as durability and portability are concerned, no improvement upon specie has ever been devised except that of the original plan of the Bank of Amsterdam, whose paper represented specie, dollar for dollar. Apply these tests of currency to paper money issued upon any other foundation than its actual equivalent in specie, and it will be found that it cannot stand an examination by any of the true rules of currency, except in its portability—an advantage which, it is shown, can also be given to the specie standard, by the device above mentioned. But gentlemen, not choosing to expose their paper currency to an examination by these tests, would persuade us that it is fixed upon us by necessity, because, as they say, there is not specie enough in the world to answer its purposes of currency. And here permit me to say, sir, they confound the abstract question with the propriety of a present and sudden return to that standard. This consideration of quantity enters a very small way into the consideration of the abstract question. If the world were beginning anew, it would be a matter of no importance whether an ounce or a half ounce of silver was called a dollar. If the quantity of precious metals preserve the uniform proportions to exchanges of which I before spoke, it matters little whether that quantity be small or great. But how do gentlemen ascertain that there is not enough of specie in the world for its currency? This has been reckoned a subject of curious inquiry amongst the learned, and none have ever pretended to do more than give its probable amount, for there are no sufficient data for an accurate calculation. Now, if any one is at liberty to suppose upon this subject, I should say that it was Jacobs; and he tells us, after a very ingenious view of the subject, that the amount of specie, in currency, ornaments, &c. in Europe and America, is equal to 1,000,000,000 of pounds sterling. Of this, all that exists in the shape of ornaments and domestic utensils, constitutes a fund to resort to for currency whenever it may become necessary to do so. Up to the establishment of the Bank of England, there was certainly specie enough for the currency of the world, for it had, in effect, no other; and the mines have not only been open ever since, but are still open, when a demand for the precious metals shall cause a resort to them. Sir, when gentlemen dispose of these arguments, as absurd, by a jest, I take it as a polite intimation that they mean to settle the question by the weight of their own authority. Here, again, with all possible deference, I beg leave to take issue with them even under that form of arbitrament. If the question is to be settled by authority, I venture to place against them such a name as that of George Washington, who distinctly expressed his preference for the specie standard, in his letter to a member of the Maryland Legislature. If that will not do, I will throw in the names of George Mason—said by John Randolph to have been the most sagacious Virginia politician of his day—of John Taylor, of Caroline; of John Randolph himself; of Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina; of William H. Crawford, who, in his currency report of 1820, affirmed that all the experiments of paper money had signally failed; of Albert Gallatin, whose opinions are shown in his review upon currency in 1830; and even of George McDuffie, who said, in his celebrated report upon the United States Bank, that he was far from maintaining, as an abstract question, that a specie currency was not the best. Nay, sir, I might throw in the names of the framers of the Constitution themselves; for we have the authority of Fisher Ames for declaring that they designed this for a hard money Government. If the authority of all of these great names is to be disposed of by that same comprehensive jest, then, sir, I can only say with Parson Adams, that "I would prefer being one of the victims to being the author of such a jest."

If it be true then in the abstract, that specie constitutes the best currency now known to the world, it follows, as a consequence, that any easy and gradual return to it, would be salutary in point of policy. But if a single voice is raised for reform in this particular, the very air resounds with cries of credit! credit! from the friends of the banks, as if there could be no credit without banks constituted precisely like ours. Gentlemen meet any proposition for such a reform with vague generalities about credit, and like the gods of Homer, they veil this their favorite idea in a cloud of words, and bear it from the field of battle, when there seems to be a chance of its coming into contact with reason. For the cause of truth, it would be well, however, if this notion could be stripped of its veil, so as to expose it to a closer scrutiny than they permit us to give it. If this were done, I think they would find that they have have been led into strange mistakes by a confusion of ideas: first, because bank credit, in the form of circulation, is sometimes worth its equivalent is specie, they mistake it for specie; and then because it is sometimes exchanged for capital, they again confound it with this last. In this way, they might carry bank credit through all the transmigrations of Indus, and make it the same with any thing they pleased. They forget that credit, currency and capital are all distinct in their natures, and that you cannot increase the real amount of credit, by changing the currency which is the standard by which it is measured. The first bank in the world, which united the right of lending money, with the power to make this money of their own credit, was that of England, chartered in the reign of William III. Will gentlemen pretend that before this there was nothing like credit known to the world? Was there no credit amid those nations of antiquity, of whose wealth we read so much, both in profane and sacred history? Was there no credit in Holland or England, previous to the time of William? And if there were, then it follows that the ideas of credit and of a specie currency are not incompatible. The difference between those gentlemen and myself, in relation to currency, is this. They would raise the fabric of credit by a variable measure, so that the walls would be thrown out of the perpendicular in the very process of construction, and thus they would tumble before the building was finished; I, on the contrary, would place an invariable standard of measure in the hands of industry and enterprise, so that the fabric should rise in its just proportions and stand when once erected. In a comparison of ideas upon the subject of credit with most gentlemen here, I think it would be found that I would go for even a more liberal use of it than they themselves are willing to allow the world. The difference between us is only as to the standard of measure: they prefer a variable, and I prefer a fixed standard. As the uses and nature of credit and currency are different, so it should be with the laws which regulate them.

I have thus endeavored, Mr. Chairman, to trace the operation of this banking system upon our foreign commerce. If that operation be such as I suppose, it is manifest that any thing which increases its tendency to over-issues and sudden changes in the standard of value, is unwholesome to the community; while, on the other hand, whatever serves gradually to diminish this tendency, must be salutary. That the connection between the Government and the banks seems to increase the tendencies of which I have been speaking, is so clear and so generally admitted, that I need not argue the proposition. The question for present consideration is, whether this bill, which proposes to dissolve the bond, will operate suddenly and harshly, or gently and gradually? If the former will be its operation, I admit that it would be impolitic; if the latter, however, be true of it, then I maintain that it is just and expedient, as a measure of financial policy, inasmuch as it will serve to reduce the circulation of the banks a little nearer to the specie basis.

To measure the probable effects of this bill, we must look to the nature of the bounty which the use of Government credit and funds affords the banks. It endows them in two ways; first, by the use of public money deposited with them, and upon which they trade; and, secondly, it increases the circulation, which they can sustain by producing a Government demand for their paper. Supposing the Government to collect no more money from the people than enough to satisfy its yearly wants, (a state of things which I take it for granted the nation will insist upon, as they ought,) I would estimate the amount at $25,000,000. This I believe to be a liberal allowance; but, as some gentlemen, opposed to this bill, have placed the probable annual revenue at $30,000,000, I am willing to base my calculations upon their estimate. First, then, what will be the loss of the banks in losing the use of the public funds? Supposing the public revenue to be adjusted to the wants of the Government, it is manifest that the average period of deposit in their institutions would of necessity be short. It would be extravagant to suppose, under this state of things, that the collection would be three months ahead of the disbursement; and yet, even upon this supposition, the banks would lose, at an allowance of six per cent. for three months upon $30,000,000, only $450,000, when the ultimate policy of the bill is attained. But it is to be remembered that this bill operates gradually, through the period of six years, so that they would lose only $75,000 in the first year, $150,000 in the next, and so on until the divorce was final. There are in this country about eight hundred banks, with a capital, probably, of $317,000,000. Will it be asserted that this loss would crush, or even seriously injure them? But I believe that the sentiment is now almost universal that this portion of the bounty ought to be taken from them. Let us look, then, to the other feature, and see how far this bill affects their circulation. This circulation is sustained by the demand for it, and this demand has hitherto proceeded from two sources, the Government and the community at large. If we can ascertain the amount of notes which the Government demand will keep afloat, we shall then know the extent to which that circulation will be diminished by this measure. In 1820, our revenue amounted to a little more than $20,000,000. In the celebrated report upon currency, made at that time by Mr. Crawford, he declared that if $5,000,000 were then issued in Treasury notes, receivable for public dues, he was justified in asserting that not a dollar in any other medium would ever reach the public treasury.

If, then, $5,000,000 in currency would have transacted all the Government exchanges when its revenue was $20,000,000, it would follow that $7,500,000 in currency would suffice for this purpose when the revenue amounted to $30,000,000. The proportion of the amount of currency to that of exchanges, public and private, is usually estimated as one to thirty; but as the operations of Government are slower, and for larger amounts, than those of indviduals, they would of course require a greater proportion of currency. When for collection and disbursement we place the Government exchanges at double its revenue, we shall find that Mr. Crawford's estimate allows one-eighth of the exchanges as the amount of currency required for Government purposes, which surely is liberal enough. But attempts have been made to show that under this bill a larger proportion of currency would be required by the Government, inasmuch as, according to their statements, 10,000,000 will be locked up during the year. When the revenues and expenditures are equal, it is absurd to suppose that one-third of the revenue will be constantly in deposit. It is true that the amount locked up will depend much upon the execution of the scheme. If the Secretary discharges his duty judiciously, the collection will probably never be more than $2,000,000 in advance of the disbursement. Recent experience would seem to justify this conclusion. But this is a mere conjectural mode of conducting the inquiry. The data afforded us by Mr. Crawford, whose experience and ability qualified him to judge, furnish us with a principle which will lead us to much more certain results upon this subject. We are justified, then, in believing that the abstraction o the Government demand for bank paper would not diminish that species of circulation more than $7,500,000, when the revenue amounted to $30,000,000. This diminution, it is to be observed, too, operates gradually through the period of six years. The diminution, therefore, for the first year, would be only $1,250,000, $2,500,000 for the second, and so on. Now the circulation of the eight hundred banks amounts, at present, to about $100,003,000, and in 1836 it was more. Is it to be believed that so gradual a diminution of this circulation could be of serious injury to them? All must admit, bank and anti-bank men, that the bank circulation has been excessive. A check, therefore, so gentle as this is likely to prove, ought to be desired by all. But there is a class who object to this bill, because they say its passage will destroy all confidenee in the bank paper, inasmuch as no private individual will take it if the Government refuses to receive it. If this paper has any value, sir, I presume it is indisputable, as a general rule, that individuals will take it at that value so long as it is permited to circulate, and this we neither propose nor have the power to prevent. If it is meant that it will not then be taken at more than its value, or when it has no value, my reply is, that it ought to be so. Government can have no interest in deceiving its citizens as to the value of the commodities which they purchase, or in making them pay more for an article than it is worth. If it be good policy to induce a community to receive a currency of no value, and to circulate it upon mere confidence, why is it that we have no propositions to repeal the laws against counterfeiters? Their paper circulates upon confidence, and upon this principle is as good as any other. I had thought the reason for the law was, that this paper was circulating upon a false confidence reposed in that which was valueless, whilst it ought only to circulate upon a true confidence resting on its real value. As the truth of this confidence is important, it would seem that Government should do nothing to deceive the peodie in regard to it.

In making these efforts, Mr. Chairman, to measure the effects of this bill, I have thrown out of view those calculations which are based upon the supposition of a surplus revenue. So far from being willing to make provision for the annual accumulation of a surplus revenue, it is, in my opinion, one of the great recommendations of the measure, that it will place the stock interests of the country against this mischevious result. We shall have them aiding instead of opposing us in our efforts to keep down this dangerous tendency of our Government. We have seen the corrupting effects of one surplus: he must be mad who desires another. I might have shown the estimate of ten millions to be locked up the vaults of the Treasury was extravagant, even when a surplus is accumulating. Inasmuch as it was made by looking to the statements of the surplus at the end of the last quarter, always greater than any other during that period, because unusual amounts were gathered to discharge the national debt, then being paid off. So much then, for the operation of this bill upon the banks, an operation so moderate, that I should think it my duty, if it passed, to warn the people, that it was far from being any thing like a thorough reform in the system. So far as the general system is concerned, the leading feature of reform in the bill is this: It will relieve the General Government from a dependence upon the banks; and thus the State Legislatures may make such reform as they may think just and temperate, without embarrassing the General Government. The banks, too, in this case, will be more responsible to the people for being independent of the action of the General Government, they can never find in that, either just or unjust excuses and causes of complaint.

Let us now trace the operation of our banking system upon the domestic commerce of the country, with and without this Government connection, or, in other words, with and without this bill.

We find, in our early history, that some of the eastern colonies commenced the system of paper money by Government issues. The effect of this issue, in the colony which commenced it, was to raise the nominal price of commodities, within its borders, beyond that which regulated the sale of property without its limits. The consequence was, that its neighbors were induced to sell their property to its citizens at their enhanced prices, and exchanged it for their obligation to pay according to this false standard. But when pay day arrived, the colony which issued the paper found itself in this predicament: If it paid the debt according to promise, its own citizens would be ruined, because they would pay for more than the consideration for which they made the contract. On the other hand it was impossible to ascertain the real consideration received, as they had no means of measuring the fluctuations of the paper standard by which they promised to pay, and which too was constantly changing; to pay the whole was ruinous to its own citizens. It was impossible to ascertain the precise amount in equity; and accordingly, as the temptation to pay nothing was strong, so I believe it usually resulted in point of fact.

Thus its neighbors were defrauded of the property given in exchange for this paper. When our ancestors came out of the war of the Revolution, experience had given them a just perception of these and many other evils of the paper system; and accordingly they inserted in the new Constitution a provision to prevent the States from issuing bills of credit. The States however evaded this prohibition, by creating banks with the power to issue paper money, upon principles which I have before attempted to explain. If this Government had not connected itself with their operations, the disease would perhaps have cured itself. The natural laws of currency would have operated between the States. That which departed farthest from the specie standard, would have gone in debt for the property of its neighbors, when its price was high, and would have been forced to pay for it when the price was low. The notes which it issued would have circulated in other States, but the property pledged for their redemption would have been that of the State which issued them; so that when the bubble burst-ed by expansion, its neighbors would buy that property at specie prices in payment of the debts contracted to them for their own property sold at paper money prices. One or two shocks of this sort would have developed the nature of the system so plainly, that probably the disease would have cured itself. Instead then of seeing a contest between States, as to which should issue the most paper, as has been the case, we should have seen them contending for the nearest reduction of their paper to the true specie standard. But, unfortunately, the General Government intervened between the disease and its natural remedy. It undertook to receive this paper in payment of public dues; and these banks were made depositories of the public funds when collected, with the privilege of trading upon them. The use of Government credit, thus offered to the banks, operated as a bounty to those States within which public revenue was collected to depreciate their currency. All paper that was nominally convertible, was alike endorsed by Government with the stamp of receivability. And, accordingly, of these States, that which expanded its currency most within the nominal limits would usually enjoy the greater share of this Government credit. When the public funds too were once deposited in these banks, this irregularity was apt to continue even in a period of suspension. For some time even the suspension of specie payments did not prevent their paper from being received. The resolution of 1816, however, required the paper to be convertible before it could be received, but even then we have seen that they continued to enjoy the use of the Government funds upon deposite, which are usually unequally distributed, and upon which debt a long credit is generally given them. These were not the only modes in which this use of Government credit operated as a bounty to the States to depreciate their currency. I think I have demonstrated the truth that paper currencies nominally convertible, may exist, and yet be of unequal value, I have exhibited facts, too, which seem to show that this difference may be considerable notwithstanding the nominal convertibility of both. If so, this use of Government credit operates as a bounty to the States within the reach of foreign trade to depreciate their currency as far as possible within the limits to which I have just referred; because this not only operates as a general diminution of the duties, but may reduce them in the port where this currency circulates below the value paid in the customs in other sections of the country. If duties may be paid in different States under our laws, in currencies of different values, the effect is the same as if the discrimination had been made in the duties themselves. If one or two States should gain this advantage over the others in the beginning, it is very difficult to rectify the inequality afterwards. Foreign trade first concentrates there, and the domestic soon follows it.

The ends, therefore, attained by this bounty, so far from operating as a general good, plainly tend to a common evil; I mean the depreciation of the currency. And how is this bounty distributed between the States? The equitable rule (so far as established by the practice of the Government) for distributing public property, would seem to be the ratio of representation. It occurred to me to look to the actual division of these favors as between my State and New York. The first period to which I looked, was that at which Hamilton repealed, by a Treasury order, that law of the land which required public dues to be paid in specie. Under this left-handed marriage, I found that the Virginia merchant paid his duties in specie, (for we had no banks,) whilst the New York merchant discharged his with bank credit, which was nothing more than his own, being based upon it. In addition to this, a large portion of the Federal revenue was deposited in that city, to be used for purposes of private trade, whilst no such facility was received in Virginia. The effect of this was soon made manifest. According to McPherson's Annals of Commerce, the foreign trade of Virginia and Maryland, out and in, whilst they were colonies, was more than that of New York and New England together, and yet in four years after this connection of Government with the banks, New York exported abroad more than three times as much as Virginia. Of the imports we have no account at this time.

The next period to which I adverted was during the last Administration. I find by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1836, that at one time $10,278,000 were deposited in New York, and only $358,230 in Virginia, so that whilst the representation was as two to one, she shared the use of Government funds about in the proportion of twenty-eight to one. This last disproportion was always great, although, of course, it varied at different times. And the end to be attained by this unequal distribution of the bounty, is the general depreciation of the currency. But, Mr. Chairman, it has been said that we defeat our own ends, if we succeed in showing the strong section that it is profiting by this regulation, at the expense of the weak. It is asked, can you expect them to give up such an advantage? I reply that I should expect it, even if I were to fail in an appeal to their justice and fraternal feeling. I should expect it, because, after all, they have a deeper interest in the just administration of this Government, and in the peace and harmony of the whole, than in any present perversion of its powers to their temporary benefit. In addition to this, the action of the State Governments alone would soon make it their interest to remodel their policy: other States would extend their banking systems, so as to prevent any from enjoying exclusive benefits from so selfish a policy. In defence of their own commerce they would do it; and in the end the shocks in the monetary system would succeed each other so quickly, as to force a general reform. But, Mr. Chairman, if there were no considerations of interest which would induce the different portions of this Confederacy to do justice to each other, I should not fear the result of an appeal to their sense of right alone. The mass of the people, in every section of the Union, are just in their feelings. None of them would deliberately institute and pursue a course of policy by which their brethren were to be injured for their exclusive benefit; and if by accident such a system were adopted, they would themselves be willing amongst the first to abandon it. In such an appeal I should not fear to go before the people of any section of this confederacy; and such is my faith in their justice that if I were to fail, I should still be inclined to think that it was not because they wished to plunder us, but because I had not made out the case to their satisfaction. Long, long, sir, may this spirit of justice remain with our people, for upon that, at last, will rest the surest guaranty, and most efficient protection, for the Union. When the Athenian people rejected, by acclamation, the proposition which Aristides told them was at the same time most expedient, but most unjust, they did themselves more true honor than when covered with all the glory of Marathon and Salamis. Had they continued to have cherished this principle in after times, they would have placed their power and empire upon the surest of all foundations.

Mr. Chairman, nothing but a sense of duty and justice to my constituents, could induce me to offer a view to this House which looked to the Union by sections, because, sir, I should be ashamed to give just ground for even the shade of a suspicion that I would seek through this Government a benefit for my own State at the expense of others, or that I was capable of envying the growth and power of more prosperous portions of the Confederacy. If there were no feeling in my heart to teach me better, I should not dare to make such a proposition, because I and my colleagues all know that Virginia would spurn us upon our return if we were to ask such a boon of injustice. Still less, sir, am I capable of envying the splendid success of other sections of my country. When I look around upon the mighty evidences of the spirit of Northern enterprise, I not only rejoice, but, as an American, I feel proud of them. The tribute which Burke paid to this spirit in its infancy, was just even then; but he had not seen it as he might now see it, in all the freshness of maturing vigor. He had not seen it, as he might now see it, conducting its mighty march through the wilderness to leave civilization in the morning where it rested but the night before, or disturbing the ancient silence of the primeval woods with the panting speed of the flying car. He had not seen it as now, cutting paths for its commerce through the deep foundations of the everlasting hills, or toiling up the mountain summit with the rich presents which the far West sends greeting to the steep Atlantic stream. He had seen it waging successful warfare with difficulties which subdue all feebler races; but he had not seen it as now familiar with every clime, gathering tribute in every sea; and when there was neither turf nor twig to be rendered as the emblem of its seisin, bearing away the frozen fields of the northern seas, to allay the burning thirsts of the line, and to exchange for the fruits of a summer clime. I do see these monuments of their enterprise more useful, if not so enduring, as those of the Pharaohs, and I never see them that the response does not rise from my heart, "macte virtute"—go on and prosper in the cultivation of these and every other manly virtue. But, sir, when I have paid this tribute to Pyrrhus refusing to take his ease at his feast, though rich with all the spoils of the east, I am not to be blamed for turning to render the deeper homage of my heart to the honest poverty of Fabricius. Surely "my own, my native land"—the mother who bore me, may justly claim a share of my regard. When I ask that Virginia shall participate equally in the benefits of the Government, I seek nothing more than her due, for no State has contributed more largely to the common stock of the Union.

But it is said that we cannot carry on commerce in the South under any system of policy, because nature has designed us for another destiny. I shall not now join issue upon this proposition, although I do not see why I might not if I chose. Our people descend from the same stock, our harbors are as fine, our rivers are as deep, and penetrate as far, as those of any other section, and our productions constitute the great mass of exports to foreign countries. But, sir, I do not join issue upon this proposition, because it is enough for me that, if the action of the Government is equal, and trade is left free, it will flow where it is most profitable. Then, sir, if it be profitable to conduct it in our borders, it will flow there; and if it be not, it will remain where it is carried on to more advantage. In either way, the ends of justice will be attained, which is all that I desire. But, Mr. Chairman, we are told not only here, but in another wing of this building, that the common interest and good of the whole require the centralization of business and credit in some one grand city of this Union. A much wiser view, I think, was that of De Tocqueville, the distinguished author of the book upon American Democracy. In his opinion, such a centralization of business and credit is inimical to the success of the experiment which we are making in Republican Government.

Sir, what is the nature of the interest which we are supposed to have in this centralization? Is it pecuniary or political? It is surely not the interest of the whole in a pecuniary point of view. Under this system the Southern producer, instead of sending his products directly abroad, sends them first to New York, and thence to their place of ultimate destination. His commodities are thus charged with an extra freight and commission. The Southern consumer receives his portion of the return cargo by the same circuitous route; he, too, is charged with an extra freight and commission. This process surely is far from being beneficial to the South, if, when trade was free, its portion would go directly out and in. Again, a great portion of the West sells in the South, and is forced to carry this money to the North for the articles which it buys; so that its trade is charged with the expense of this exchange. But it is said that the Western dealer lays this charge upon his commodities, and thus does not suffer by the operation. Be it so, then, for argument's sake; still it results in a loss to the Southern consumer, which would not be for the common interest of the whole, if, when trade is free, the West would buy where it sells, and thus relieve this important branch of business from the expense of exchange. But, in point of fact, Mr. Chairman, it will be found that the West does not escape this expense so entirely as is supposed. Any thing which necessarily tends to raise the price of its productions, diminishes the quantity consumed. It is an established fact, that as prices fall, the consumption increases, like the circles as you descend the cone. As the natural price or cost of production decreases, the consumption extends, the demand becomes more steady, and the producer is more prosperous.

Where, then, is this common benefit? Is it in the centralization of credit? When one city becomes the focus or centre of the whole credit system of the Union, whatever affects it, either by accident or design, affects the whole system. The value of the entire property of the community, depends upon the skill and fidelity with which this city directs the operations of credit. The whole system is under its control, and that system extends over such a range of country, and such a variety of interests, that it is impossible for any degree of human skill, placed at one point, to embrace the whole in its providence, or to manage it efficiently. If, on the contrary, there were several centres of trade and credit in the Union, one system might fall, and yet the others might stand entire to assist and sustain it. The calamity would not be common. As it was, however, under the late centralization of commerce and credit in New York, we have all seen how extensive was its control over the property of the Union. Every bank in the country fell at the approach of the courier who brought the news of the suspension of specie payments in New York, as if he had been the angel of death itself. I think then I have shown, Mr. Chairman, that the benefit of this centralization is not pecuniary. Is it political? Can it be, sir, that it is for the common interest of the Union to place its whole credit and property under the control of any one city, no matter where placed? Ought our people to wish so tremendous a power to be placed in the hands of a few who cannot be responsible to them for its use? Do not those legislators, whom the world calls wise in their own generation, already begin to look more for instructions to the price current, which brings the news of the rise and fall of stocks in New York, than to the opinions and wishes of their constituents? We have seen that no man can propose a reform in the policy of this Government, no matter how essential, but that this awful sheet is waved as a "memento mori," before his eyes, if the measure should happen, in the slightest degree, to diminish the profit or power of these stock interests. Sir, if this connection between Bank and State is permitted to continue much longer, the day is not far distant, when we shall see the course of our Government, like that of trade, regulated by exchange. In taking this view of the case, Mr. Chairman, I by no means design to disregard the just interests, or to disparage the future prospects, of New York. On the contrary, I believe that she has nothing to desire but free trade. It is neither her interest nor ours, that the control of the whole trade and credit system of the Union should be forced by legislation upon her. The concern is too vast for her management; and she would only injure both us and herself in making the attempt. The region of country whose trade and credit, nature has obviously designed for her regulation, is vast enough to to task all of her energies, and to afford them as much exercise as can be healthful. So long as the action of this Government continues equal, she will grow in prosperity. While the mighty Hudson holds his majestic way, he will continue to bear her upon his bosom the rich offerings of the far regions from whence he comes. And so long as the winds of Heaven perform their course from clime to clime, they will waft to her shores commerce with its choicest gifts.

So far, Mr. Chairman, I have been examining the operation of this bill upon the pecuniary interests of the country, and I have endeavored to show that this operation was just and salutary. I come now to the political view of the separation which this bill proposes between the banks and the Government. It is here that some of the strongest arguments in favor of the bill are, in my opinion, to be found, for I feel assured in the conclusion that it is to operate as a purifying reform upon our political institutions.

In the first place, it will relieve the General Government from a dependence upon the State banks. While a connection subsists between the two, no matter how well Government may manage its affairs, yet it will have to share the sufferings and embarrassment of the banks, if they mismanage their concerns. It will be forced to take all the consequences of the errors of the banks, notwithstanding its inability often to have prevented them. Under the old system, it gave the use of its credit and funds, and then if they became embarrassed, it could not withdraw the first, without adding to the distress of the community, nor could it command the other, until it was convenient to the banks to pay them over. Under the proposed change, its funds being in the hands of its own officers, would always be withdrawn for its purposes; and using nothing but specie in its receipts and payments, enough of this medium would be reserved in the hands of the people for the necessary wants of the Government, at all times, and in every state of affairs. In addition to this, it would then be in the power of the State Legislatures to reform, at their own pleasure, these institutions, without embarrassing the General Government.

But there is yet another reform proposed by this bill, which is of still more importance in a political point of view. It takes from the Executive the power of using indirectly the public funds. It takes from him the power of controlling the bank patronage, through their use of Government credit and funds, and of regulating through them the currency, so far, at least, as to alter the standard of value at pleasure. Here is the great difference between this and the other plans which I have seen proposed for collecting and keeping the public revenue. This bill takes from him these tremendous powers, while the others, in effect, bestow them upon him. It is easily demonstrated that any plan which proposes to collect the public dues in bank notes, gives, in effect, to the banks the use of the Government funds and credit; but the proposition has been so clearly demonstrated by others, that I shall not now repeat the argument. If the banks are allowed to use the Government credit and funds, it is easy to perceive that the power of regulating this use will, in effect, rest with the Executive, and thus give him the means of controlling these banks. The power of selecting and discontinuing the banks as public depositories, in most of the schemes, is directly vested in the Executive. And if the attempt were to be made to place it with Congress, it would be found in practice, that he in fact exercised it. Congress not being always in session, and being an unwieldly body, charged with the consideration of many and various subjects, would scarcely ever enter into that examination of details which is necessary for ascertaining the condition of the banks and their mode of performing their contracts. This would be entrusted generally to the Executive, and the continuance of the favors enjoyed by the banks would usually depend upon the course which he might choose to pursue in relation to them. It would almost always be so, for the Executive is at the head of his own party, who usually constitute a majority of Congress, and who would be generally disposed to sustain him in such measures as would enable him to control the banks, and maintain the ascendancy of the party. If he, then, could regulate the use of the Government credit by the banks, the boon would be great enough to give him the control over them—a control which would place both their patronage and the currency at his disposal. Mr. Chairman, the patronage of the eight hundred banks in this country every one can estimate in some degree; it is known to be vast. But he nature of the power of altering the standard of value is one which is not perceived at the first glance. It requires some little reflection to comprehend its extent, and to perceive that it reaches every citizen, and all the property of the community. He, sir, who would fully measure its extent, should turn to the example of England, whese history is, perhaps, more instructive to us than any other. If I were called upon to select the revolution which, of all others since the Norman conquest, had effected the most radical change in the foundations upon which that Government rests, I should pass over at once the wars between the Roses, which always ended in the mere substitution of one king for another; I should pause but a moment upon that contest which carried the first Charles to the block, and raised a subject to his place; and passing over the Restoration, come at once to the period at which William III was elected. In making this choice, I should not be governed by the precedent of electing a monarch by Parliament, or by most of those changes in the organic law which are usually referred to as marking the extent of the revolution. The great, the leading change, which left the deepest impression upon the institutions and destiny of the country, was the establishment of the Bank of England, and its connection with the Government. This, together with the funding system, which was the twin-sister of the Bank, enabled the Government to raise money almost at pleasure, and that too without responsibility. The power over the purse then changed hands, from the Commons to the Bank, and through it to the Ministry. In comparison with this, all previous devices of Governments for debasing the coin were clumsy and useless for the purposes of power. The money of the world being the same, exchange soon told the secret. But the establishment of this Bank, with its paper money, enabled the Government to alter the standard of value, by means so secret and subtle, that after an experience of more than a century, its people scarcely understand them as yet.

The system soon developed itself in its consequences. Before that time England had achieved much, in comparison with the rest of the world, both in arts and arms, as she has done since. She had poured forth her hosts to redeem the holy sepulchre and moistened the sands of Palestine with the blood of her nobles and yeomen; she had marched her armies into the very heart of France, and held a great portion of that kingdom by right of conquest. Under her Tudors she had maintained the balance of power in Europe and protected the Protestant faith. In short, she had laid the foundations of her colonies, her commercial system and her power long before the time of William of Orange; and yet at that day she was not burthened with a national debt. A new era, however, had now taken place. As the first fruits of this system, the civil list of William and the revenue were swelled to more than double those of any of her previous monarchs.

But it was reserved for the younger Pitt to develope the tremendous power of the machinery transmitted by William. It was said of him by John Randolph, that his dialectics had like to have cost England her national existence. Their power was undoubtedly great; but they would never have enabled him to have overwhelmed her in debt, if it had not been for the connection of the Bank of England with the Government, through which he changed the standard of value. Finding that his expensive projects would cost him his place, even with the aid of the funding system, if he called upon the country for the means of executing them, he caused a suspension of specie payments, and debased the currency. Intelligent observers of the time estimated the depreciation at fifty per cent. Prices rose, the people became contented at their imaginary prosperity, little dreaming that their Premier was borrowing money for them at an interest of one hundred per cent. and leaving it to posterity to pay the debt. He increased the national debt during his ministry to £620,000,000* sterling, for which it is almost certain the nation received not more than half the value as a consideration; and yet, upon the resumption of specie payments in 1819, they assumed the obligation to pay the entire amount by the specie standard. Such are the stupendous frauds to which Governments are invited by their connection with banks. Their alliance is so tempting and convenient to power, that I believe nothing could ever have severed our own Government from the banks but that earthquake in the credit system which shook them apart. Sir, if time permitted, I think I could refer to the history of our own country for illustrations of the abuses to which this connection is liable. But he who considers the nature of this power of altering the standard of value will not need illustrations to convince him of the appalling danger of confiding it to the Executive. The question for our solemn consideration is, shall we renew this dangerous connection? For one, I answer, never with my consent.

But gentlemen avoid the consideration of the great principles presented by the bill, by raising objections to the details. They say that this bill will increase the patronage of the Executive. Permit me for a moment, Mr. Chairman, to institute a comparison of the Executive patronage, with and without this connection between Bank and Government. If you pass this bill, and sever the connection, you increase the number of office-holders by nine, and make an addition in the way of salaries by an amount something less than $25,000. This is the whole patronage conferred by the bill. Without the bill, however, and with the connection, you give the Executive the control of eight hundred banks, with all of their patronage, and confer upon him besides the power of altering the standard of value. Can there be a doubt, then, but that, upon this comparison, the balance should be struck in favor of the bill?

I come, now, then, to a second objection which is made to this bill. It is said that the public money will not be so safe in the custody of the Government officers as it will be in the banks. This is a question which we have no means of determining with perfect certainty. It must at last be settled by a calculation of probabilities. If we are to confine ourselves to the single consideration of the quantity lost by actual default in the custody of the different depositories, the facts presented by the industrious research of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, would seem to establish the strong probability that the chances of loss by actual default were less when the funds were in the hands of the public officers than when placed with the banks. He has ascertained, (as appears by his report upon the subject,) that the entire loss of public money in the custody of public officers during forty-nine years, is certainly not one quarter of one per cent. and probably about one-tenth of one per cent. upon the entire sum which passed through their hands; whilst the actual loss of public funds in the banks, for a period of seventeen years only, is nearly three-eighths of one per cent. upon the amount deposited in them.

I confess, sir, that this result was contrary to my previous impressions, which were vague upon this subject. But in examining another matter, I chanced upon a report made by a committee of this House in 1801, which seemed to confirm this view of the case. A committee, of which Mr. Otis was chairman, was charged with the examination into the losses of public revenue in the hands of public officers. The result was, that in six years the entire loss of money received for customs and lost by the default of these officers, was less than one-seventh of one per cent. of the sum collected. It is to be remarked, too, that the period to which the examinations of these two committees were directed, was one during which there was no personal penalty upon defaulting officers. Should this bill pass, which attaches the loss of liberty to this offence in public officers, the chances for their safe-keeping of these funds will be increased, and the comparison will turn still more in their favor. But I beg leave to remind these gentlemen that, under any system of custody, the public revenues must twice pass through the hands of public officers; first in collection, and next in disbursement. I ask them to reflect, too, that after all, it is a question of human agency, in which they have to determine the relative fidelity to their trust of two different sets of agents; the one chosen by Government, and punishable in person as well as in property for a default; the other, selected by the banks, and not visited by these personal penalties in case of the like offence. If there be any candid mind which, after these considerations, shall still decide that the chances for safe-keeping are in favor of banks, I hazard nothing in affirming that it cannot suppose this difference to be great. If so, I put it to that individual to say whether, for the trifling consideration of a little greater loss of public money, he would sacrifice the great advantages which I have endeavored to show would result from this divorce between Bank and State. He could not hesitate; and if he did, I would then demand that he should conduct the whole inquiry upon which this question of loss depends, and not a single branch of it. The true question is this: Will the public loss be more by depositing its fund with its own officers, or by placing them with the banks? In stating this account, we must introduce more items against the bank than the loss by actual default. We must charge them with the loss by the depreciation of the paper in which they pay, and with the pecuniary loss sustained by the community in the expansions and contraction of the currency, which this deposit tends to increase and produce. When the account is thus stated fairly, I think a glance of the eye would determine that there was a large balance against the banks.

I have thus endeavored to meet this objection fairly. But gentlemen must pardon me if I refuse to go into the irrelevant issue which they have raised for popular effect. When they rise upon this bill to clamor against the union of the sword and purse in the hands of the Executive, I must take leave to tell them that they speak to an issue not made in the case. Let them make their case,

* It is worthy of remark, that the interest upon the whole addition made to the national debt of France, during the entire reign of Napoleon, up to 1814, and whilst that country had a specie currency, amounted only to £160,000. With a specie currency, France encountered a world in arms for this long period; and yet she made only this small addition to her national debt; an amount not to be compared with that contracted by her great rival under the paper system.

and I will be as ready as any to decide upon it. The difference between the separation proposed by this bill, and the connection between Bank and State for which they clamor, is this: The bill proposes, whilst it leaves the custody of the revenues in the hands of the public officers, to take from the Executive the power of using these funds. The connection which they espouse, not only leaves the public purse in the hands of Executive officers whilst it is collecting and disbursing, but, as I have before attempted to show, gives the President the means of using these funds through the banks for purposes of patronage. There is but one way in which this question of the union between the purse and sword can be fairly and practically raised: that is, by submitting a proposition to place the Secretary of the Treasury under the control of Congress. So long as he is treated as an Executive officer, the President may exercise, through him, a control over the custody of the Federal revenues. When gentleman make this proposition, I shall then think that they wish to raise this issue; but until then, I must suppose that their declamation is designed merely for effect.

But, sir, another objection is urged against this bill, which, if founded in truth, would be conclusive to my mind against it. With great felicity of imagination, some have converted the unpromising materials of this bill into a Treasury bank, with all its forms of horror. They say it is a law for a Treasury bank of circulation and discount. When I ask them for the feature which makes it so, they point to the power left with the Secretary to draw upon the depositories for transfer and disbursement. If this be so, then I reply that gentlemen will have a Treasury bank when they defeat this bill, for these powers exist, and to a great extent, under the law organizing the Treasury Department. I go farther, sir, and maintain that, if this inference be true, then the Government cannot proceed without such a bank; for it is obvious that unless the Secretary could transfer money by warrant from one point to another, and draw upon the funds when deposited for disbursement, he would be forced to keep the public treasure himself, and either go to every public creditor with it, or force them to come to him. Every man in the community would view such a provision as preposterous. But if it be admitted that no such Treasury Bank has existed heretofore, then I maintain that if these powers, vested in the Secretary from the institution of the Government up to this period, have not produced a Treasury Bank, it is not likely that one should arise under this bill, which limits these powers. And this brings me to the nature of this limitation. In conducting this comparison between the chances of perverting these powers to such purposes under the law organizing the Treasury Department and under this bill, I beg leave to premise that the place of deposite is nothing to this question, inasmuch as they may be abused as well when the funds are deposited in banks as in the hands of public officers. First, then, let us look to the relative chances for perverting them to the purposes of a Government circulation. Under the old law, Alexander Hamilton claimed the power* "to issue Treasury drafts, receivable at the several custom houses, and in anticipation of the duties." From thence he argued to the conclusion, that he might receive bank notes issued upon a specie fund, and did receive such notes, notwithstanding the law, which required gold and silver to be paid. Nay, we have lately seen, under this law, drafts drawn upon public funds in banks, and made so receivable. In short, there is under this law no limitation as to the time of payment, or presentment, of their drafts. By the bill, on the contrary, the Secretary is required to make provision for the speedy presentation of these drafts; and the holder is notified that unless he complies with these provisions, the place of payment may be changed. Under this law, the Secretary could not issue drafts which would circulate without a violation of law: because no draft can answer the purposes of circulation, which requires a speedy presentation for payment. Upon this point, to satisfy all qualms, I would be willing to vote for a provision specifying the time within which such drafts must be paid, although I do not deem the provision necessary, or even very material. Again: under this bill, these drafts could never become a circulating medium, because they would not be receivable in payment for public dues. Nothing but specie, or evidences of public debt which the Secretary cannot execute, except by authority of law, being receivable for dues to the Government.

I come now to the comparison as to the means of discounting, which these powers are said to confer upon this imaginary Treasury Bank. Under the law organizing the Treasury Department, Hamilton claimed the power to draw his drafts and sell them through his officers; and accordingly, upon his own confession, he did make and sell such drafts† upon credits of thirty and sixty days; and this, too, in exchange for bank paper. Now, sir, if this power would remain after the passage of this bill, it would flow, not from the bill, but from the law to which I have just referred. In truth, however, no opportunity would exist for such an abuse of power when the bill had reached its ultimate policy—I mean the entire collection of the public revenue in specie. Public creditors would then be paid in specie, and the operation of these drafts would be this: if the draft upon a distant place would be worth its amount in specie, the disbursing officer would exchange it for specie to pay the public debt. In this case, there would be evidence that there should be no transfer of specie from the place of deposite, and none would be made. Upon the contrary, if the draft would not command a similar amount of specie, then this specie would be transferred by Government, and the state of the money market would prove it to be expedient. The exchange of the draft for cash, or in other words for specie, would give the Government no patronage; its exchange for credit, as was practised under the law organizing the Treasury Department, would give it an improper patronage; and yet gentlemen oppose this bill, which limits the powers whose abuse they fear, and propose to leave the original law, under which they are unrestrained.

But when the opponents of the bill are driven from this ground, what is the other position which they assume? Why, sir, because the public money is in the hands of the officers of the Government, they argue that it will be used by them for banking purposes, although this bill makes it a penitentiary offence in them to make such a use of the money confided to their care. It has always been reckoned a little curious that honest Fluellen should have attempted to establish an analogy between Macedon and Monmouth, because there was a river in both; but his comparison will have its parallel, when the Treasury of the United States shall be identified with a bank, because, forsooth, there is money in both.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the last of the objections to this bill, which I propose to notice. It is said that this bill falls short of the line of our duty, because it does not regulate, or in other words make, a currency. Upon this point, I beg leave to state that if there be two constitutional modes of attaining a constitutional end, and the incidental effects of one upon the currency are better than those of the other, that then we should prefer that mode whose incidental operation is best. Accordingly, I have endeavored to show that the incidental effects of this bill upon the currency were salutary, and they extend as far, I believe, as our power over the subject. For one, I utterly deny that it is either our duty or our right to regulate the currency. This power is now derived mainly upon the argument which implies it as necessary for the regulation of commerce. Now, sir, I maintain that it is against reason to imply a power as necessary to carry out a power expressly granted, when that which is implied is as important in its own nature, as that is which is granted. If both be equal in importance, there is as much reason to suppose that the framers of the Constitution would have specified the one as the other. If they intended to give both, they would have specified both. Still less reasonable is it to suppose that they designed to give, by implication, a power more important in its own nature than that which they specified as the necessary means of carrying out the less important end. I deny, therefore, that the right to regulate currency can be implied as the means necessary to regulate commerce; inasmuch as the former power is more important and extensive than the latter. The first reaches directly every class of the community, and every species of property, whilst the latter affects immediately but one class of productive industry. This conclusion is fortified in my mind by the clause of the Constitution which forbids any thing but gold and silver to be made a legal tender between man and man. To suppose that the framers of this instrument would give this Government a power to make a currency of any thing but gold and silver, and yet deny it the privilege of making this currency a legal tender between its citizens, is to believe that it gave us the right to pass a law, but at the same time provided that any individual might nullify it at his pleasure.

Having now reviewed most of the arguments for and against the bill, I beg leave briefly to recapitulate the reason which induce me to support this measure. I believe, first, that it will operate as a gentle but salutary check upon the mischievous operations of our banking system upon foreign trade; secondly, it will take away the bounty heretofore offered by this Government to the States for the depreciation of their currency, and relieve, in a great degree, not only the different sections of this Confederacy, but the different States of the same section from the unequal operation of our fiscal system upon commerce; thirdly, it will relieve the General Government from its dependence upon these State institutions, and thus the people will have it more in their power through the State Legislatures to effect necessary reforms in the banking system; and, fourthly, it will take from the Executive, not only an immense amount of bank patronage, but also the power to alter the standard of value.

I cannot, however, pass from this subject, without explaining clearly my opinion in relation to the extent to which this bill would reform our currency. I have already said that I thought its operation in this regard would be gentle and salutary. Further than this I have declared my belief that our authority does not extend. But the public would be deceived if it expected from this measure a thorough reform in our banking system. This work must be performed by the people, through the State Governments, who alone have authority over the subject. It is not for me here to indicate the means by which I believe this great work might be accomplished I will declare my opinion, however, that a rational spirit of reform will seek, as its first object, to take gradually from these institutions the power of making a currency. They will thus be divested of the great source of their mischiefs, whilst all that is beneficial in their operations will be left to them. The great considerations which have hitherto sustained them, notwithstanding their tremendous abuses, have been that individuals obtained through them the use of capital, whilst society found their agency useful in transacting its exchanges. Their power to perform these useful functions were, however, rather diminished than increased by endowing them with the privilege of changing the standard of value. In the infancy of our society, when they were first instituted, there were no large capitalists in the country. It was a known principle that capital could be employed at a less interest in masses than in small quantities. The natural means of converting this principle to a beneficial use was to aggregate this capital by incorporations. There was no necessity to have given these incorporations the power of making currency for sale. On the contrary, without this power, if there had been no restrictions upon them as to interest, it is manifest that we should have procured at once our just share of the capital of the world, at precisely what it was worth. It is one of the vices of our banking system, that its rate of interest is fixed. They have no means of using this interest like the Bank of *American State Papers, vol. 1. Finance, p. 49.

†See American State Papers, vol. 1, Finance, p. 226.

England, as the index of its expansions and contractions in its new business. This bank has found from experience, that the readiest way of curtailing its business is to raise the rate of interest. This throws out all of that demand which comes from employments of low or doubtful profit, whilst it lets in those whose natural rate of profit is high and certain. Ours, on the contrary, curtail upon all indiscriminately—the safe as well as the doubtful; or, having no fixed and equitable rule by which to discriminnte between their customers, they make personal distinctions which are odious to society.

Let us look now to the operations of exchange. This consists of two branches. The first is a system of offsetts, which dispenses with the use of currency. For instance, the merchant in Mobile, owes the merchant in Richmond $1,000; the merchant in Richmond owes the merchant in New York a like amount; a nd the New York merchant owes him from Mobile the same. Now the dealer in exchange who could command all these obligations would settle them without the use of a cent of currency. This is the great and beneficial part of the business of exchange. A dealer of large capital would perform this business much better than one with a smaller amount, because it is manifest that the greater the number and amount of obligations commanded by one dealer, the greater the prospect for setting them off against each other. In this point of view, too, it might be necessary to use aggregate capital in order to employ it efficiently in this business. But here again the currency function was unnecessary, because this business, like all others, has its natural rate of profit, which would of itself invite the employment of capital, without the aid of bounties and monopolies so mischievous to the community. Indeed it is known to be the natural and profitable part of the business of banking. There is however another branch of this business, not here so important or extensive, to which I would call the attention of the committee before I conclude. It will sometimes happen, that after selling off all of the obligations to or from a particular city, the balance of trade will be against it. Now the transportation of the money to discharge this debt cannot be made without cost. As the city owing the debt desired the consideration for which it was contracted, so it is just and natura that this expense should be borne by it. And if any bank undertakes to transfer it for nothing, it does so, because Government has given it some privilege of pecuniary value, which compensates them for their loss. This is manifest, from the nature of the thing; and if they pretend that the power to issue currency, enables them to perform this task without cost to themse ves or others, they state the account erroneously. They do not make this change of funds without cost to themselves. But for the immense advantage of the exclusive power to coin paper money, they may well undertake to assume this burden. It is obvious, however, at the same time that Government would be doing much more justice to the community, even if it were to take upon itself the immediate charge of carrying this money from city to city in its own ships.

It seems to me clear therefore, Mr. Chairman, that so far as exchange saves much of the cost of transporting money by setting off mutual demands against each other, the banks could perform the business profitably to themselves and others, without the power to issue a cent of currency; while on the other hand, the cost of transporting the actual ballances due upon trade from city to city, ought of right to fall upon them who benefit by trade; and it is unjust to the community at large to give the banks the power of altering the standard of value to their own profit, for the smaller loan of their doing this comparatively unimportant branch of exchange without cost to the merchant.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to examine the subject in which I have been engaged fairly and impartially. I have certainly expressed my opinions candidly, perhaps too boldly. When I looked to the magnitude of the interests involved in our discussions, I hesitated whether I ought to place before the public these results of my humble reflections and immatured experience. But when I remembered that my name had no weight to give authority to opinions which are unpopular in themselves, I was convinced, that, if erroneous, their expression could injure none but myself, whilst if true, it was right that they should be known. The task which I have executed, in some respects, has been painful. I regretted to differ with men whose superior wisdom I ackowledge, and with whom I should have been happy to have agreed, had the constitution of our minds permitted it. Perhaps this regret would have been deeper, if imputations as to the party motives of those who support this bill had been hazarded less freely upon this floor. For myself, I am governed by no party motives upon such a question as this. I feel myself to be proudly above them. In saying this, I mean no disrespect to those who adopt the rules of party action; they have the authority of eminent names, perhaps of public opinion itself, to sustain them in the propriety of submitting their conduct to such rules. For one, however, I never will consent to merge all individuality of sentiment and action in the great mass of party. I never will take upon myself that allegiance which should bind me to obey the will of a party, even though the obedience involved a sacrifice of the wishes and dearest interests of those who sent me here. As the agent of my constituents, I will either represent them, according to their sense of right when I know it, or I will give way for another who may do it with a safer conscience. But beyond this, and when they leave me a free agent, I acknowledge no responsibility to any but to that Being who gave me a conscience for my guide. Sir, short as my course has been, there have yet been times when I should have turned aside from public life, heart-sickened by the narrow disputes of party for power and place, if it had not been for my fixed belief that great principles were at work in society, which would accomplish their results in despite of the obstacles of a mistaken legislation. I believe that the Reformer is abroad on the earth to change and to purify; and I trust that the day is not distant, when he will liberate trade, and turn that mighty innovator loose upon mankind; who, when free to take the range of the earth, will tread down the barriers that divide man by sections, and trample upon those monopolies which array in hostility the different classes of society, which, but for them, would have an identity of interest and harmony of purpose. If the dream of the visionary and philosopher who sighs for universal peace shall ever be realized, that work will be accomplished through the agency of the great principles of free trade; for it is the nature of these to teach man, through his interest, to reduce the rules alike of national law and municipal regulation to that simple maxim of Christian ethics, which commands us "to do as we would be done by." In conclusion, sir, I must return my thanks to the committee for indulging me so long. As the best excuse which I can offer, I will say that it has been a long time since I troubled them before, and, probably, it will be long before I shall trouble them again.

SPEECH OF MR. POTTER, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the House of Representatives, June 23, 1838—In the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, and the various amendments offered thereto.

Mr. POTTER addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The subject has been here and elsewhere so fully and ably discussed, that if it was not for the resolution adopted by the Legislature of my State, I should feel justified in preserving silence during this debate—a situation much more consonant to my position in this House; but respect for that body, and a sense of what is due to my constituents, compel me, reluctantly to trespass on the precious time of this committee. The resolution to which I refer, is as follows, viz:

"That our Representatives in Congress be requested, and our Senators instructed to vote, and use their influence for a postponement, until the next session of Congress, of the act introduced by the honorable SILAS WRIGHT of New York, commonly called the Sub-Treasury bill; and that they vote at this session for no act of a similar nature; and that we have full confidence in Martin Van Buren, and in the wisdom and intelligence of our Democratic Senators and Representatives in Congress; and our Senators are hereby further instructed, and our members requested to vote for such a mode of receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys, as will separate, as far as practicable, the banks from the Government."

Unique as is this singular production, and unworthy as it is of the intelligent people of that State, which I have in part the honor to represent on this floor, I give it my serious deliberation, with a desire to conform with its behests. It was sustained, and finally passed, by the vote of every Federal member in the House of Representatives, and furnished the anomaly of every political opponent of Mr. Van Buren in that body declaring their confidence in his "wisdom and intelligence," and their faith in their political opponents on this floor, the Democratic portion of the Pennsylvania delegation; thereby casting an implied and severe reflection on those honorable gentlemen of their own political party from our State, as undeserved as unmerited. This instruction process had its origin here, and is the illegitimate bantling of politicians, instead of the spontaneous movement of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. The Governor of our State was the organ used on that occasion to convey the dictation of a political clique, located in this city, to their humble followers in the Legislature. That high functionary descended from the dignity of his station, and became the aider and abettor of this interference in the action of a sovereign State. If an attempt had been made to dictate to a State Legislature, on a question of vital importance to the whole American people by this Administration, or traced to its friends in this House, how justly would the charge of the unauthorized and unjustifiable interference of the officers of the National Government, with State legislation, been denounced and sustained! If a Democratic Governor of a State had lent himself to this attempted degradation of the State, whose honor and destinies had been confided to his care, what indignation and contempt would have been felt and expressed! When we see the mandate to control and fetter the judgment of our Senators, and intimidated a portion of our representatives in the national councils, concocted at the seat of the National Government; the rescript issued to a Chief Magistrate of a State, and servilely obeyed by that functionary, have we not cause of dread for the preservation of the State sovereignties, and alarm at the consolidating tendencies of such proceedings? I, for one, appeal from this spurious and sybilline instruction of the General Assembly, to the free and enlightened people of my district. To them I am amenable for my conduct, as their representative. They, and they alone, have power to instruct, and to their unbiassed judgment I will most cheerfully submit my whole political course during the time I am honored as their organ in this place.

A brief review of the mode and manner of the safe-keeping and deposite of the public funds, will illustrate how the idea arose that banks have an inherent right to be the depositories of the public money. In fact, it will be found that their use, as depositories, and the reception of their notes in the payment of the dues of Government, grew up from the custom and usage of the Treasury Department, and not from any absolute provisions of law. The Continental Congress laid the germ of a Treasury Department in the resolution of the 29th July, 1775, by which they appointed Michael Hillegas and Geo. Clymer joint treasurers of the United Colonies; and directed they should give bond, with surety, for the faithful performance of their duties. They were directly responsible to Congress, and held their offices at its will. They were the depositories of the public treasure, and paid out the money on warrants drawn by the President of Congress. Under the aticles of confederation, Congress, so far as it possessed the attributes of government, exercised the blended powers of Legislative and Executive

In all the various resolutions and ordinances, up to the period of the adoptionof the present Constitution, whether the superintending powers of the Treasury Department, including the authority over the depository of the public funds, was vested in a committee of Congress, or in commissioners, composed, in part, of members of Congress, or in the creation of a "civil executive department of the Treasury, it reserved to itself the control of the whole system. At first, Congress reserved, as a power not delegated to any subordinate agent, the authority of the selection of the place where the public moneys should be kept. Subsequently, they granted it successively to the "Committee on the Treasury," "the Commissioners of the Treasury," "the Superintendant of Finance," and "the Board of Treasury," in subordination to the resolutions and ordinances of Congress. The new Constitution separated the Legislative and Executive branches, and vested the latter in the President. The reorganization of the Executive departments became necessary, to render them conformable to the new order of things effected by the change in the form of government. This, at the first session of Congress, under the Constitution, produced the act entitled, "An act to establish the Treasury Department.' The duties assigned to the head of the Department, were assimilated to those pointed out, by the ordinance of the Continental Congress, to the Superintendant of Finance; and an officer called the "Treasurer" was to be appointed, whose duties it was "to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse the same upon warrants." The construction given to this act, by the first and every succeeding Secretary of the Treasury, and acquiesced in by every branch of the Government, was, that it conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury the power of directing where the public moneys in the Treasury were to be deposited. The practice and usage was, sometimes to place it in the hands of individuals, sometimes in State banks; and, during the period of the charter of the old Bank of the United States, portions of the public moneys were deposited with it. The Treasurer, on no occasion during the period that has intervened from 1789, attempted to exercise the power of selection. No bank, either State or National, until recently, claimed any right to be the depository of the treasure of the people. It was admitted by all the constituted authorities of the nation, as well as by the whole people, that the safe-keeping of the public money was by law, under the exclusive power of the officers of the Government, subject to the supervision of the President, as the head of the Executive department, and the action of Congress.

For a period of twenty-seven years subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution, officers of the people, selected and appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, were, in fact, the depositaries of the public money. On the 14th October, 1789, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, addressed a circular to the collectors of the revenue, in which he directs them "to remit all the notes in hand weekly by the post to Samuel Meredith," who then held the situation of Treasurer. As to the specie, which the collectors should return, as remaining in their hands, he informed them, "I ppose that the Treasurer shall draw orders on you, from time to time, for the specie." The Treasurer of the United States, and the collectors for the time being, were the designated depositaries of the public money. On the 6th of April, 1790, the Secretary addressed a circular to all the collectors of Georgia, except Savannah; and in it he directed them to "remit all moneys which you may now have on hand, or hereafter receive, on account of the customs, to John Habersham, Esq. collector for the port of Savannah." In the same circular, he further orders, "this mode of payment you will continue till otherwise directed by me." This shows the practice and usage of the department early after its organization under the Constitution, and proves that there is nothing novel in the suggestion, that individuals under the control, and subject to the action, of the people's Government, should be entrusted with the safe-keeping of the people's money. If the officers, elected by the people, can be entrusted, under the Constitution, with the administration of the Government, with the power and patronage incident to their duties, with the collection, with the disbursement and the raising of the revenue, why not with its safe-keeping? If the people are so innately corrupt that they cannot confide to themselves the selection of the depositaries of their own money, unless corporations are chosen, our Government is fast toppling to its fall. Representative Governments and republican institutions are based on the purity of the people, and their fitness for self-government. Their servants, their agents and representatives reflect back the purity or the impurity of the constituent body. For one, I must express my confidence in the intelligence and virtue of the people of this country, and my firm belief, that they are as capable of selecting competent and fit individuals to be entrusted with a sacred trust, as the directors or stockholders of any moneyed corporation, or any other corporate body in the Union. The circular of Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, of the 25th February, 1811, addressed to the collector of the port of Philadelphia, shows that he claimed and exercised the power, as Secretary of the Treasury, of directing the place of deposite for the public money, and that he delegated that power to the collector for the moneys received at that port. The act of 1816, chartering the Bank of the United States, contained a provision in the 16th section, which declared that the deposites of the moneys of "the United States, in places in which the said Bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in the said Bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct." By the provisions of this section, the authority of the Secretary, as to the selection of the depositary, in places other than where the Bank or its branches were located, remained untouched, as it had existed previous to its enactment. And in case the Secretary "should order and direct" the deposites to be withheld from the Bank of the United States, for satisfactory reasons to be assigned to Congress at its next session, after the issuing of the order, the whole power of selection was remitted, under the existing laws, to the Secretary.

When this event occurred, we find the selection made by that officer, as had been the uniform practice under the act of 1789. From the time of the charter of the late Bank of the United States to the removal of the deposites in 1833, the Bank of the United States and its branches were generally used as the fiscal agents of the Treasury Department, although not exclusively so. In 1817 an arrangement was entered into between the Bank and the Secretary of the Treasury, by which it was stipulated that in places where it had no branches, the Bank was to designate certain State banks in which the public money should be deposited, and for whose fidelity in discharge of the trusts confided to them it would be responsible to the Government. This arrangement went into effect, and continued in operation until the 30th day of June, 1818, when it terminated, in consequence of difficulties arising between the selected State banks and the Bank of the United States. On its termination the Bank intimated to the Treasury Department that, thenceforward, it could receive nothing in deposite as cash but the legal currency of the country, or its own notes. It is a remarkable fact, that this discrimination of the Bank to receive, as the fiscal agent of the Government, under the provisions of its charter, on deposite, as cash, nothing but specie or its own notes, created no alarm for the safety of the great credit system; nor was its policy denounced as ruinous to the interests of the people, or arraigned as hostile to the State institutions. Where then slumbered the sentinels whose voices now so loudly proclaim the danger from an analogous measure, sustained and advocated by the great body of the Democracy of the country? Their patriotism slept when a great moneyed corporation, the god of their idolatry, advanced the doctrine of the non-reception of State bank notes, convertible at the will of the holder into the precious metals, on deposite, by that institution. Their devotion to the Bank did not falter or waver for a single moment. The kind of money that was not good enough to be received by it as cash, is abundantly fit for the people and their Government, in the estimation of these new-fledged Whigs and patriots. When the President recommends the collection and disbursement of the public dues in the "legal currency," he and his friends are assailed in bilingsgate language, which vies with that of the fish market in chaste beauty. They are denominated Loco Focos, Destructives, and denounced as hostile to the banks and the credit system.

The act of 1836 regulating the deposites, constitutes the latest action of Congress on this subject. Its provisions are familiar to all who are conversant with the legislation of Congress. The States became the depositories of the surplus revenue on hand, and banks, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury on specified terms, became the depositories of the accruing revenue; and that portion which it was deemed advisable to retain, to meet any exigencies of the Government. The suspension of specie payments in May, 1837, by the State banks, in compliance with the provisions of the act of 1836 terminated their connection with the Government, as fiscal agents, for the time being, and threw the Treasury Department back upon the act of 1789, as the regulator of the depositories of the public money. For how short a period during the existence of our country as an independent nation, have banks, by express law, been the sole depositories of the public money? On the 20th November, 1789, Mr. Secretary Hamilton, in a circular letter addressed to the collectors of Massachusetts, directed them to deposite in the Bank of Boston "whatever money may come to their hands;" and he further instructed them that they were to continue to do so until they should "receive a countermand" from him. The reason assigned for this order exhibits the views of the Secretary, and the motives which, in the then situation of the internal communications and commerce of the country, governed and controlled his policy. It was to enable him, "as far as possible, to avail the public of the revenues arising in that State, without drawing the specie out of it, by facilitating the negotiation of drafts."

From this small beginning, intended to facilitate the operations of the Treasury, and protect the specie circulation in a State, from whence, at that day, a great portion of the revenue was derived, has the claim of the banks, which now overshadows the whole land, arisen? It is, and has been, the boast and glory of the founders of our Constitution, that they saw at a distance the mighty growth and extension of this Republic, and to have laid the foundations of a great, free, and powerful nation. We have increased in population and wealth, and acquired an adamantine strength, which no foreign power can affect. So long as the people are true to themselves, this Republic will be indestructible. Such has been the rapid increase of our commerce, navigation, agriculture, and manufactures, that it was thought necessary to establish numerous banks, by State legislation, under the fallacious idea of increasing capital; many of these went into operation without a sufficient metallic basis, and were, in all respects, without solidity of capital, or prudence of management. The idea prevailed that a bank was the panacea for every real or imaginary evil. When their own cupidity and mismanagement caused them to dishonor their credit, every nerve is strained to clear their own skirts, and cast the odium on the National Government. To change the Administration many of them have entered the arena of politics, to coerce the Government and the people to entrust them with the custody of the public moneys, for the avowed purpose of discounting upon it, and using it as capital, to increase and swell their profits. To compel the people to receive and disburse their notes, in the expenditures of the Government, so as to extend their circulation, and give them a fictitious credit, they are entrenched behind "the cotton bags," have closed their vaults, and refused to pay their debts. In these dishonored entrenchments they are counselled to remain until the "enemy" are driven from the country, by the presiding officer of the most powerful bank in the Union. To what enemy does he allude? To a foreign foe. No: the reference is to the servants of the people, elected and selected by them to administer the Government, under the Constitution; to the downfall of the Republican party, and the prostration of the principles, which marked the administrations of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson; and consequently the predominancy of the adverse principles which were so prominently shadowed forth during the administrations of the Massachusetts dynasty of Presidents. Thus the moneyed power, wielded by irresponsible corporations, is volunteered in aid of a political party. If the people yield to this potent influence, and bow in obedience to the mandate of the banks, it will be time to despair of the Republic. The conflict is emphatically one for life or death; for liberty or for a monocracy. If the people can be roused to the true issue, the danger is passed and gone. True to themselves, true to the glory of their ancestors, they will preserve the rich inheritance of liberty which has descended to them, and transmit it, unsullied, to their posterity. The prize is a vast one; the banks who struggle for the attainment of this power, deem all stratagems fair in the war, and will, deliberately and knowingly, endeavor to deceive the people. Already we have seen it put forth, ex cathedra, that the banks are but another name for the stock and farms, the work shops, the manufactories and ships of the people, nay, that they are, "ipse ipsissimus," the people themselves. The creatures, created by the servants of the people, assume to be the sovereign people. How modest! Ambition uses foul ladders and crooked paths to reach the summit of its proudest hopes!

The intelligence and virtue of a free people foil every effort, and leave the plotters at the foot, instead of the summit, of power. Confined to their legitimate sphere, and within the provisions of their charters, the State banks are beyond the control of the National Government, and unconnected with its operations. Properly restricted in numbers and in power, they are useful to the people, and, from long custom, firmly interwoven with the institutions of the country. It would be unjust, and contrary to the spirit of our Government, for Congress to shape its legislation so as to overawe and oppress them, and bring ruin upon multitudes of our citizens, who are stockholders, creditors, or debtors, of these institutions. None to whom the Administration of the Government is entrusted could be so unwise; none could possess so little sympathy for the sufferings of the people as to pursue such a course. Certainly the restoration of the collection and disbursement of the revenue to the mode and manner where it was placed by the sages who framed the Constitution, is not an attack on the banks, or evidence of hostility towards them, or the credit system. Serious embarrassments exist among the commercial classes in our cities. We look in vain for the cause of this embarrassment in the present state of our markets. Our agricultural and manufactured articles bear a fair price; foreign exchange is at its lowest rate; the precious metals are flowing in upon us. Whence, then, does the evil arise? Clearly from the deranged state of the currency, produced by the wild excess of banking operations, the vast expansion of credit, the untoward and extensive speculations of companies and individuals, followed by the sudden contraction concomitant upon expansion. That this scene of embarrassment and derangement of the exchanges of the country should be kept up as a means of operating on public opinion, and controlling the dynasty of the Government, was the avowed object of one great moneyed institution of the country, if the late letter of its president speaks the sentiments of its directory. To guard against these evils, and to take away all cause of agitation relative to conflicts between the National Government and State institutions, is the great and leading object of the bill under discussion. The principle on which it is predicated is, to entrust the public money no longer to the safe keeping of corporations, but to assume the custody of the public treasure by the Government itself. Its first and main object, the continued severance of the financial relations of the Government, "as far as is practicable," from "the banks."

The suspension of specie payments in May last, under the provisions of the Constitution and the existing laws, coerced the Treasury Department into a withdrawal of the deposite of the public money from the State corporations, and cast upon the Executive Department a wide discretion in the mode and manner of keeping the funds of the nation. The deposite act of 1836 did not contemplate or provide for a crisis such as that which occurred. The probability of the refusal of some one of the selected deposite banks to redeem their paper was foreseen, and provision made in the eighth section for such a contingency. It was enacted: "Or if any of the said banks shall at any time refuse to pay its own notes in specie, if demanded," "it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue any such bank as a depository, and withdraw from it the public moneys which it may hold on deposite." This was the law. It was obeyed. No discretion was left to the Secretary. The connection was wholly dissolved. The Executive Department is not chargeable with the dissolution. If it is again to exist, it must be re-established by a new reunion, consummated by law. So, also, the non-reception of the notes of banks refusing to redeem their issues, in payment of debts due the Government, was produced by operation of law, and not by the volition of the Executive branch of the Government. The act of 1789, the resolution of 1816, and the act of 1836, were imperative, and forbid the officers of the Government to receive, in payment of its dues, any inconvertible paper, issued either by the State sovereignties or banking corporations. In a Federative Republic, organized under a written Constitution, of limited powers, it would present a singular anomaly, closely allied to despotism, to clothe ministerial officers with the power of dispensing with positive laws. It is equally foreign to the character of our institutions to confide immense discretionary powers in the hands of the Executive. A jealous limitation of the control of the Executive over the finances of the nation, is a principle coeval with the Republican system. The framers of that admirable chart of our liberty, the Constitution, recognised this safeguard of our Government in the provision that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law." Deeply impressed with the truth of these positions, I cannot consent to forbear making an effort to place the safe keeping of the public moneys under the regulations and restrictions of law, during the present session, and thus limit the power of the Executive over the finances of the nation.

Two plans of accomplishing the object of taking the public money out of the immediate control of the Exscutive branch. and placing it under the custody of the laws, has been submitted to the consideration of the people and Congress; first, to revive and resuscitate the union of the State banks with the Treasury Department, on principles allied to those of the deposite act of 1836; secondly, to provide for the entire separation between the Government and the banks. No proposition for the creation of a National Bank to be made the fiscal agent of the Treasury Department, has been submitted for the consideration of Congress or the people. The question is narrowed down to the two positions stated: which shall we select? The solution of this important inquiry involves momentous interests in its decision, deeply affecting the future destinies of the people, the States and the Union. Its magnitude is felt and acknowledged; the high responsibilities under which we act recognised. None can deny the disasters which have been entailed upon our country, during and immediately succeeding the period that State banks were used as fiscal agents of the Government. The connection proved alike unfortunate to the people, the Government and the banks. On both occasions, when State banks were resorted to as fiscal agents, the experiment signally failed. A striking similarity exists between the results arising during the period between 1811 and 1816, and those recently developed. Are these misfortunes attributable to the inauspicious periods at which State bank agency was employed in the financial relations of the Government, or did they occur from an inherent defect in the system? During the continuance, and at the close of a foreign war, the experiment failed. In a time of profound peace, and great individual and national prosperity, a second disastrous failure happened. When is the auspicious period to arrive for a fair trial? And what inducement has the people to try a third experiment, based on similar principles with two former ones, which utterly failed?

The evil is in the system, and not in the period when the experiment has been tried. This admonishes us of their insecurity, and inability to successfully perform the necessary functions of the financial agency of the Government. The defect is in their organic structure; and hence the hopelessness of amendment. When money is abundant, all who have the command of it use it improvidently. The Government, with all its checks and balances, cannot be restrained from doing the same. Bank directors and officers are not exempt from this general frailty of our nature: they are usually the largest borrowers and prime operators in bank credits. Next, they accommodate their friends. It is the interest of banks to lend; and borrowers think it their interest to obtain money to invest in speculations, the profits of which are generally over-estimated. The tide rolls on, until the mass of the community are drawn into the vortex. No one dreams of the reflux, except here and there a solitary individual, who is termed a croaking raven; behind the age in which he lives. This is human nature, which no wise statesman will overlook, in framing a system of government. Operated upon by such causes, no Treasury contrivance by the General Government can impose upon the State banks, whose existence is independent of their power, sufficient obligations, or offer sufficient inducements, to repel the infectious influence of the trading mania, when at flood tide; and until that can be accomplished, the public money will not only be unsafe in the State banks, but it will greatly enhance the danger of their insecurity. They would be much more sound and beneficial to the country without, than with it. The occasional fluctuations of internal exchanges will occur, under any system of financial arrangements by this Government. The evidence of the last year has given a remarkable instance of the utter inability of State banks, when connected with the Treasury Department, to preserve uniformity of exchange. A memorable instance of the failure of the United States Bank to secure the same desirable uniformity, occurs in the past history of internal exchange, from the year 1817 up to 1821; during which period the western banks, and most of their enterprising men, were prostrated, the Bank of the United States itself, reduced to the very verge of bankruptcy, and compelled to suspend and wind up some of its branches; particularly one in Cincinnati. The convulsions of that period overwhelmed whole masses in the Middle and Western States with ruin; and as it respected this Government, terminated in its relinquishment of upwards of twenty-one millions of debt due for the sale of public land; and an accumulation of upwards of one million and a half of dollars of unavailable funds in the Treasury, in the notes of broken banks. After the evil had fallen upon us, and the mischief was done, the Government interfered. At the instance of the Chief Magistrate, the then president of the bank resigned, and Mr. Cheves was placed at the head of the institution. A man of iron nerve, he applied the remedy with an iron hand; and property throughout the Middle and Western States was reduced in a short period, from fifty to seventy-five per cent. in value. This occurred at a period when our staples were depressed abroad, and aggravated the evil. The seat of the disease was in the expansions of credit and bank issues, during the preceding years, and in the rigid and unbending contractions, and consequent reduction of the circulating medium, in the years of 1819, '20, and '21. This brief review of bygone times, proves that all the skill of the able and patriotic men of that day, with every motive for exertion men of exalted reputation, occupying the highest stations of public trust, was not competent to arrest the ruinous misfortunes arising from the use of the public money, in expanding bank facilities. Nor when the evil was presented, were they able to prescribe such a remedy as the debilitated condition of the body politic would bear. They mistook the plethora for robust health, and depleted the patient until he fell into an incurable dropsy.

On the Government and the people, the consequences of this unnatural union of Federal power with State institutions, produced dangerous results. A mean subserviency on the part of many of the conductors of these institutions to the Treasury Department, is clearly evinced in the published correspondence between them. A wide and almost boundless range was given to the power and patronage of the Executive—the more fatal and dangerous because unseen and secret in its operations. Corrupting as such a Union was to the spirit and genius of our institutions, it was no less fatal in its consequences to the currency, the prosperity and the business of the country.

Two great explosions have overwhelmed the currency within the last twenty-five years; and is it not remarkable that on both occasions the occurrence took place at periods when State banks were connected with the fiscal operations of the Government? The blighting influence of an irredeemable and depreciated circulating medium warns us to beware of this doubtful and dangerous remedy. Experience has demonstrated to the most incredulous, that there are radical defects in our bank circulation, which can only be cured by an increase of the specie circulation, and a reduction of the paper medium. So long as the money of the people is diverted from its constitutional purposes, and used as capital by banking corporations to discount upon, an occasional redundant circulation is inevitable. A crisis in our national or commercial relations produces a rapid contraction of this redundancy; depreciation is the natural consequence; and the evil is inflicted on the whole community. But the effect upon the business of the country is still more deleterious. A sound and stable currency fosters and encourages industry; and an unsound one, attended by constant fluctuations, prostrates the enterprise of the industrious and honest portion of the community. Currency is the measure of value; and that nation which places it under the control of incorporated companies, surrenders the industry and business of the country into their hands: they raise the price of labor, and increase the price of production and consumption at their own will and pleasure; then, by a moment's operation, convulse the value of all the products of the country, and reduce the price of labor and property far below the correct standard. It is, then, evident that a sound and stable currency would produce highly beneficial results to the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests. It would give to the products of the farmer a certain and fair value, and to the manufacturer a protection which would enable him to meet foreign competition, by manufacturing the article at a price which would authorize him to sell as cheap, or cheaper, than the foreigner. The interests of all would harmonise, and the prosperity of all be secured. As this stability and uniformity of circulation is endangered by the union of banks and State, ought the connection to be renewed? I honestly believe that the best interests of the people imperatively forbid the reunion, which the banks themselves dissevered. Come coolly and reason, while I briefly examine the alternative measure. Calm deliberation and reason should be the only guide in this investigation: appeals should not be made to prejudice, to passion, or to party. Truth, and the attainment of the best interests of our country, are the objects fervently desired. The Constitution evidently contemplated that money should be raised from the people for the purposes of supporting the Government, defending the country, and increasing the prosperity and happiness of the whole people, and for no other object whatever. When the money of the people was collected, it was to remain in the Treasury until drawn out in virtue of appropriations made by law. So jealous were our ancestors, that, in the grant of powers to the National Government, they confined the power to the immediate representatives of the people of originating appropriation bills. These principles militate against the idea that it is right or constitutional to give the money of the people to corporations to loan out and bank upon; or, in other words, to use it for the unauthorized purpose of private gain. They accord in principle, on the other hand, with the proposed plan of separation. By the provisions of the Constitution, Congress holds the purse, and is entitled to the custody and safekeeping of the finances of the nation. The power of raising revenue, and directing its appropriation, is vested in that body. The revenue is to be raised and expended by authority of law. The agents for collecting and disbursing, under the Constitution, are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but when appointed, they cannot raise or disburse one dollar without the authority of law. A just regard to constitutional injunction, and an exalted patriotism, demands that the National Treasury, with overflowing means, should not be exposed to bankruptcy by the vicissitudes of banking and commercial fluctuations. Pledged to no peculiar plan or bill to effectuate the object of separation, I am disposed to anxiously inquire and deliberate carefully upon the details, so as to secure the least possible injury in the process, and to accommodate the return to the early and approved policy of the Government, to the existing situation of the currency and circulating medium of the country. Party prejudice, united with an avaricious feeling on the part of bankers and speculators, have left no effort untried to assail, with a ferocious spirit, the plan of an independent Treasury. By some it is attacked as the creation of a great Government bank. This is the most unfounded of all the attempts which have been made to prejudice the public mind. Under the provisions of the bill reported in the Senate, as well as that under discussion, less power is conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury over the public funds than what he has possessed since the origin of the Government, and no more than what he must exercise under any system. He has always paid the public creditors by Treasury drafts, and always must pay them in this manner. Whenever greater accumulations of revenue arise at any one place than are required for expenditures at that point, he must, and always has had the power of transferring the surplus to places where it is wanted. Such, and no greater, are the powers conferred by the provisions of the bill; yet it is said that the holders of these Treasury drafts or warrants may endorse them over to third persons, and thus render them negotiable, and that these drafts will constitute the paper currency of the Government bank. This pretext is at once annihilated by the provision requiring these drafts to be promptly presented and paid, so that they cannot continue in circulation, and form a part of the circulating medium of the country. Compare the limited powers proposed to be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury with those which a connection with a league of combined banks would give. The league would consist of State banks, retaining all the powers conferred by their charters. In addition, you secure to them the use of the public deposites, to be discounted upon, and used as an increase of capital. You give them unlimited credit by the reception of their notes as gold and silver in payment of the public dues. You consolidate, organise, and blend the interests and capital of the selected and united banks into one great whole; and as the central power, you place that whole under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury. One mind, one powerful will, would direct and control the operations of this central power, to which the currency, the business, and the property of the country, had been surrendered. Would not this create a bank?—a Government bank, under Executive control, which might end in despotism?

Again: it is alleged that the Independent Treasury plan extends and enlarges Executive patronage. To make the comparison between that and the deposite bank system on this point, analyze and compare the provisions of the bill. By it there are four public receivers to be appointed, by and with the consent of the Senate, whose united salaries will amount to about twelve thousand five hundred dollars; and ten clerks, whose salaries will average about twelve thousand dollars; and these, together with such visiters as may be occasionally appointed to count the money, and examine the accounts of the different depositories are all the addition to the Executive patronage. How trifling in comparison with all that immense influence, which is abandoned by dissevering the corrupt and corrupting influence of a connection with selected deposite banks! In them are united all the elements of power; immense capital, controlled by a central influence, and blended and united with the Executive, so as to constitute a mighty mass, portending danger and ruin to republican liberty. View the number of persons who are liable to be affected by banking influence, the power they possess in the community, and the extent of control that may be exercised over them, and the most sceptical will be convinced that the deposite system combines the elements of political power in a much more eminent degree than the alternative plan. In addition to the officers now in service, say twenty-five of the most powerful banks are to be selected. The officers and stockholders of these institutions are directly interested in their prosperity, and, of course, as their peculiar interests are embarked in a common bottom with the Executive who selected the banks, they would sustain him. These, in the aggregate, at a fair computation, number two thousand five hundred persons—the most influential in the community, with numbers dependent on them for favors and accommodation. Admit that the twenty-five or thirty individuals appointed to office under the Independent Treasury system are equal in character and respectability to an equal number of the officers and stockholders of banks, yet how much less influence do they possess, and how small their means of exercising control over public opinion, in comparison with that of the others. How immeasurably is this power increased, when you view American banking as one great system, extending throughout the broad limits of the land, and numbering upwards of eight hundred and twenty banks, wielding a capital of hundreds of millions, and possessing an influence, either directly or indirectly, over near one million of persons. What a standing army of friends and partisans could an Executive Magistrate rally around him, when closely allied to, and united with, this great system! The State bank deposite system, by placing the selected banks at its head, under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, would constitute that dangerous combination.

It is further objected that the public money would not be safe under the Independent Treasury scheme. The officers would be under heavy bonds for a faithful discharge of their trusts, and would, in addition, be subject to fine and imprisonment for using or lending the public money for any private purpose whatever. Does the fact that they are officers of the Government render them dishonest and corrupt, and that if they were bank officers, they would be transmuted into trustworthy and honorable men? Every dollar of revenue has heretofore passed through the hands of two sets of public officers. Collecting officers first receive the money; it is in their hands until deposited with the selected depository. The disbursing officers pay out the public money; and it is in their hands from the time it is withdrawn from the depository until it is paid to the party entitled to receive it. These are Executive officers. The banks, as depositories, from the recent report of the Secretary of the Treasury, have caused greater losses to the Government than have arisen from both these classes of Executive officers. Experience, from the origin of the Government, repels the allegation.

But it is objected that the plan assails credit, and aims a fatal blow at the banks. What right have the State banks to the custody of the public money? An individual who would set up a claim to be made the depositary of the public money, for the avowed and express purpose of loaning it out, at an interest, for his private advantage, would be laughed to scorn. Yet grave claims are set up in favor of a number of individuals associated by charter, and who enjoy high privileges under their charters, to the use of the public money. Have corporations greater rights than individuals? With great respect for the opinions of others, I hold the reverse of this position. If the banks have no vested right to the public funds, it certainly is not attacking them to withhold from them the possession of that which they have no right to claim. But it is said that the refusal to receive their issues and notes in the payment of public dues is an assault on their credit. The Constitution only recognises the precious metals as currency; no creditor can be compelled to receive from his debtor any other medium than specie in the liquidation and payment of a debt. The reception of the notes of individuals or of banks in payment is entirely at the option of the creditor; and it is never deemed an assault upon the credit of an individual or a bank to refuse their notes in the liquidation of a demand. Why should the public Treasury be placed in a different position from all other creditors? and why should the public dues be made an exception to all other debts? Credit, sound and well regulated credit, is the germ of prosperity. Its preservation, in importance, is second only to the preservation of the liberties of the people. It is best cherished and protected when corporations and individuals confine their operations within due bounds, and discharge faithfully and promptly their pecuniary and moral duties. Would not integrity and enterprise command the same confidence, whether the funds of the nation are kept in State banks or in the hands of the officers of the people? Would a neighbor cease to trust his neighbor, because the Government did not receive bank notes in payment of its dues? Undoubtedly not. Convinced that the just credit of banking institutions and individuals cannot be injuriously affected by the continued severance of the Treasury Department from the State banks, it is believed this objection has its origin in a heated and excited imagination, and not in sober reason.

The modus operandi, under the bill, will, in my judgment, have this effect. In many cases, when a Treasury warrant is drawn upon one of the branch Treasuries, the holder will deposite it for transmission and collection in, or exchange it for, the notes of the best and most convenient specie-paying bank, by which the bank will effect a very desirable object—the circulation of its own notes in exchange for a Treasury warrant, payable only in specie. If there should be a branch Treasury in the vicinity of the bank, it will draw the specie; or, if remote, the warrant will be sent to settle balances, if any be due, at the commercial points in the vicinity of a branch Treasury. Specie-paying banks will thus get hold of many of the warrants, which will either answer for exchanges in the settlement of balances due distant banks, or for the purpose of strengthening their vaults by an influx of the precious metals. This process, the natural incident of the system, is calculated to remove all cause of alarm from the true friends of the State banks, or from the anxious advocates of the credit system—a name which has usurped the place of the former appellation of friends of the American system. What will constitute the real difference between the antagonist systems? In the one case, the public funds are to be loaned out for private gain; in the other, they are retained for the legitimate use of the Government. In the one, it will be the interest of a powerful class to swell the revenue to the highest possible standard: in the other, it will be the interest of the whole people that the revenue should be strictly limited, and confined to the most economical expenditure compatible with the public weal. If, at any time, it should suddenly and unexpectedly accumulate, its first effect would be to lock up an undue portion of the active capital of the country. This would produce a continued effort to reduce the revenue, to get clear of the Treasury hoards. These operations will rather tend to preserve the equilibrium in the monetary system, as the accumulations in the Treasury will check the speculations which have caused it; whereas the accumulation of deposites in the banks, to be loaned out, will increase, and, for a considerable time give new impetus to the injurious excitement. Irregularities will accrue in the revenue, independently of any plan for keeping the public money; but that system is the worst which aggravates these irregularities most.

I am friendly to credit; have no hostility to well regulated State banks; and repudiate, as a clear and palpable misrepresentation, that charge so perseveringly promulgated against the Democratic party "that it desires the destruction of all banks, and the prostration of all credit." The bill provides that, from and after the 31st December, 1838, one-sixth of the revenue is to be collected and paid in the legal currency, or in the evidences of debt against the United States, created by law; and increasing in amount one-sixth annually, until 1843, when the whole revenue is to be paid in this medium. Up to that period, the bills of such banks as now pay specie, or as may think proper to resume specie payments, are to be receivable. This, for the time being, will hold out an inducement to the banks to resume; and the change in the kind of money receivable, will be so gradual that it cannot possibly produce any sensible effect upon the banks, or the community. Nay, if, on trial, after one or two years, one-sixth should be found to operate injuriously to the commerce or the people of the country, how readily can the act be reduced, or the whole system, as to the collection in specie only, be changed, or modified. While the revenue is daily being received, it will as daily be returning into circulation in payments to the creditors of the Government, who immediately pay it out to the other classes of the community. The pay to officers o the Government, for services rendered, constitute but a small item in the expenditures of the nation. The sums expended in paying and maintaining the Army and the Navy, in erecting fortifications for the protection of the country; in extinguishing the Indian title to lands; in Indian annuities; in improving harbors; in pensions to disabled and Revolutionary soldiers; constitutes the great drain on the public purse. Who are those creditors and officers of the Government? Are they not of the people? The Government itself belongs to the people. The revenue raised, is by and under the authority of the people. The money, when received and collected, is the property of the people. When paid out and disbursed, it goes into the hands of the people. Yet, we are gravely told that this bill "establishes one currency for the Government, and a different and inferior currency for the people." The character of creditor and debtor is constantly fluctuating—changeable as it is, that of private citizen and officer is yet more uncertain. To-day, an individual may hold the most exalted office in the Government, and to-morrow be a private citizen; and so e converso, to-day a private citizen, and to-morrow the Governor of a State. Yet, in either situation, he is neither more nor less than one of the people.

The Constitution protects every citizen in the reception of the legal currency only, in the liquidation of debts due him. All the branches of this Government, united with all the branches of all the State Governments, under the Constitution, could not make aught but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of a demand. The united action of the whole could not compel the humblest citizen to accept and take bank notes in payment of a debt due to him. Yet the highest attribute of sovereignty in the Government is to be surrendered, and the people, in their aggregate capacity of rulers, are to be coerced to receive bank notes in payment of their dues. How void of foundation in truth is this objection. The act of 1789 provided "that the duties and fees to be collected by virtue of this act ,shall be received in gold and silver coin only." At that time there existed, and were used as currency in the business of the country, the bills of credit of the several States, and the notes of several State banks then in being. This established the Treasury currency, "in gold und silver only." The act of 1790 pursued the same policy, in similar language. The act of 1791 creating a Bank of the United States, extended the Treasury currency to the bills or notes of the said corporation, payable on demand "in gold or silver coin." The resolution of 1816 was the first legislative act recognising the reception of the notes of State banks convertible at the will of the holder into the precious metals, in payment of debts due the Government. From 1789 up 1816, this policy was not arraigned as creating a discrimination between the Government and the people, or as an attack upon the credit system, or as an assault upon the State banks. These objections, now so clamorously urged, are the growth of latter times. By the passage of the bill, the Government will have the control of its own means and the command of the funds in its possession wherewith to liquidate its debts in a medium of uniform value, instead of the promises to pay of corporations, who, at a moment, by suspension, can render them unavailable. It will have a tendency to increase the specie circulation, and retain in the country a metallic basis, on which the every day business of the small trader, the laborer, and the mechanic, may rest with perfect security. So far as its influence operates, it will restrain importations, and in some measure check the spirit of wild adventure and speculation in foreign goods, which has on various occasions produced such deleterious effects on the industry of the country. The restraint upon importation will act a a stimulant to the domestic manufacturer; inasmuch as it will afford him a certain market, and a fair price, for the manufactured article. The effect it may produce on the currency of the country attaches to the measure a deep and extensive control. The National Government cannot directly interfere with the issue of State banks. Incidentally, in the arrangement for the collection, safe-keeping and disbursement of the revenue, it may produce an effect, calculated either to increase their issues, and swell the circulation of their paper, or to restrain them within safer bounds. The ascertainment of the evils inflicted upon the community by our paper system of currency, and the causes thereof, inevitably point to the course of policy demanded by the best interests of the country. These evils consist in its instability, and its sudden tendency to immense expansions and sudden and ruinous contractions. Whatever checks these tendencies must produce salutary effects. Will this bill produce this consequence? A demand for specie to the amount of the revenue and expenditures of the Government, will be constantly kept up. This will compel the banks to be more cautious in their issues in the commercial cities, and to keep in their vaults a larger quantity of specie in proportion to their circulation. Their caution will act upon the country banks. This restraining influence, so far as it exists, will be salutary. True it will reduce the profits of banks, but this is inevitable in any process of reform that may be adopted to purify and renovate the system. The withdrawal of the public money from the mass of capital on which banks discount and issue paper, will do more to restrain the over-issues of banks, and produce stability and uniformity of currency, than all the other provisions of the bill.

The consequences of this restraint on bank issues and circulation, although highly advantageous to the nation, lessons the profits of banking. Hence it is natural to find those who are deeply interested in swelling the dividends and profits of the State banks, opposed to the Independent Treasury plan. Their pecuniary interests influence their judgment, and control their actions. This accounts, in part, for the deep and deadly hostility which has been exhibited towards the measure. It is in truth a struggle between the holders of stocks and the other classes of the community. The former, though much less numerous than the latter, possess such powers of combination and unity of action, that they are enabled to hold the conflict in doubt. Having time at command, they meet, consult, advise, and act in concert. Possessed of immense wealth, they control a large portion of the public press. The avenues of information to the people, being thus subject to the stock interests, convey such intelligence as is calculated to advance and sustain the policy of those who maintain the press. This admixture of individual pecuniary interests into the political conflicts of the day, has tinged them with a bitterness and personality, unfavorable to the permanency of our beautiful and admirable polity. To this is to be traced the increased licentiousness of the press: to which superadd the intense thirst for office and political power, and you have a key which lays open the causes, and makes bare the motives which has converted this hall into a gladitorial arena.

The settlement of those financial questions that draw into the vortex of political strife all the business of the community, is among the most desirable results that can be anticipated by the passage of the bill. It will give peace to the agitated elements and stormy passions of party. Men will settle down to their business with the certain hope that industry and enterprise will better their situation. Every well regulated Government should foster and cherish this desire in the citizen to advance his prosperity as the source of perpetual progress in civilization. That desire transports the imagination of man in the future.

THE PUBLIC FINANCES.

REMARKS OF MR. CAMBRELENG, OF NEW YORK.

In the House of Representatives, June, 1838—On the bill to modify and repeal certain provisions of the deposite act of June, 1836.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that, at an earlier period of the session, he would have moved to refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means. He should have preferred adding some of the salutary provisions of the Sub-Treasury bill, restricting public officers, prescribing their duties, and protecting the revenue by additional guards. But the mere proposition of any of the sections of that bill, he was sure, would alarm gentlemen, and produce debate, and there was no time now to hear denunciations or discuss amendments.

He thought the bill ought to be acceptable to both sides of the House. The first section removed the restriction in the act of 1836, on the receipt of the notes of banks issuing notes of a less denomination than five dollars since the 4th of July, 1836, and placed the banks which had resumed specie payments on a footing with the Bank of the United States and other banks which had resisted the resumption. The second section proposed to repeal the provisions of the same act, establishing the State bank deposite system, which had been, so far as that system was concerned, rendered mere nullities by the general suspension of specie payments; which event brought into operation other provisions of that act, the last of which placed the public money in the keeping of the Treasurer of the United States, according to the act of 1789.

He was at a loss to discover what part of the deposite act of June, 1836, worth struggling for or against, remained to produce so much excitement on either side. The law prohibits the Secretary from employing almost every bank in the Union, and whether the State bank deposite provisions are repealed or not, the effect will be essentially the same. The first section makes it "the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to select, as soon as may be practicable, and employ as the depositories of the money of the United States, such of the banks incorporated by the several States, by Congress for the District of Columbia, or by the Legislative Councils of the respective Territories for those Territories, as may be located at, adjacent or convenient to, the points or places at which the revenues may be collected or disbursed," etc.

The banks then employed were to be continued as depositories. Once employed, the Secretary was not authorized to discontinue them as depositories, or to withdraw the public money from their keeping, unless, as is provided for in the eighth section, "any one of said banks shall fail or refuse to perform any of said duties as prescribed by this act, and stipulated to be performed by its contract; or if any of said banks shall at any time refuse to pay its own notes in specie if demanded; or shall fail to keep in its vaults such an amount of specie as shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be, in his opinion, necessary to render the said bank a safe depository of the public moneys, having due regard to the nature of the business transacted by the bank."

This case unexpectedly occurred in May, 1837, and this section further and expressly provides that "in any and every such case, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue any such bank as a depository, and withdraw from it the public moneys which it may hold on deposite at the time of such discontinuance. And in case of the discontinuance of any of said banks, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress immediately, if in session, and if not in session, then at the commencement of its next session, the facts and reasons which have induced such discontinuance."

The late deposite banks have forfeited their right to be employed as depositories of the public money. The Secretary has discontinued them as such, and, in September last, reported to Congress. His authority under this act, as it respects these banks, is exhausted. The power has returned to the source from whence it was derived—the Congress of the United States; and it now rests with that branch of the Government to determine what measures, if any at all, shall be adopted in regard to them. There is no provision whatever in the Deposite act of 1836, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to employ again any such bank, under that act, as a depository of the public money. Its repeal cannot, therefore, in any manner affect the late deposite banks.

Far from being authorized to employ, under this act, these banks, the same section provides that, "in case of the discontinuance of any of said banks as a place of deposite of the public money for any of the causes hereinbefore provided, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to deposite the money thus withdrawn in some other bank of deposite already selected, or to select some other bank as a place of deposite, upon the terms and conditions prescribed by this act." The condition of the banks of this country rendered this provision a nullity. The Secretary found it impracticable to execute the law and place the money in other banks of deposite; for the fifth section of the same act expressly prohibited him from selecting or continuing any bank "as a place of deposite of the public money which shall not redeem its notes and bills, on demand, in specie," or "which shall, after the 4th of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, issue or pay out any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars."

These two provisions excluded every bank in the United States from Canada to Texas, or the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico, and especially at all the great points where our revenue was collected. A bank or two in the interior, and a few savings banks, may have escaped the prohibition. It would, however, be difficult to find in any State in the Union any bank, though it may not have suspended specie payments, issued notes or bills under five dollars, or may not have been a bank of issue at all, which did not "pay out" during the suspension, the notes or bills of other banks or corporations of a less denomination than five dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury is consequently, by these restrictions, prohibited from employing almost every bank in the Union, and it is not easy to perceive what interest they have in resisting the proposed repeal of the deposite act of 1836.

But, sir, I have now to refer to another, and by far the most important, provision of the act of 1836, especially as it regards the power of the Secretary of the Treasury over the public money, and the employment hereafter of any bank not already employed under the provisions of that act. Under the provisions already referred to, the Secretary was authorized to select deposite banks, to discontinue them, to report to Congress his reasons for such discontinuance, and to place the public money in other banks. These duties have all been discharged except the last, and that was wholly impracticable. Here the power of the Secretary of the Treasury under the act of June, 1836, was exhausted. Another provision, being the last clause of the eighth and same section, took effect, and transferred the keeping of the public money to the Treasurer of the United States in the following words:

"In default of any bank to receive such deposite, the money thus withdrawn shall be kept by the Treasurer of the United States according to the laws now in force, and shall be subject to be disbursed according to law."

This provision of the act of 1836 has been executed; the public money is in the custody of the Treasurer "according to the laws now in force," and is "disbursed according to law." Such is the end of the deposite act of 1836, so far as it regards the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to employ State banks, under that act, as depositories of the public money. The act of 1789, the foundation of the Sub-Treasury system of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public revenue, is revived and confirmed by the act of 1836; and until Congress repeals that provision, and the act of 1789, they must remain the law of the land. The power of the Secretary of the Treasury relates to the "collection," not to the "keeping," of the public money, which is given, by the act of 1789, to the Treasurer. That act became the law in 1837, when the provision referred to took effect; and the Secretary has no power to set it aside. He cannot, by mere construction, undo what has been done according to law, and take the public money from the keeping of the Treasurer of the United States, deposite it with banks, and revive the State bank deposite system. This power now rests exclusively with Congress. If banks are hereafter to be employed for any purpose, the authority must be found in the several powers given under acts which were in force prior to the existence of the deposite law of 1836. This is, and must remain, the law of the land; and no "lamentations here or elsewhere," to excite alarms for party purposes, can change it. It depends upon no veto, nor in any manner upon the will of the President or of the Secretary of the Treasury. They are bound to execute the law, and dare not disobey it. The Sub-Treasury, or the collection, keeping, and disbursement of the public money by our own officers, must continue, till our existing laws are modified or repealed.

What prospect is there of any modification of our financial laws—of our concurrence in any new plan for collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public revenue? None, sir. The two Houses are at variance, and a majority even here cannot agree on any plan whatever. The National Bank, State bank, and special deposite systems have been each and all rejected. The Sub-Treasury is undoubtedly the strongest measure here and abroad. Whenever and wherever an issue may be made between that and any one of the various plans proposed, it will be ultimately triumphant. There is, however, but one issue between parties, and that is, whether we shall employ agents who hold their offices under the authority of, and are responsible to, the people; or others, responsible alone to stockholders from whom they derive their appointments; whether our public money shall be devoted to public use, or surrendered to banks to add to their profits and embarrass trade. The issue is now, as it has been, and will be, whether we shall confide in a Government of our own choice, or submit the administration of our affairs to the dominion of a National Bank.

Until this great issue is decided, we must have some system; and as we cannot concur in the principles or details of any other plan, we must submit to the laws as they are. By the failure of the State bank deposite system, and the nullification of that law, we have returned to the constitutional point from whence we started; and all that is now required, are judicious laws for regulating the duties of our public officers, and more perfectly guarding our revenue. Whether the deposite portion of the act of 1836 be or be not repealed, is not material. The only important provision now in existence, and which has superseded the others, is the last clause of the 8th section of the act, which puts aside banks as the keepers and disbursers of the public money; and, dropping all future intervention of the Secretary of the Treasury under that act, expressly directs that the public money "shall be kept by the Treasurer of the United States according to the laws now [then] in force, and shall be subject to be disbursed according to law." If the twelve sections were repealed, the revenue would be collected, kept, and disbursed "according to the laws in force" prior to the passage of the deposite act; and if they are not repealed, the same laws are in operation.

The act of 1836 clothes the Secretary of the Treasury with no authority to revive the system then proposed. His powers are prescribed in the act; he has discharged his duties under it, and exhausted his authority. He cannot revoke the last condition of that act, nor can he revive its provisions without new and express authority from Congress. If these provisions are not superseded and extinguished, that officer would at this moment possess extraordinary powers. By the first section of the act, it is made the duty of the Secretary to select banks "adjacent or convenient to the points or places at which the revenues may be collected or disbursed; and in those States, Territories or Districts in which there are no banks, or in which no bank can be employed as a deposite bank, and within which the public collections or disbursements require a depository, the said Secretary may make arrangements with a bank or banks in some other State, Territory or District, to establish an agency or agencies, in the States, Territories or Districts so destitute of banks, as banks of deposite; and to receive through such agency such deposites of the public money as may be directed to be made at the points designated, and to make such disbursements as the public service may require at those points.

What would have been the operation of this section but for the last clause of the eighth section? or what would it be if the Secretary could now revive the act? It is said that a few banks, among others the Bank of Missouri and the Bank of Wheeling, have not violated the provisions of that act, though I doubt whether they have not "paid out" the bills or notes of other banks or corporations of a less denomination than five dollars. But, suppose either of these banks had not, under such a construction, it would have been, and would still be, the Secretary's duty to make arrangements with the Bank of Wheeling, or of Missouri, to establish agencies throughout the Union to receive and disburse the public money. If such be the true construction of the act, it would be his duty to make arrangements with some one of the new free trade banks in New York to establish agencies in almost every State of the Union. But such is not the law. The case provided for in the act of 1836 has occurred. Deposite banks coming within all the provisions of that act were not to be found, and the public money has gone, according to the last and express condition of that act, into the custody of the Treasurer of the United States. It cannot be drawn from the depositories, created under the act of 1789, to be placed in banks, under the deposite act of 1836; the former having superseded the latter in all the collection districts throughout the Union, with very few exceptions. Until the law is changed, the deposites must be made under the authority of "the laws in force" prior to the existence of the act of June, 1836.

So far, then, as it regards the question of reviving a State bank deposite system, it is not very material whether the first twelve sections of the act of 1836 be repealed or not. With the exception of a very few districts, where little revenue is collected, the depositories are all established under the laws in force prior to the act of 1836; and if the remnant of that act were repealed, we should have, as we ought, one system for the whole Union.

The first section of the bill is more important. It removes the restriction on the receipt of the notes of banks which have, since the 4th of July, 1836, issued notes of a less denomination than five dollars. There is, under existing circumstances, an obvious propriety in removing the discrimination which now exists.

The notes of banks which have zealously labored to resume specie payments, cannot be received in payment of public dues, while those of the Bank of the United States and of other banks, which have uniformly resisted the resumption, would be received. Whatever opinion may be entertained of the receipt of bank notes of any denomination, all such discrimination should, for the present, be removed. We can agree on this point, if we cannot concur in any judicious financial plan. The next most important measure for the public is an adjournment. When this session ceases, we shall not be disturbed by ridiculous alarms about the Sub-Treasury, spread abroad by those who never read a section of the bill. It is now in operation, and the longer we try it the better shall we appreciate its simplicity and economy. No other system can relieve trade from an embarrassing connection with Government, and render our Treasury independent of banks.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

REMARKS OF MR. ATHERTON, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

In the House of Representatives, June, 1838—On the bill making appropriations for the continuance of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. ATHERTON said he would detain the House but a few moments. The gentleman from Kentucky who reported the bill [Mr. POPE] had several times, in his remarks, referred to the bill as coming from the Committee of Ways and Means. So far as this circumstance would indicate that a majority of the members of that committee approved of the principles of the bill, it might lead to an erroneous conclusion. It was his impression that a majority of the members of the committee were not favorably disposed to the bill, and that they had merely suffered it to be reported because it referred to a subject in which many members of the House felt much interest, and which was proper for the consideration and decision of the House, and which they would hardly expect the committee to retain from them, or to reject. At any rate he could speak for himself, and say that such were the views by which he had been governed, if he had voted to report the bill; for he was decidedly opposed to its passage.

He considered the system of internal improvement by the General Government as intimately connected with a high protecting tariff, as it is called; for when such a system is undertaken, what limit can be fixed to the expenditures to be made in pursuance of it?—what limit to the revenue to be raised for the purpose of being wastefully lavished in those expenditures?

Notwithstanding the ingenuity and ability manifested by those who have supported the bill, he had listened in vain for arguments to show that the system which the bill proposed to continue was either just and expedient, or constitutional. Sir, what has been the main argument relied upon to prove to us that we ought to pass this bill? Why, that the Government is bound by the obligation of a contract to do this, and that not to do it would be a breach of faith. This consideration was most strenuously urged by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. EWING,] and was also touched upon by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. POPE.]

When he heard gentlemen of acknowledged ability rely mainly for the support of a measure on an argument utterly and entirely destitute of any foundation—an argument which had long since been abandoned by the leading advocates of the measure, he was induced, at once, to conclude that reasons, with them, were not as "plenty as blackberries," and that the measure was, by this very circumstance, rendered liable to just suspicion. And he must say that it was with some surprise that, at this time, he heard this pretended obligation brought forward gravely to the notice of the House, and the House told they were bound, "by contract," to continue this system. Sir, the person who may be considered the founder of this system of internal improvements, or, who, if not its founder, has certainly been, and is still, its most distinguished advocate—the individual who has carried his doctrines in favor both of the constitutionality and expediency of the system to a greater extent, perhaps, than any other statesman in the country, the champion of the "American system," so called, has, long ago, dismissed this argument as unjustifiable and untenable. He has abandoned this position. He has rebuked and repudiated this pretence as having no foundation. To show this, he [Mr. A.] would trouble the House by reading a passage or two from the Register of Debates.

In the debate on the bill "for the continuation and repair of the Cumberland road, in the States of Ohio, Indiana and Missouri," which took place in the Senate of the United States, in the year 1835, Mr. EWING of Ohio, an advocate of the bill, said:

"That the Senator from South Carolina seemed to have forgotten the origin of the appropriation, and had overlooked what was in justice due to one of the States of the Union. It must be recollected that, when Ohio was admitted into the Union, and her constitution was formed, there was inserted in it a clause appropriating two per cent. of the produce of the sales of the public lands, within her limits, for the making of roads leading to the State; and Ohio, in consideration of this provision, agreed not to tax the lands belonging to the United States for five years."

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, also an advocate of the bill, in the course of his remarks on the subject, used the following language:

"Now he did not concur with the gentleman [Mr. EWING] that Ohio could, as a matter of strict right, demand of the Government to keep this road in repair; and why so? Because, by the terms of the compact under the operation of which the road was made, there was a restricted and defined fund set apart, in order to accomplish that object; and THAT FUND MEASURED THE OBLIGATION OF THE GOVERNMENT. It had been, however, LONG SINCE EXHAUSTED. There was NO OBLIGATION then on the part of the Government to keep the road in repair."

He (Mr. A.) would, then, repeat his surprise that an argument so untenable, and which has thus been repudiated by the champion of the internal improvement system, should be now brought forward and urged in favor of that system, and his conviction that the friends of the system must be hard pressed for arguments.

He agreed with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] that it was a matter of congratulation that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] formerly a friend of the system of internal improvement, and, even now, believing in its constitutionality, should have come out frankly and openly against its continuance. The gentleman from Kentucky acknowledges that he has become convinced that the system is partial in its operation, and properly says that he wishes to treat all sections alike; and if any system is to be adopted, he calls for a system of equal justice. Sir, these arguments have again and again been urged against the adoption and the continuance of this system, and he was happy to know that some of those formerly its friends, have become convinced of their truth. The gentleman from Kentucky also says, that, to stop this system, cuts off patronage from the General Government, and throws it into hands that can exercise it better; and that expenditures thus carried on are wasteful and extravagant, compared with the execution of projects carried on by States or prompted by individual interest. This is most true. These arguments he (Mr. A.) remembered to have seen stated in what he considered a most unanswerable speech, delivered on this floor many years since by a distinguished representative from Virginia, now on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. He was happy that the force of these arguments was now admitted, and that the lessons of experience had caused the abandonment of this odious and unjust system by some of those who had honestly heretofore supported it.

The argument that there is any obligation resulting from a compact binding us to pass this bill, is shown to be utterly futile. The system of internal improvements recognised in the bill is admitted by its former friends and supporters to be unequal, partial, and unjust. Why, then, he would ask, shall this system of inequality, partiality, and injustice, be continued? What excuse can be imagined for its continuance? What reason can we give to our own consciences, or to our constituents, for passing this bill appropriating nearly half a million of dollars, and more especially at the present time? Are we about to lavish hundreds of thousands on this unjust and unequal system, because our Treasury is full to overflowing? No, sir. The time has passed when those in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution need strain a point for the purpose of getting rid of an accumulating revenue, which they fear may lead to the dangerous principle of distribution. The present is the time for stopping this vast and wasteful expenditure on this unjust system. If any excuse were needed for such a determination, the present situation of the country would fully afford it. Not only so: it demands so imperatively such a result as to leave no excuse for a contrary determination.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. EWING] had cautioned the gentleman from Kentucky not to "rob other States." Mr. A. did not conceive that the rejection of this bill would be to rob the State of Indiana or any other State; but he did think that to pass the bill would approach much nearer to such a consummation. To carry on such a system is to tax one State for the benefit of another. It is to "rob" one section of the Union for the benefit of another.

The gentleman from Indiana has further said that this system is necessary for the purpose of cementing together our Union.

Mr. A. believed the best method of cementing the Union, was for the General Government to keep itself within its constitutional sphere, and not to exercise powers which did not belong to it, in pursuing a partial and oppressive system, the effect, if not the object of which is to build up one section of the Union at the expense of another. For, he must say, he viewed this system of internal improvements by the General Government as not only oppressive and partial, but as unconstitutional also. Its injustice and unequal operation, when attempted to be carried out, would go far to convince him that the wise men who framed the Constitution, never intended to confer such a power on the Federal Government, unless, indeed, the clause of the Constitution can be pointed out, which explicitly and unequivocally confers it. Not only does experience show the injustice of such a system, but it would seem to him, that from the beginning, it must have been foreseen by those who considered the subject, that such a system could result in nothing else than injustice. It would have given him great satisfaction, if gentlemen who advocate the bill, instead of referring to the names who have sustained or have seemed to sustain this system, to prove its constitutionality had pointed to the clause in the Constitution where the power is conferred. It can surely do no harm to go to the Constitution itself; for "a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles," is necessary as a safeguard to our liberties, and to prevent the Constitution itself from being overwhelmed by glosses and constructions, and the opinions of those who not only were not its framers, but who have no sentiments in common with those distinguished patriots.

The consequences to which the possession of this power by the General Government must lead go very far to show how cautious we should be about hastily admitting its existence. Mr. Monroe's name had been mentioned as among those in favor of the exercise of this power. Mr. A. believed it was in 1822, that Mr. Monroe returned with his veto a bill, establishing toll-houses and toll-gates on the Cumberland road, on the principle, that if Congress possess the power to enter a State, interfere in their domestic concerns, to erect toll-gates upon their roads, to establish a system of police over them, and inflict penalties for its violations, and create tribunals, before which such offences might be tried, every barrier between Federal and State authority would be at once be prostrated; and so far as entire jurisdiction over the post roads of the country, for the purpose of levying tolls to keep them in repair, could extend, that this principle would lead to perfect consolidation. Yet the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, to whom he had alluded, contended, certainly with great plausibility, that the power to make the road admitted, the rest all followed as incidental to it, and as a necessary consequence. And he [Mr. A.] would again say, that it would give him great pleasure if the advocates of this power would point out that particular clause in the Constitution, from whence they deduce it.

The people of the State he had the honor, in part, to represent, as long ago as 1822, had thought this subject of so much importance that they expressed, through their Legislature, by a most decided majority, their utter disapproval of the system of internal improvements by the General Government, both on account of its unconstitutionality and its inexpediency. They have ever been uniform in this opinion. They feel and know its injustice and inequality and oppressiveness. They have made their own roads, unaided by the General Government; they are willing to do it. Why, then, shall they be taxed to make roads in the flourishing, fertile, and rich States of the West? Sir, it is monstrous and wicked injustice. Let it not be thought that the opposition of his constituents to this system arose from any hostile feeling towards the Western States. Far from this. No longer ago than the last year they instructed their Senators, and requested their Representatives, in Congress to use their exertions to procure "such graduation of the prices and limitation of the sales of the public lands as will best promote the settlement and actual occupancy of the same." Their soil is not like that of the fertile and luxuriant West; but it requires the utmost exertions of the industrious and hardy population which covers it, to subdue and cultivate it, thus serving to promote both their moral and physical energies. By those energies and unceasing industry, they are enabled to provide for themselves the necessaries and even the luxuries of life, and to spread over their borders as uniform competence and content as prevail in any portion of our favored land. They are actuated by the strongest feelings of attachment towards the inhabitants of the Western States, who, on account of the continued stream of emigration which has poured thitherward from New England, may literally be called their brethren. But justice to themselves requires that they should protest against any further continuance of this system, so fraught with evil and injustice.

He would, in conclusion, ask that the Clerk might read certain resolutions adopted by the Legislature of New Hampshire, Jan. 30, 1837, which expressed the views of his constituents on this subject.

REMARKS OF MR. CHAPMAN, OF ALABAMA,

In the House of Representatives, May 30, 1838—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill making appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida, executing the late treaty with the Cherokees, and the removal of that tribe west of the Mississippi.

Mr. CHAPMAN addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: it was not my intention originally to participate in the debate on the question now before the committee; but since remarks which I conceive to be of a most extraordinary character, have fallen from some of the gentlemen who have preceded me, it would seem to be my bounden duty to make a few observations upon this subject. Besides, the whole of the Cherokee country in the State of Alabama, is embraced in my immediate district, and forms a large portion of its territory. No other member from my own State is so deeply interested as myself; and perhaps the constituents of no gentleman from either of the other States immediately concerned, are so extensively involved in interest as my own. I trust, therefore, my peculiar position will be a sufficient apology for asking the attention of the committee, if but for a few moments.

I am not in the habit of indulging in the debates in this House; for I found, very early after I had the honor of a seat here, how little was effected by the speeches made on this floor, notwithstanding much time was spent in their delivery.

I am aware, however, that many of my constituents blame me for not more frequently taking part in the discussions; still, with a view of saving the time of Congress, I forbear, even when strongly provoked, so fully am I convinced of the total inefficiency of these efforts.

I could heartily wish that the people knew these things as well as I do myself. Then, I am sure, instead of rewarding those who consume the time of the House, and squander the public money, by long and fruitless harangues, they would select others who would talk less and think more.

I never speak, sir, for home consumption; and yet, on looking around at those empty seats, I am admonished that unless I do that it will be of little or no use to speak at all; for there are but very few present to hear me. Of this, however, I do not complain, as did the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NAYLOR,] who immediately preceded me, and whose views on the question now before us differ so materially from my own.

That gentleman rose to address the committee evidently under feelings of powerful excitement. He had a studied eulogy to pronounce on his celebrated champion, John Ross, and, in his own exalted imagination of his powers of oratory, a most withering denunciation of all who disagreed with him in opinion of that individual, or in the wild, enthusiastic, and fanatical notions he had conceived, and has just poured forth here with so much vaunting. When he got up, he flattered himself that this was the fit occasion, this the very day, hwen immortal honors and glory would await him, and crown his success; but after he looked around on this floor, and gazed with an earnest stare at the galleries above, as one about to "cut fantastic capers before high Heaven," and seeing few to witness his grand display, in rage he cries, "I am mad!" Again he struggles in these loud and boisterous strains, as if he designed to reach a distant ear, or bring even "spirits from the vasty deep." He calls for all to come! They heed him not, and he still says, "I am mad!" With such enthusiasm, in a manner so frantic, displayed on an occasion when sober reason ought to have been predominant, accompanied, too, by such a declaration so often repeated, I almost resolved that it would be improper to notice or comment on any thing that fell from one in a state of mind so perfectly irresponsible; nor shall I, at least to the extent I well might do, but will suppress much of what had occurred to me by way of retort.

That gentleman stated in the outset, that he had carefully read and examined the volume of documentary papers relating to the Cherokee affair, containig more than 1,000 pages, and found not one insinuation against John Ross; and before he concluded his speech, read a letter, [he might have found many,] directly contradicting the assertion he set out with. Now, sir, I did not rise to investigate the character of Ross; for I do not perceive what bearing it has on the present inquiry; but without pretending that I have been as industrious as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to read this entire volume, yet I have seen enough in it to convince me, that the subject of his extravagant eulogy, in his intercourse with this Government, has acted with great duplicity; and with a view to advance his own interest, at the sacrifice of the Cherokee nation.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his zeal for the Cherokees, seems to have been so far carried away by his sympathies, as to forget altogether that he is a citizen of the United States; but turns a deaf ear to the cries of his own fellow-citizens. He comments with great severity, on the conduct of two individuals, who had acted as attorneys for the Cherokees, for having aided in bringing about the late treaty; charging it as a violation of their trust, and a breach of their professional engagement. He looks to one side of the case only, and has shown himself to-day truly an advocate of the Cherokees, instead of a cool and reflecting legislator. When the heart-rending tale is related to him of his slaughtered countrymen by savage cruelty—when the bloody scene of Indian butchery—the work of the tomahawk and scalping-knife, is exhibited to his view—when he sees the torch applied to the houses of his own fellow-citizens, by savage hands, in the still hour of midnight, and defenceless and innocent women and children, while attempting to escape, massacred by the light of their burning habitations—he heeds not, but says: "I am engaged as the advocate of their oppressors, and will afford no relief." Great God! is this the language of an American statesman? Does the fate of this nation depend on such counsellers? Have the sons of our gallant fathers, who fought to establish this Government on principles of equal rights, and which has for more than half a century moved on prosperously, so degenerated in patriotism? I trust the gentleman will, now that he has blown off his steam and become cool, reconsider his rash determination. I leave him, therefore, to pursue his own sober and dispassionate reflections.

I pleaded my excuse for trespassing on the time of the committee, because of the deep interest my constituents have in the subject now under consideration. That interest is involved only so far as the bill and proposed amendments provide for ap prop iations to suppress hostilities in the Cherokee country, and for removing that tribe west of the Mississippi, in conformity with the treaty of December, 1835.

These appropriations are opposed by gentlemen, as they allege, on the grounds that no treaty has in fact been made, and that the instrument purporting to be a treaty is not binding on the Cherokees, and ought not to be enforced.

I propose to examine this subject, by considering, first, the rights and obligations created by the treaty as we find it now; secondly, the circumstances under which it was made; and, thirdly, the rights and duties of this Government towards the Indians in the absence of treaties, in carrying out the policy, designed to be, as it evidently is, beneficial to them as well as to the United States, by removing the tribes West, beyond the limits of the said States.

The treaty-making power in this country is vested in the President and Senate, and, as a greater security that they shall be made only after great caution and deliberation, the concurrence of at least two-thirds of that body is required by the Constitution. When thus made they become, in the emphatic language of that instrument, "the supreme law of the land." No State has power to make treaties, but every State, and the people of all the States, are bound by them when made by the President and Senate. It is true that Congress may refuse to make an appropriation, if an appropriation be necessary to fulfil the obligations created by a treaty; but this does not affect the binding force of it, or destroy rights created under it, if constitutionally made; for, since the States and the people are bound by a treaty made in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, it follows that all the rights they acquire by it are absolutely vested, and cannot be defeated by any act of this Government, or its omission to perform the duties required by the treaty. Indeed, the States not only have the constitutional power to maintain their rights thus acquired by such means as may be necessary, but it becomes their duty to protect their citizens in the rights they have under such treaty.

In the present case a treaty was made with the Cherokees, approved by the President, and ratified by more than two-thirds of the Senate, at that time consisting of a majority of members opposed to the Administration. By the provisions of the treaty, five millions of dollars were stipulated to be paid by the United States to that tribe, for their country, and, consequently, an appropriation for that purpose became necessary. By an act of the last Congress, this appropriation, together with the amount required for the expenses attending the negotiation, was made by a vote of more than three-fourths of the House of Representatives; and a considerable proportion has been paid, in conformity with the terms of the treaty. By a compact between the United States and Georgia, as soon as the Cherokee title to the lands within the limits of that State was extinguished, by a treaty made in the constitutional mode, it became immediately vested in Georgia. Accordingly, she has parcelled out the lands among her citizens, and made them titles thereto, with an assurance of possession on the 23d of May, the time stipulated by the treaty that the Indians should have been removed. The Cherokees having failed, on their part, to execute the treaty, but still continuing in possession of the country ceded away, it becomes necessary for the United States, in compliance with their obligations under the treaty, towards the States concerned, to carry it out in good faith; and to do this, the appropriation proposed by the bill under consideration is asked.

From this brief statement of the facts of this case, it would seem difficult to ascertain how a question could possibly arise as to the propriety of granting the sum required; still we find gentlemen here who do oppose the appropriation, and assert that there is no obligation on the part of this Government to execute the treaty. They say, also, as I have before remarked, that the treaty was fraudulent and void—not binding on the Cherokees, or the United States, and of course conveyed no rights to the States concerned, or the people of those States. I might inquire where these gentlemen find the power for this House to supervise an act done by the President and Senate, (who are, by the Constitution, invested with the authority of doing it,) for the purpose of declaring the act void? We all know that if the corruptions charged in making this treaty, really existed, this House has the constitutional power of instituting proceedings to punish those who have been guilty; but still the act remains in force. I might, indeed, admit all that to be true, which gentlemen say, as to the manner of making this treaty, and yet defy them to show how this House can avoid the obligations under it, or refuse to the States and the people concerned, the vested rights they have acquired. The States and the people have yielded up certain powers to the General Government, and obliged themselves to submit to all obligations created by the exercise of those constitutional powers. The States have no intercourse, as such, with foreign states or Indian tribes. Can it be said, then, that when a solemn treaty has been constitutionally made, involving them in certain duties, from which they cannot escape, but must strictly observe, that the corresponding rights they have acquired shall not be respected? It seems to me that gentlemen overlook the main questions involved in this inquiry. They forget that States, and citizens of those States, are concerned in this matter. It has been insisted that this treaty ought to be abandoned by this Government; and, further, that if any attempt should be made by the States interested to protect their citizens in the possession of the lands in the Cherokee country, against the power of the United States, it will be nullification. Gentlemen have attempted to draw a distinction between nullification in theory, and nullification in practice, and call it practical nullification to resist the power of this Government, when attempted to be exercised in the case supposed. I, Mr. Chairman, have always repudiated the doctrine of nullification, as I have understood it. I have considered myself, and have been considered by all who have known my course, a Union man, devotedly attached to the union of the States, and ready to submit to the authority of the General Government even in doubtful questions of constitutional power; yet, I must tell these gentlemen and the country, that according to the definition they have given of practical nullification, I am a practical Nullifier. For one, I am ready to resist any attempt on the part of this Government to drive the citizens from the country acquired from the Cherokees by a treaty, made according to the provisions of the Constitution. I repeat, what has been often said, that we cannot go beyond or behind the treaty; to do so, would lead to endless difficulties and uncertainties.

The power of this Government to make the treaty of 1803 with France, by which we acquired Louisiana and all the territory then west of the Mississippi river, was doubted; the exercise of a similar power now in relation to the proposed annexation of Texas, is, by many gentlemen from a certain quarter of this Union, positively denied—would it be contended by any one, that in a question of right, growing out of the treaty with France, (when made in the courts or in Congress,) the constitutional power to make that treaty could be inquired into at this day? And yet, the objections now made against the Cherokee treaty are of the same character. In a claim for land arising under the treaty with France or Spain, (by which much of our territory was acquired,) brought before Congress for confirmation, as well might the question be made, whether these treaties were constitutionally entered into, or whether fraud was not committed in the negotiations, as to go into an inquiry now, in relation to the manner of making the late treaty with the Cherokees, after it has received all the sanctions required by the Constitution.

Having, as I conceive, shown that we cannot go beyond the treaty; that it is, according to the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, binding on all parties, and absolute, so far as rights have been acquired under it, it would, for all the purposes of this inquiry, be needless to examine the other remaining propositions; but I promised next to consider the circumstances under which this treaty was made, in order to set the subject in a proper form before the country.

The policy of the Government in removing from the States all the Indian tribes within their limits, has been deprecated and denounced by gentlemen who have addressed the committee in opposition to the appropriation; and the late President of the United States has been charged with having originated it, with a view of gaining strength in those States. I do not consider it necessary, at this day, to inquire into the expediency of this measure. It did not originate with General Jackson, for it had been earnestly recommended by most of his predecessors as being essential to the safety, and, indeed, the very existence, of those tribes within the limits of the States, as well as to the interest of the States themselves. In urging this policy, General Jackson did no more than to repeat what had been recommended by others; but at a time when the propriety of it had become much more manifest, he told these Indian tribes that it was incompatible with the rights of the States for them to continue within their constitutional limits, and pretend to set up an independent form of Government, and that this Government possessed no power to control the States in extending their jurisdiction over them, if they did so continue. He warned them of the consequences of refusing to avail themselves of the liberal terms proposed by the United States to them, if they would consent to remove from the States. Before this, Georgia had already extended her jurisdiction over the Cherokees, and had enacted the highly penal and sanguinary laws on that subject which we have heard read during this debate. The Indians complained of oppression, and, indeed, their situation was such as to require immediate action, or all traces of them as a nation were likely to be blotted out.

Under these circumstances, a strong feeling sprung up in that nation among those who looked not to their own private interests, but to the good of the nation as such, in favor of concluding a treaty, as the only means of rescuing their country from the dangers by which it was threatened; and negotiations were set on foot for that purpose accordingly. Urged by the strongest necessity, delegates were elected in 1834 by the Cherokee people, who came on here to conclude a treaty. John Ross, then one of the delegates, with others, proposed to treat; but insisted on terms so exorbitant, ($20,000,000) that they were at once rejected by the President. He then addressed a communication to the Secretary of War, dated the 28th day of February, 1835, in which he says: that the President had before that, in conversation, expressed a willingness to give for the country, as much as the Senate would sanction, and expressed his desire to make the submission to the Senate, composed, as he well knew, of a considerable majority of his (Ross's) political friends. To this proposition, the President acceded: and in conformity with it, the question was submitted to the Senate, for the decision of that body. The Senate with a full understanding of the subject, having perfect knowledge of the value of the Cherokee country, with strong feelings of partiality towards that tribe, and especially for John Ross, determined that five millions of dollars was the full value of the country, and recommended a treaty on that basis. This was officially made known to the delegation of which Ross was the head, with the most confident expectation that a treaty would be at once concluded, according to the promise referred to; but, instead of carrying out his agreement, Ross commenced a studied course of diplomatic correspondence, replete with every evidence of prevarication, until, finally, he refused to consummate a treaty, under the pretext that he and the rest of the delegation had no power to do so; although he had, at the commencement of the negotiation, represented that they were invested with full authority for that purpose. He, however, promised to submit the proposition to the Cherokee people, and use his influence to have it adopted. This deceitful conduct on the part of Ross, determined the President not again to open negotiations with him here, but to submit, through commissioners, the terms that had been settled upon, on the basis of the five millions, (and which had been drawn up and signed by John Ridge and other delegates, then in this city, favorable to a treaty,) to the Cherokees in their own country. Commissioners were appointed and sent into the country, who commenced negotiations there; but, instead of exerting his influence to conclude a treaty as he had promised to do, Ross exhausted all his powers to prevent it; and, at a meeting held for the purpose of deliberating on this important subject, he caused resolutions to be adopted that cut off all hopes of effecting a treaty, endeavored to destroy those who had been favorable to it in the nation, and had a delegation appointed, of whom he was one, to visit this city, although he had been positively and repeatedly told that no negotiations would be held with him, or any other delegation for that purpose, here.

Under these circumstances, the party in the nation favorable to a treaty, seeing no prospect of settling the controversy through the agency of Ross—their country and their people groaning under calamities that had been borne for years, but which had accumulated until they become almost insupportable—finding that unless some means could be adopted, and speedily adopted, their nation must soon become utterly destroyed, and their people, already degraded and demoralized, scattered to the four winds without "a habitation or a name"—being without institutions, without law, or a regularly organized system of Government, they determined to march boldly to the breach, and hazard their lives in an effort to save their nation. This could only be done by a treaty, and no treaty could be made but in the nation, and there only on the basis of the five millions which Ross himself had before agreed to accept, as has been before remarked. A meeting of the people was called at New Echota in December, 1835, at which from one to five hundred assembled, and appointed the delegates who concluded the late treaty. That delegation, before concluding on the terms of the final treaty, however, and in conformity with their determination at the meeting, used every effort to obtain the co-operation of Ross and his delegation to that treaty, or any other within their power, with such alterations or modifications as might be agreed upon here. Indeed they offered to yield up to Ross and his party the whole management of the negotiation, if he would agree to conclude a final treaty; but that individual obstinately refused every proposition; and unless the Government would agree to give him the price he asked, and place the money under his control, he objected to any arrangement, however advantageous to the nation at large. There being no other mode of relieving their country from the difficulties in which it was placed, partly, too, by the conduct of Ross in refusing all terms for an amicable adjustment, these New Echota delegates, and others sent by the Cherokees west to act in making a treaty, concluded the one which has been approved and ratified, as I have before stated. These individuals have been denounced by gentlemen as traitors to their country—as having been bribed to sell it. Where do gentlemen find the evidence of this corruption and bribery? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARLAN] has ascertained that they have been paid for the time they were engaged in the negotiation, their expenses incurred for travelling here, etc.; and this is his proof of corruption and bribery. Can that gentleman point to any case where an Indian treaty has been concluded, without such payment? And have all been by bribery and corruption? John Ross and his delegation were paid $13,000 for their time and expenses here, on the same occasion. Were they paid for opposing the treaty? Why did not the gentleman tell us how much Ross and his delegation, who were here to prevent a treaty, were paid? I am quite certain they received as much as the others, in proportion to numbers, and the time they were engaged; and if the gentleman will look on the other side of this picture, he will find it so. It has been charged and repeated, that the Cherokees, with the exception of very few, are opposed to this treaty; and a pretended remonstrance which has been sent here, purporting to have been signed by eighteen thousand persons, is the proof of the fact. I am not prepared to say that a majority of the Cherokees did give their assent to this act; nor is it likely, among all the treaties heretofore made with Indian tribes, that this has been the case. Indeed, from the character of the people, it is impossible it could be, where so much ignorance prevails. Perhaps, even among the Cherokees, who are admitted to be much the most intelligent of all the tribes with which we are acquainted, there are not more than one in ten, perhaps not one in twenty, who have intellect enough to understand any thing about it. John Ross, we all know, speaks for the ignorant Indians, but without their will. Of those who know or take any interest in the affairs of the nation, counting all, east and west, I have strong grounds to believe that a majority are favorable to the treaty. The statement that eighteen thousand have protested against it, is absurd; for it appears, from the official report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that there are only about 14,000, men, women, children, slaves and all, of the nation east of the Mississippi. How, then, could eighteen thousand be found capable of protesting? About one-third of that number have removed West, of whom it is not pretended that any have signed the memorial. Less than one-fourth of the fourteen thousand East, with the seven or eight thousand West, would make a majority of the whole nation.

It appears, from the documents before us, that a great many who opposed the treaty, as well as most of those in favor, have taken the benefit of it, and removed West. Among those are perhaps one-half of the delegation who were here at the time the treaty was concluded. We have already paid a considerable part of the money stipulated to be paid by the provisions of the treaty, and incurred great expense in its execution. The price agreed upon for the Cherokee lands is not only more than we have ever paid for any Indian territory heretofore, but far above the real value of the country; and the mode of distributing the amount, although not satisfactory to John Ross, who wishes to control the money, as he now does the ignorant part of the nation, is just and equitable, with a proper regard to the rights of the people. From this brief statement of the affair, I am at a loss to conceive where gentlemen find evidence to justify the denunciations they utter against this Government, and all who had any agency in making the treaty. They charge it to have been corruptly and fraudulently made, because John Ross and those under his immediate control have refused to sanction it. I insist that a full consideration has been paid for the country, and indeed more than it is worth. A majority of the nation, capable of understanding their interest, have consented to, and availed themselves of, the provisions of it. It has been said by several gentlemen who undertook to calculate the losses which the Indians will sustain by the treaty, that, admitting the sum of five millions to be the value of the lands in a wild state, yet, the improvements in the country, when paid for out of that sum to the individual Indians, will exhaust nearly the whole.

The valuation of improvements, under the treaty, is not all they receive. After they have secured the amount of that estimated value, (which by the way, I understand, has been generally very high,) they sell out their places to our own citizens, (the possessory right,) for a further sum; in many cases, I have known as much as the fee-simple title would be worth.

If gentlemen call it ruinous to the Indians, to remove on the terms I have stated, they can find most of the white settlers in the country willing, on terms less favorable, to remove themselves.

But independent of the obligations under the late treaty, I contend, that by the power which the United States have reserved to themselves in various treaties heretofore made, to guard and control the affairs of the Cherokee people, so as to promote their interests and prosperity, we were bound under the circumstances I have mentioned, to remove them, as the only means of saving the nation from utter annihilation. And this duty, it seems to me, ought not to be omitted, even when the Cherokees, deluded as they are by the false and selfish counsels of an ambitious chief, refuse their consent to such a measure.

Much has been said of the absurdity of a sentiment read from a pamphlet written by a Cherokee, (Elias Boudinot,) in defence of the late treaty, that "if one hundred persons are ignorant of their true situation, and are so completely blinded as not to see the destruction that awaits them, we can see strong reasons to justify the action of a minority of fifty persons to do what the majority would do, if they understood their condition—to save a nation from political thraldom and degradation." From my acquaintance with Mr. Boudinot, and from the pamphlet alluded to, and other articles written by him, I can say that, as a man of intelligence, he would not suffer by a comparison with John Ross, who has been so much complimented. The sentiment alluded to, when applied to an intelligent community, each individual participating in the administration of the Government, may not be orthodox; but in reference to the great body of the Cherokees having no understanding or will of their own, but influenced by a self-created ruler, it is by no means absurd. In this pamphlet (from which I have obtained some of the other facts I have stated,) it is alleged that, according to the custom of the Cherokees, the chiefs are to be elected every four years.

In 1830, Ross was elected, but since that time they have held no election; so that, although he calls himself the principal chief, and pretends to exercise all the power, as if he was really, as he frequently says, "the constituted authority of the nation," his office, in fact, has long since expired, and he now acts as a self-created dictator. Influenced by his fixed determination to prostrate those Cherokees who have negotiated with the Government, encouraged by that spirit of fanaticism which he has observed prevailing among a portion of our own people in a certain quarter to make common cause with him, or any others who will war against the interest of the South, he has been, for two years, causing petitions to be sent here against the treaty, without the least prospect of setting it aside, until the time has expired when, by the treaty, the Cherokees were to have removed. The victims of his mischievous policy, who have been misled by him, will soon discover that the hope he has held out so long has been false and illusive, and that, in despite of his opposition, the treaty will be executed.

With the controversy between the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] and the State of Georgia, I have nothing to do, any further than it involves the rights of Alabama. The able and efficient representatives from Georgia here are fully competent to the task of defending their own State. The Gold'n claim, about which so much has been said by that gentleman, is exclusively a Georgia matter, and I profess no information on the subject; but I beg leave to remark that if, on the mere testimony of John Ross, given before the committee of investigation last winter, when he was exerting himself to set aside the treaty, and laboring under prejudices and motives of strong personal and political feeling, a high functionary of the Government and an officer of this House are to be suspected of corrupt conduct in bringing about the treaty, to secure a supposed interest in the claim referred to, we have but little chance of escaping assaults on our reputations.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) threatens to "castigate" Georgia, if she attempts to assert her claim to that portion of her territory, in possession of the Cherokees. When does that gentleman, who professes so much jealousy of the increasing power of the General Government over the States, and prides himself on his State Rights principles, find authority to "castigate a sovereign State," in the constitutional exercise of her jurisdiction within her own limits? But the sentiment uttered by the gentleman from Virginia, which struck me with most astonishment and alarm, was that in reference to the numerous petitions and remonstrances sent here against this treaty, when he says, that he has been exerting himself to bring the petitions of the people to bear upon the action of this House. These petitions, no doubt, flow from the same northern horde of fanatics and false philanthropists, who, regardless of the constitutional rights of the Southern States, or the danger of a dissolution of the Union, have been so long exciting Congress with their petitions on another delicate subject, with which they have nothing at all to do. A feeling of hostility to the South, causes the movements on both these questions, so nearly allied in their imaginations.

Can the gentleman from Virginia, whose constituents are so deeply interested in preserving our constitutional rights, free from the influence of the fanatical spirit that has sprung up of late, favor an attempt, evidently designed to be in aid of the great object of destroying the citizens of the Southern States? How can he aid them in their efforts in the one case, without in some degree giving countenance to their movements in the other? Especially since many, no doubt, consider them so intimately connected, as to constitute a common cause.

I know the gentleman from Virginia does not design this, because he has been foremost in protesting against such movements on this floor; but although he may not apprehend such effects, I confess I am not without some apprehension, when I see the subjects treated by others as identified. I am happy, Mr. Chairman, that amidst all the complaints of oppression towards the Indians, no one has charged the State I represent, in part, of any such harsh measures. Indeed, I am sure that no such charge can, with justice, be made. Our policy in relation to the Indian tribes has ever been marked with great justice and humanity. So jealous have been our legislators of their rights, that instead of placing them on inferior terms to our our own citizens, they have passed laws guarding against any frauds upon them, by requiring at least two witnesses to any contract by our own citizens, to enable them to recover of an Indian, while one Indian may enforce a contract against a white man, by proof of one witness. The courts of Alabama were open to them, and every means provided to prevent any violation of their rights. Our citizens have been much more oppressed by the acts of officers under the Federal Government in the Cherokee country, than they have been by the people of Alabama. Their intercourse with the Cherokees has been perfectly friendly, and they live on terms of strict harmony.

However great the inconvenience may be by the longer residence of the Cherokees, I undertake to say that my constituents desire their removal in a manner best calculated to avoid cruelty and add to their comfort. For myself, I can say that I would deprecate any difficulty with them, if it can possibly be avoided. I am friendly with all with whom I am acquainted; and, while I am aware that gentlemen are greatly deceived when they consider that the delegations who visit this city are a fair specimen of the nation generally, yet I admit that they are more intelligent than any other tribe, and many of them not only generous and hospitable, but really eminent for talents.

Entertaining these views, I am in favor of adding the amount recommended by the Committee on Indian affairs to the appropriation, in order that the treaty may be executed as early as possible in a mode most agreeable to the Indians and without a resort to arms. I have never feared, however, that the Cherokees would commence hostilities against our citizens. They are too familiar with our strength and resources to begin a contest against such fearful odds.

I shall vote for the further appropriation also, because, according to my understanding of the treaty, the expense of removal was to be paid by the United States; and inasmuch as the amount set apart for that purpose falls far short of what will be required, it should be made up by an additional appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, when the late message of the President on the Cherokee subject, which caused so much excitement in both Houses of Congress, was received, I voted against the motion to lay it on the table, because I thought that course wanting in respect to the Chief Magistrate. In this vote, I differed from most of those with whom I generally act, although, like them, I considered the communication unfortunate at the time, and calculated to keep up the delusion among the Cherokees that John Ross will succeed, if not in setting the treaty aside, at least in effecting some modification, so as to prolong the time.

I do not understand, however, that any modification or alteration is in contemplation; indeed, the Executive possesses no power to alter the treaty. I cannot discover, from the correspondence of the Secretary of War, that any delay in the removal has been promised; but as the States interested are to be consulted, such is likely to be the construction of this proceeding among the Indians who have so much anxiety on the subject. I trust, however, that there will be no delay in executing the treaty, beyond what may be dictated by a proper regard for the rights of the Indians, and consistent with humanity.

The time has arrived when the States interested have a right to demand their speedy removal. Longer delay would be destructive to the best interest of the States, injurious to the citizens residing in the country, and above all, to the Indians themselves, who would be decidedly the greatest sufferers by procrastination. Their own security requires that they be immediately removed; every feeling of humanity calls for it; and those who sympathise so deeply with them, ought to be foremost to hasten the time of their departure.

Remarks of Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, NILES, and SEVIER, in Senate, June 30, 1838, on the the amendment of Mr. WRIGHT, to strike out the first twelve sections of the Deposite Act of 1836, as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. CLAY denounced the amendment of the Senator from New York, as monstrous in itself, in as much as it proposed to take the whole revenue of the country from its legitimate keeping, and place it under the control of the Executive. As fast as that monster, the Sub-Treasury system, had been strangled by the people, it was sought to revive it in that body. What would be the consequence of the adoption of the amendment before them, but to destroy all law, all usage in relation to the keeping of the public money, and to substitute in their stead, Executive discretion? Could the Senate be prepared for any such dangerous step? Mr. C. then briefly alluded to the causes which had incapacitated a portion of the banks from becoming the depositories of the public money, and maintained that the original measure as introduced by Mr. WEBSTER would have the most salutary effect, while the amendment would place the whole Treasury of the nation at the will of a single individual. That these banks had issued notes of a less denomination than five dollars, was the offence which brought them under the interdict; but was it an offence? The General Government had no power to regulate their issues; the banks owed allegiance to another authority: to the States under whose control they were. In a season of the most calamitous reverses of fortune, (into the causes of which he would not then take time to inquire, though it was pretty generally conceded that the Government had been mainly instrumental in bringing about that melancholy change,) the people had risen almost en masse, and asked the Legislatures to authorize these very corporations to issue small notes, as a relief measure to the country. These banks were, in the main, as solvent as any banks in the country, and were certainly safer places of deposite for the public money than individuals could be. Mr. C. thought that, if confidence were exhibited on the part of the Government, and something like a disposition shown to aid these institutions to remove the impediments in their way, rather than the hostile feeling so constantly evinced towards them, that the happiest results would soon follow. Mr. C. contended that the only measure which would regulate, and keep in a sound and healthful manner the foreign and domestic exchanges of the country, was a National Bank; such a one as had been destroyed to make room for the introduction of those wild and reckless experiments upon the currency, which had ended in one universal and wide-spread ruin of all the great leading interests of the country.

Mr. C. said that in some remarks he had made the other day in relation to the Sub-Treasury, he had taken occasion to say that it was dead, dead, dead, like any other malefactor that had been hung, drawn, and quartered. An honorable Senator from Connecticut had said, in reply, that he did not understand that triple kind of death; that one death was sufficient; but denied that it was even once killed. Why, the Senator himself was dead, but he did not know it; and he, Mr. C. should not be at all astonished if he were to get up in his place and deny it, as he had before done the death of the Sub-Treasury. But, sir, the gentleman is dead, said Mr. C. Notwithstanding, it is true he is not buried yet, but will be on the 3d of March, 1839. His epitaph is written, Here lies the body of ———, (I will not name him, Mr. President; that would be unparliamentary,) lamented by his friends, especially his political friends! His course was marked by great ability and attachment to the tenets of the Jackson party! He acted as postmaster at Hartford, from whence he was translated to the Senate, where his career, though short, was no less brilliant and distinguished! When instructions came from his own State, he had the firmness and manly independence of character to get up and denounce the measure as unworthy of the Legislature, and to read a long and elaborate argument against the right of instructions! He was finally voted out of the Senate by the Whig Legislature. Peace to his remains! There let him rest.

Mr. NILES remarked that he was gratified that the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] had offered an amendment to repeal the first twelve sections of the deposite act of 1836; he had prepared an amendment himself for the same purpose, which he intended to have offered, but was rejoiced that one had come from a quarter whence it would be more likely to be successful. In his remarks yesterday on the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] he took occasion to say that he did not believe that we could stand on the maimed and disabled deposite act of 1836. Most of the banks in the country were disabled from becoming depositors under that act; if it remained, then, as it was, its operation must be unequal; and inequality, whether so or not, always had the appearance of injustice. The finances must be managed upon different principles; in some States there would be deposite banks, in others none, as all had become incapacitated.

He desired no partial system; he did not wish to attempt to put in operation machinery which had not only once broken down, but which was still disordered, and the operations of which must be obstructed and partial. To remove the disabilities which had attached to the banks, would be to restore the deposite system which had failed; it would be to go back instead of advancing. To decline to do it, and yet suffer the act to remain in force, would be to stand upon a point too technical for him. He did not wish to occupy such a position, and to have the management of the finances depend on penalties and forfeitures. He did not want the fragment of a law, and did not feel willing to be found hanging, like the unfortunate passengers of that ill-fated boat, to the wreck of the Pulaski, or any other foundered vessel. He wanted no fragment of a law, which was objectionable enough when sound. He could not, however, admit the justness of the reasoning of the Senators from Virginia and New York, [Messrs. RIVES and TALLMADGE,] that there would be any injustice done to the banks of any State by the partial operation of the law. Whatever may be claimed by some, nothing could be more clear than that the banks never had any right to the public revenue. No one, he believed, would go so far as to contend that the act was passed for their benefit, or that it vested in any bank any rights whatever. If they have placed themselves in such a situation that they cannot be depositories, it is the result of their own acts, and they cannot complain. The system was designed for the management of the revenues of this Government, and the advantages to any bank were only incidental. No bank had any right to the use of the public funds; and if all the banks in a State had become incapacitated to become depositories, it was no injustice to them or the State. Where there is no right, there can be no injustice. The objection to the act is, that it will occasion a partial and unequal system of conducting the finances, banks being employed in some States and not in others. The system should be uniform, and governed by general principles. This is the objection to the law as it is, and, to remove this difficulty, we must either remit the penalties, or repeal the act. He much preferred the latter.

Sir, what is the condition of this question? Our financial system has been deranged by the failure of the banks. After a long trial, Congress has been unable to agree on any law. It is divided into the advocates of three different plans, and neither can obtain a majority. The country is probably in about the same situation. What, then, is to be done? Why, things must remain as they are; we must fall back upon former laws; upon the act of 1789, and the joint resolution of 1816. The act of 1836 has become obsolete; it cannot be brought fairly into operation without additional legislation. It has become so partial and unequal that it cannot be regarded as a law in force. But it is said we can make it complete by further legislation. So we could adopt either of the schemes which the great body of Congress prefer, by further legislation. But the difficulty is, a majority will not unite in favor of either of the three schemes. As long as this is the case, what other course is there but to fall back on the ancient laws?

It is argued, that because Congress has not been able to pass the Independent Treasury bill, or to establish a National Bank, it has therefore decided that the deposite bank scheme shall remain for the present. This is entirely incorrect. A very large majority of both branches of Congress, it is evident from their votes, are opposed to that plan. It has but few supporters in either House. Is it right, then, that it should be revived, when it requires an act of Congress to give it life? Did it appear that there was a majority of Congress in favor of the principle of the act of 1836, there would be some grounds for saying that the impediment which has arisen, ought to be removed, so as to carry out the principle. But such is not the case. The true state of things is, that Congress cannot agree in relation to either of the three schemes, and that the State deposite plan is much the weakest of the three. Under these circumstances, is it not proper to fall back upon the act of 1789? And what objection is there to this? Cannot the finances be safely conducted under the authority of that act? Were they not so conducted from the foundation of the Government down to 1816?

But we are told that this will be placing them in the hands of the Executive, without law; that they will be subject to no other regulation or control, but Executive discretion. The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] asks whether we are prepared to take the revenues out of the custody of the law, and place them in the hands of the Executive without law? He already begins to sound the tocsin of alarm about Executive discretion. He, Mr. N. did not think the country would be alarmed at the cry of Executive discretion. It was an alarm note, which they had often heard within a few years; and if it ever carried terror with it, he believed that day was past. Is Executive discretion more alarming now than when Hamilton was at the head of the Treasury? This was no new discretion; no new scheme; it was as old as the Government. This discretion in the management of the finances had existed from the origin of the Government, until 1816; and even after that, a discretion existed in the Executive, to remove the public funds from the Bank of the United States—a discretion which was exercised in 1834, and justified by the nation. A law under which the finances had been managed during the greater period of the existence of the Government, without occasioning complaint, he did not think conferred on the Executive any alarming discretion. For one or two years at least, the revenue will not exceed, if it is equal to the expenditure, so that there will be no occasion for special legal enactments, in regard to depositing it any where. It will be safe in the hands of the Treasurer, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Under the circumstances in which we are placed, the deposite act of 1836, being deranged, disjointed, and partial in its operation, he thought the better course was to repeal it, and rest upon the act of 1789, and the joint resolution of 1816.

Sir, said Mr. N. before taking my seat, I must notice some personal remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] which I heard with surprise, as I had supposed that the account between him and myself was balanced, at least for the present session. He has, however, seen fit to open it, under circumstances somewhat unexpected; and it remains for me to endeavor to balance it again. In allusion to the comment I made yesterday upon the remark of his, that the Sub-Treasury bill was something more than dead; that it was thrice dead; the Senator says there was nothing extraordinary in the remark, although it may have appeared so to me, because I am myself dead, but not sensible of it. I suppose he means dead in a political sense. It might be so; but unless Providence should order otherwise, he thought that about the year 1840, the Senator would find that he [Mr. N.] was still alive, and kicking. If, however, it should prove that he was politically dead, time would show that he had only gone in advance of others, as he was quite sure that in 1840 he should have the honorable Senator's company. He did not know what connection there was between the announcement the Senator had now made, and an occurrence which took place last night. He alluded to a sort of mock funeral procession, got up, he supposed, by some of the Senator's friends of the "decency party," and intended as a burial of all his enemies. How far this had reference to himself he could not say; but as the Senator had announced his death, he supposed he must be one who was interred with the Sub-Treasury bill. The proceeding was certainly very creditable to the Whig party, and proved their claims to all the "decency."

Not content with his death and burial, with such high honors, the Senator had volunteered to write his epitaph, which did pretty fair justice to his memory. He saw no special reason to complain of it; indeed it had laid him under an obligation to the Senator, which he would endeavor to satisfy on the spot, and in kind. It speaks of my having been postmaster at Hartford; of being translated from thence to the Senate; of having, during my brief career here, discharged my duties with distinguished ability, particularly in supporting the Sub-Treasury bill; of having read an able argument against the right of instruction; and finally of being voted out by the Whig Legislature of my State. This was all very well; he saw nothing to except to it. His public life was so short and humble, that all his deeds might be summed up in the brevity of an epitaph. It was not so with the Senator; his long and distinguished career would require something more than an epitaph; it would occupy an ample space in history; and he really hoped he would be so fortunate as to have his great deeds recorded by a pen worthy of so illustrious a subject. His posthumous fame, he hoped, would fare better than his living merit, which had suffered some by falling into the hands of a bungler, who, in the extravagance of his panegyric, made the faults of his hero the more conspicuous.

Mr. N. said he owed the Senator something more than an epitaph, and would honor him with a brief biographical notice of his public life. The honorable Senator commenced his career early, and its dawn was illumined by bright hopes and noble aspirations. Like other aspirants for power, his early life was distinguished by an ardent love for the people, and strong professions of devotion to popular rights. He was a Democrat of full blood; a Jeffersonian Democrat; a strict constructionist; a believer in the right of instruction; a friend of economy, and a mortal enemy of a National Bank and all aristocratic institutions. He talked loud and eloquently about the rights of the people and the rights of the States, and denounced the Federalists and all their works.

But notwithstanding all this zeal and love for the people, it would seem that there was at the bottom a little love for self, as we are informed by a distinguished but eccentric statesman of the Old Dominion, now no more, that the moment he entered the halls of Congress, he fixed his eyes upon a certain white house in this city, which appears to have had a peculiar fascination upon his mind. This early sentiment soon became a ruling passion, and "grew with its growth, and strengthened with its strength." This supreme object of the Senator's ambition has been a sort of ignis fatuus, which has led him on from point to point, from one measure to another, through political bogs and quagmires; but if he has sometimes sunk into the mud, he has hitherto had the good fortune to get out and on to his feet once more. The pursuit of this darling object has led him to mount, booted and spurred, numerous political hobbies; all of which he rode very hard, and all of which he rode down, without reaching the object of his pursuit. A high tariff, the American system, internal improvements, and the Bank of the United States—all these have been rode down and broken down; but the latter, having the most bottom, the Senator has mounted again, and is now riding as furiously, and with as sanguine hopes of success, as at first.

With his eye steadily fixed on his object, and never for a moment withdrawn, the Senator watched the progress of events, and waited rather impatiently, the movements of the troubled waters of politics; the derangement of parties in 1824, was thought to present a favorable opportunity. The Senator entered upon the Presidential course, with high hopes and sanguine expectations. The result, however, showed that vaulting ambition had overstepped the bounds of probability, as he was not only beaten, but distanced, and driven off the course the first heat. But although beaten himself, and thrown out, he was still placed in a favorable position; and in regard to the election in the House of Representatives was generally supposed to have the game in his own hands. And here there is one point of resemblance in the Senator's life and my own, as he has described it. He says I have made an able argument against the right of instruction. If I have made an argument, he has done much more; he has furnished an example; and however able the Senator might regard his (Mr. N's) argument, he was very sensible that its weight and influence would be trifling, compared with the conspicuous example of the Senator. His State had instructed him to vote for the Western candidate; but overruling their decision, he voted for the Eastern candidate, and threw himself into the "line of safe precedents." In his new position, and with his new associate, having postponed indefinitely the "deferred question of veracity," he struggled manfully, but unavailingly, for four years, against the strong current of public opinion. This struggle terminated in the memorable contest of 1828, in which the Senator did not, it is true, take the field in his own person, but as a political partner with his Eastern associate, a sort of joint stock concern of ride and tie, in which each put in an equal moiety of the stock in trade, with an understanding that they were to divide the profits. But Old Hickory had too much capital for the firm, which failed, and of course had no profits to divide.

But not discouraged by these two defeats, the Senator never for a moment abandoned his object, but immediately commenced rallying his broken and scattered forces all over the country for another contest. This came on in 1832, when he again took the field, aided by a powerful ally, the Bank of the United States, against the most heroic and powerful captain of the age. The conflict was tremendous, although at no time doubtful. The Senator and his Bank allies were beaten, routed, and driven from the field, with the loss of bag and baggage.

Well, now, Mr. President, if it is true, as the Senator says, that I am politically dead, I have an example in his own case that a politician may be dead and yet be alive. He has been killed off three times, and yet we find him alive and at his post, struggling as manfully as ever in pursuit of the same high prize. At no former period, perhaps, has he had such high hopes and expectations, or deemed his prospects so bright. To his eye the horizon appears perfectly clear, with scarcely a cloud to obstruct his vision. His old Bank allies are still with him, more ardent in the contest than ever. After a long struggle of thirty years, he seems to suppose that the golden prize is nearly within his reach. Fearing the consequences of a fourth disappointment, I have on several occasions heretofore warned him not to be too sanguine, and have reminded him that appearances are often deceitful, and that public opinion is at all times extremely unstable. I have told him that recent changes had been the result of a panic and pecuniary difficulties, brought upon the country by the banks, and that they would, in all probability, be as transitory as the causes which had produced them. But I do not suppose my advice will be heeded, although given in the most friendly spirit, and with the most anxious desire to save him from the consequences of a fourth disappointment, which might prove very serious.

Well, now, sir, in regard to this fourth and last trial, for I think this will be the last. I might foretell its result without much hazard, but I will not do that. I will not turn prophet, lest, like many others, I should be found a false prophet. But, sir, I have an opinion, a settled conviction, on this subject, the result of some little observation and reflection on past and present events. My deliberate opinion is, that the Senator will again be defeated, and that he is destined to suffer a fourth and last political death. About the year 1840 the Senator, as well as myself, will, in all probability, be much at leisure, when I intend to avail myself of his kind invitation and pay him a visit amidst the quiet shades of Ashland, where, I doubt not, he will find more real enjoyment than in the turbulence of political strife, which has characterized his long career.

From this brief notice of the prominent events in the Senator's life, it is evident that his public career will occupy a broad space in history; yet it is equally clear that the gist, substance, and marrow of the whole, may be summed up in about the same brief words as were used by him to record the events of my public life. I believe that this biography is a fair offset against his epitaph; but, in order to have the account not only balanced, but paid off in kind, I will conclude it by offering an inscription, which I think will do pretty good justice to his memory, and which he and his friends can use or not, as they may see fit. It is as follows, short and simple:

HERE LIES THE HON. ———, [I leave it for them at the proper time and place to insert the name,] A DISTINGUISHED ORATOR, A DARING POLITICAL ASPIRANT, AND FOUR TIMES A DEFEATED CANDIDATE FOR THE PRESIDENCY.

Mr. SEVIER rose merely for the purpose of giving his reasons for the vote he was about to give, and said that, as he was the only one of the party with whom he almost invariably acted, that would vote against the proposed substitute of the honorable Senator from New York, for the proposed amendment of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, he must ask the indulgence of the Senate for a single moment, in assigning his reasons for the vote he was about to give. It was not the interest of the bank which influenced his course; so as they alone were concerned, he cared nothing about the question. The directors of the bank of the State he had the honor, in part, to represent, had unanimously refused accepting the deposite of the public money. From this decision he inferred that the Bank of Arkansas considered the deposite of the public money a matter, at best, of but trifling importance. His objection to the substitute was, that it proposed to repeal all law upon the subject of the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public money, and to leave it, as it was by the act of 1789, solely at the discretion of the Executive. This was a discretion he was unwilling to entrust to any Executive. It is a discretionary power that the late Executive was unwilling to have confided to him; it is a discretionary power which the present Executive is unwilling to have conferred upon him; and, for one, he was as unwilling to confer such enormous power and responsibility in the hands of any one, as they were.

We have tried our favorite expedients, said Mr. S. upon the subject of the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public money, and we have been defeated on those measures; and the only question for us now to decide is, shall we fall back on the defunct act of 1836, or leave the whole revenue of the country, as it was by the act of 1789, under the unlimited control and discretion of the Executive? Of these two evils, I prefer the former. I cannot reconcile it to my feelings to place the revenues of this country, without law, in the hands of any one.

I regret, sincerely regret, for many reasons which I will not now take up the time of the Senate in enumerating, that I cannot, consistently with my notions of public duty, go with my party on this occasion. I cannot feel myself justified in going home to those to whom I owe every thing, and whose interests in part I represent on this floor, and say to them, that I have left the whole revenues of this country, without law, at the unlimited discretion of the Executive, although that Executive is one of their choice, and in whom they have every confidence that they ought to have in any Executive.

I asked of the Senate but a moment's indulgence, for an explanation; and I will not abuse that indulgence, by uttering another word upon the subject.

SPEECH OF MR. DUNCAN,
OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, July 3, 1838—On the bill to establish an Independent Treasury.

Mr. DUNCAN addressed the House as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: Advanced as the session is, and aware of the vast quantity of unfinished business of an important character, both of a private and public nature—important to individuals and important to the public—I feel a diffidence in asking the attention of the House while I offer a few ideas which I entertain in relation to this measure; and let me assure you, sir, I do it not from any disposition to make a vain show, or from a pride to be heard in the great councils of the American Government for, let me assure you, that when I rise to express myself on any subject, I rise from a sense of duty that I owe to those I represent, and always with embarrassment and great diffidence, knowing, as I do, that I am surrounded by those of far superior talents and acquirements to those of my own—statesmen who grace this country, and who would be an ornament to any country and to any people. No, sir; it is the importance of the measure, and a paramount duty, that induce me to ask your attention at this time.

Almost on every question of a general nature, when and where it is possible to drag a party feeling, party facts, and party arguments into discussion, it is universally done. I know of no instance where this has not been the case. Political effect is the object; but it seems to me that the result will hardly warrant the design, more especially when it is done at the expense of private and public business, and of the public money, at so great a disproportion. We have witnessed the sacrifice of day after day in the discussion of a simple appropriation for the Florida war, or, rather, such was the measure before the House for discussion; and yet no man could tell, by the debate, what the question was. The whole song was the extravagance and profligacy of this Administration; the ruin of the people; the financial embarrassments of the country; the destruction of our manufactories; the prostration of the merchants; the ruin of the banks, and forfeiture of credit and confidence—all by the base and wicked mismanagement of this Administration, and the one that preceded it. When will the people learn intelligence from these modern Whigs? From the commencement of the Government to this day, (while the Democracy administered the Government) this has been the cry—an imbecile Administration, corrupt men, and ruinous measures! This kind of Federal howling has been so long kept up, and is so well understood to be a kind of hypocritical, crocodile Federal whimpering that it is no longer regarded or seriously listened to. Such murmuring and such fault-finding are the characteristics of Federalism, and have their foundation in a want of confidence in the honesty, integrity, and capacity of the people to govern themselves, or, which is the same in a representative Government, of electing those who are capable of making, adjudicating, and executing the laws. All the Democratic Administrations that have existed since the organization of our Government, have been administrations of the people. They have been elected by the people, and not from personal attachment on the part of the people to those they elected, but upon principle, and upon some one or more important questions in which the whole community felt a deep interest.

Such was the fact in relation to the present Administration, and to denounce an Administration which has been elected under such circumstances, and to denounce the measures that the Administration are bound, by the nature of its official existence, and every obligation connected with its duty, to carry out, is revolutionary in its character, subversive of our free institutions, and an indirect denial or denunciation of one of the most important and fundamental principles of our Government, viz: the capacity for self-government and the right to govern.

Such, I say, is the situation of the present Administration, and such its obligations. Certain great and important and leading measures were commenced by the Administration—measures in which a great majority of the American people felt an interest in carrying out, and for that purpose was the present Chief Magistrate elected: so was the Vice President, and many of both branches of Congress. One of the most important of those measures was the improvement of the national currency; and for that purpose was this measure introduced. Its object is declared by its title, its various provisions. Its importance and utility I am about to discuss; but the very circumstances that made its introduction not only necessary, but absolutely obligatory, on the powers that be, constitute the strongest argument in its favor. It provides that the Government shall collect, safely keep, and disburse its own revenue, and, further, that it shall gradually establish the constitutional currency as the Government revenue currency; that is, gold and silver. The suspension of specie payments by the banks, while they had upwards of $30,000,000 of the public money in their possession, (not a dollar of which could be procured for a time) produced the separation which this bill contemplates; and vast injury, loss, and expense to the Government, by this unwarrantable measure, and, I might say, high-handed fraud, practiced upon the Government, makes it important that this unnatural and dangerous connection never should be revived. And the great reduction in the value of bank paper, produced by the want of intrinsic value and public confidence in it, makes it important to the highest interests of the people that the Government should return to the collection for its revenue to the only currency known to the Constitution.

Sir, I am in favor of continuing the separation which exists between the Government and the banks—a separation produced by the malfeasance of the banks themselves. I think the connection that has existed heretofore was in violation of the Constitution, and most unquestionably impolitic and unwise, calculated to embarrass the Government and derange the currency. I say I believe such a connection to be unconstitutional. Permit me, sir, here to lay down a proposition, to which I may have to recur in the course of my remarks. It is this: that Congress can exercise no constitutional power, except that power be plainly authorized by expression contained in the Constitution, and that the State Legislatures can exercise all legitimate legislative powers not expressly prohibited by the Constitution of the United States and the Constitutions of their respective States: that is to say, Congress can do nothing but what the Constitution expressly authorizes, and the State Legislatures can do every thing (not morally wrong) that is not expressly prohibited by the Constitution.

We find in the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution these words: "No money shall be drawn out of the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." This provision proves, beyond a doubt, that the framers of the Constitution intended that the General Government should have an independent Treasury, and in that Treasury the public funds should be kept, and from it they should be drawn out by law. There is no other meaning that can be given to this provision, without running into absolute absurdity and ridiculous sophistry. If it be a fact that the General Government shall have a Treasury, it is equally true that the revenue should be kept in that Treasury; and it is a violation of the Constitution to keep the public money in any other place than the public Treasury.

Sir, it is of the first importance that the Government should be in actual possession of its own money, so that it may draw that money "in consequence of appropriations made by law;" but money deposited in the banks is not in possession of the Government, but is a debt due the Government by the banks, and it cannot be drawn as the Government may want it, and as "appropriations made by law" may authorize its application, of which we have had sad experience in the high handed transactions of the banks in May, 1837. But the act authorizing the deposite of the public moneys in the local banks contained another violation of the Constitution. By one of the provisions of the Constitution, (article 1, section 8,) Congress shall have power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, but Congress has no constitutional authority to lend money. In that deposite transaction, the Government money was lent to the banks for a per centum—a consideration. But another evidence of the unconstitutionality of the act authorizing the deposite of the public money in the local banks, will be found in the fact that Congress cannot interfere with the local banks to make deposites in them, without the consent of the banks, or, in some instances, the States, and in some instances both the banks and States. When the Government wishes to use the banks for such or any other purposes, she must, with humility, ask their consent or the consent of the States, or both, as the case may be. This kind of humility is unworthy of, and degrading to, the character of the Federal Government. Whatever is proper and right for the Government to do, she can issue her mandate to have done; and the very fact that she cannot interfere with State institutions without the consent of such institutions, or the States that create them, is the strongest evidence that she not only wants the constitutional authority, but that it is unconstitutional to do so. Hence I infer that it is a violation of the Constitution to deposite the Federal revenue in the State and local banks. But I have another constitutional objection to that act. It is, that it authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to take the notes of specie-paying banks, under certain restrictions, in the payment of the Government revenue.

The Constitution (article 1, section 10) provides that nothing shall be made a lawful tender in the payment of debts, but gold and silver. That act makes bank paper a lawful tender in debts due the Government, a violation of that provision so express and so unequivocal. The receivers of public money, when they know that bank paper can be disbursed without loss to the Government and sacrifice to Government creditors, will collect bank paper to the amount of the immediate disbursements; (they may and will frequently do it) I have no objections that they should, when it can be done safely, they being held responsible; but to make paper a lawful tender by law, which is made unlawful by the Constitution, is a violation of that Constitution. These are my constitutional objections to the financial connection of the Government with the local banks; but I believe such a connection is inexpedient, impolitic, and dangerous. Permit me, before I undertake to show the reasons that bring me to these conclusions, to deny a charge made against the Administration and the Democratic party. The charge to which I allude is, that this Administration and its supporters have declared war against the banks, and upon commerce. Sir, I can only oppose this with a direct denial, so far as I am concerned, and I am one of the warmest (in feeling) supporters of the Administration, and I believe I may venture to pronounce the charge, on behalf of those who act with me on this measure, one of the foul, false, Federal slanders of the day, conceived in a benighted brain, cultivated by a malignant heart, and given birth to by the pen of poison, and the tongue of pollution, to do its part to the destruction of the confidence of the people in this Administration. Sir, let us refer to some facts, and see whether I have grounds and evidence to sustain this indictment for slander which I have presented to the jury, (country.) When the American people (Democratic part) had determined to put down the Bank of the United States, or rather to let it expire on the limitation of its charter, it became necessary for the public deposites to be removed; and in order that the public might sustain no sudden shock from the loss of the use of them, (for they had been discounted upon while in the United States Bank,) they were placed in the local banks, where they were also discounted upon. Here, then, is a manifestation of friendship towards the local banks in giving them this great and valuable boon. But that was not all. By an act of Congress (to which I have before referred) their notes were made payable in the Government revenue, which gave them a credit far and wide, which they could not otherwise have had; which credit, as I shall show, or rather the improper use of it, has been the cause of all the pecuniary embarrassments and commercial ruin about which we have heard so much piteous whining and howlings Those advantages were extended to the bank. by the last Administration, and was sustained by the almost entire Democratic party; while the Federalists were unmeasured in their abuse, as well of the measure as of the banks themselves. The measure was denounced as ruinous to the country—and a criminal violation of the "chartered rights!" of the Bank of the United States, and the local banks were sneeringly denounced as pet institutions, unworthy of the Government's confidence, and incapable of performing the trust and the duties imposed upon them. In these predictions there seems to have been some truth; but they have performed the trust and duty to the Government and the people about as well as the Bank of the United States:—both bad enough—too bad to be again trusted. So much for the last Administration and its course towards the banks. How has it been with the present Administration and its supporters? Why, sir, the present Chief Magistrate had hardly been fairly seated in his chair, when he and every body else was shocked and astounded with one of the most violent pecuniary tornadoes that ever rolled its destructive torrents over a land, crushing and prostrating every institution in the country in its desolating sweep. (I give the Whig account.) A Government that had funds on hand to the amount of more than 70,000,000 of dollars was made bankrupt in one night; and to save the character, reputation, and honor of the nation, the Executive was obliged to call Congress together, at an expense of more than $200,000 dollars to the people. But what was the course of the Administration and the Democratic party towards the banks? War, do you think? No. The course of the Executive was indulgence to the banks and indulgence to the people. Suspend the debts of the banks, said the Chief Magistrate, and use as a substitute for Government money in their vaults, the Government credit. This was done, and the banks were saved, and the people, who were their debtors, indulged. But war is waged upon commerce. Ah! how so? During the last Administration, a system of credit was established toward the importing merchants; the same policy was pursued by the present; and when the banks suspended payment, the custom-house bonds due the Government amounted to upwards of $14,000,000. What was the course of the Administration, think you? Was it to prosecute on the bonds, obtain judgment, issue execution, expose to sale all the property the merchants had, sell them out, bed and bedding, cow and calf, dog, broom, and tea kettle, for a part of the debt, and send them to jail for the balance, as would be the course of a soulless corporation with the Shylock principles of a bank. No, sir. No, sir. No such course was pursued. What was done? Why, a bill was introduced by the Democratic party, on the recommendation of the President, to give the banks indulgence, and a like bill to give indulgence on the merchants' bonds, extending the time of payment, I think, in the first instance, four, eight, and twelve months; and, I think, in the latter, six, twelve, and eighteen months; and this, sir, is the kind of warfare that this Administration has declared against the banks and against commerce. Twice, sir, has the Government been compelled to use her credit in the issuing of Treasury notes to the amount of ten millions of dollars each time to favor the banks and the importing merchants. Who, sir, in this measure, was found wanting in kindness and good feeling to the banks and merchants? Look at your journals, sir. You will find the entire Federal vote against the measure to a man, I think; and the last bill that passed this House, (owing to the absence of some of the Democratic members,) passed by the casting vote of the SPEAKER. But for his vote, the bill which saved the country from ruin and bankruptcy would have failed. Yes, sir, the wheels of Government would have stopped from want of Treasury oil; and this great Federal fabric would now be mouldering with the fallen and almost forgotten Republics of Greece and Rome; and there were more gentlemen than one [Mr. MENEFEE] who said on this floor, in discharge of official functions, that they would rejoice to see this Government prostrated, if it would secure the downfall of this worthless and corrupt Administration.

But to return to the subject. I am in favor of establishing the Independent Treasury. I believe there is no other method by which the public money will be safe, and the Government secure at all times in its possession and use.

It must be manifest to every impartial man that there is no safety in depositing the public revenue in corporations over which the Government has no control. Give me your attention while I present you some of the difficulties and dangers that must always attend such a connection with the banks, and such an abandonment on the part of the Government over the control of her revenue, the only means by which she has to carry on her operations. I say that the Federal Government can exercise no control over State institutions contrary to their corporate privileges, or contrary to what may be the wish or desire of the several States from which they receive their charters. Hence it was, no sooner did banks suspend specie payments, than some of the States, by their Legislatures, justified them in it, though they were in possession of millions of the public money; and I believe not one State attempted peremptorily to coerce payment. Sir, what would have been the situation of the country and the Government had we been at war with a foreign nation during the suspension? The question is easily answered. Universal ruin and national degradation would have been the result. Some of the difficulties under which the Government labored during the last war must be too fresh in the mind of every true friend to his country, to desire to see the national means put from under the control of the Government, and into the hands of capitalists, who generally carry what little patriotism they have in their pockets, and have much more attachment to the means by which their wealth is augmented than to our free institutions, our national character and honor, and the equal rights of individuals. Out of the vast number of international difficulties which give rise to just causes of war, there is none, nor indeed are all put together, half so likely to produce war as violations of national commercial rights, (which involve the preservation of the rights of sailors.) It was violations of this character on the part of Great Britain that superinduced the last war, commonly called the second war for independence. Who was most interested in the defence of American commerce? We would suppose the Northern capitalists. But, sir, who was found on the side of the war? Not they. No indeed, they (with some honorable exceptions,) were found assisting the enemy, like the tories of the Revolution, aiding and abetting and performing the part of spies for the enemy, carrying on daily intercourse with them, and furnishing them with provisions and munitions of war. Every thing that could prattle, from the corrupt tory of the gown, down to the tete a tete of the cap and ribbon, was employed in denouncing the war as unjust and unholy. It was considered a crime to rejoice at the victories gained over the enemy, and the man was denounced and execrated with religious anathemas, as bringing blood upon his head, and divine judgment and wrath upon his soul, who would give aid, comfort, or support to so unjust and so unholy a cause as the American war. So odious was the war in northern estimation, that all efforts to obtain loans had to be made in secret. It was dangerous for the man who had money, and felt disposed to befriend and assist the Government, for him to do so. Hence, it was not uncommon for advertisements for loans to contain a promise that the purpose for which the loan was made should be kept secret. This was not the worst: when Ohio's frontier soil was fertilized with Ohio and Kentucky's richest and best blood—when the land was desolated, and the swamps and dense thickets were the hiding places and only home of hundreds of women and children—when the red scalping knife was hardly permitted to dry—when the farmers chests were drained of their last dollar, their barns of their last bushel of grain, and their houses of their choicest sons, to support the drooping and desponding troops, and fill up their thin ranks—it was then, when application was made to Congress for men, means, and munitions of war, the Government was derided, the war denounced, and its friends and supporters sneeringly asked "if this was the entertainment to which we were invited at the declaration of war?" and this by men now high in the confidence of a certain party. All this hostility to the war was felt and manifested by northern capitalists, and so long as the same causes exist, so long will the same effects and feelings be produced.

What, sir, would be the situation of your Government, in time of war, with your revenue in the possession of the banks, and the banks owned (as they all almost are, or their capital, which is the same,) by northern and British capitalists, with British feelings and British attachments, such as the capitalists were during the last war, and as they will be during the next. Then, sir, I think the policy bad and dangerous to connect the Government with banks, under such unequal circumstances, under such great disadvantages to the Government, and the people whose Government it is. Sir, much as I would dread, fear, and abhor a union of Church and State, I would not consider such a union half so dangerous as a union of Bank and State. The former would operate to the prejudice of our liberties, through the medium of the conscience—a very slender and a very scarce article these days of political corruption, and moral and pecuniary depravity; but the latter would operate to the destruction of our liberties, through the medium of the purse, which is the god of our souls, and divinity of our worship. Sir, since the hard and tory times about which I have been talking, one of the great parties of this country has often changed its name, but men and principles are the same.

But, sir, I am afraid to try this scheme again of giving the banks the control of the Government finances. I fear another bank explosion; then will follow the cry of panic; ruin, mismanagement, corruption, and profligacy of the Administration, will be howled, hyena like, from Maine to Mexico. Yes, sir, this is the object. It is to have another explosion, to ripen the people for a great central National Bank, about which Federalism can rally and consummate its political schemes, and establish its favorites in power. The Opposition care little about the prosperity of the local bank system; that is, the leaders of it. Their interests are too much diversified, and they are too widely spread over the country, to bring them to bear with sufficient force and power upon their political efforts. There is, in the local bank system, too great a want of concert of action for their purposes. They will take them rather than have nothing of the kind; for so far as they can be brought to bear, they answer generally a good purpose. Yes, they would even take the Conservative plan into their keeping, rather than be without the assistance of corporations in their political movements. It is a great National Bank they want, and I trust the people will not permit themselves to be gulled. The question is, a National Bank, or a complete and undivided Independent Treasury system. There is no middle ground. The half-way house (Conservatism) is now deserted; it stands in the wilderness "solitary and alone." The highway has been taken from it; its windows are shattered; its doors are broken from their hinges. The raven croaks from its chimney top by day; the owl hoots from its garret by night; the wild wolf howls from its threshold unscared; and not a solitary human foot enters it but that of the prowling midnight thief and robber. Misnamed Conservatives are now seen wandering in small, scattered remnants, like the lost children of Israel, waiting for a call or edict of admission into the Whig ranks, whom they can join without much sacrifice of feeling or principle; for the real difference between them is the difference between Twedledum and twedledee.

Although they have claimed to belong to the Democratic party, yet they never were of the true blue. They were not dyed in the wool. They were the calico Democracy. These Conservatives are an upright class of politicians. So far as my experience and acquaintance of them goes, I must pronounce them the most upright politicians I have ever seen. Indeed, they are so very upright that, let the political wind come from what point of the compass it may, whether from the North, the South, the East, or West, it never fails to incline them to the modern Whig side of the party line. Sir, I see too much of the treachery of Sinon, and too much of the cunning of Ulysses, in the Conservatives, for my purpose. Their scheme is like the Trojan horse; it is too enormous to be admitted into the Democratic city without breaking down her walls, demolishing her ramparts, and destroying her sentinels, which have defended her liberties for more than half a century. Moreover, sir, when admitted it will be found to be filled with armed Greeks, ready to open the gates to their companions in crime and in arms, who will murder your citizens, and lay waste your city. Sir, the Democracy are unwilling that this monster shall be consecrated to Minerva. But I hope for thus hurling our javelin against the side of this horse, whose hollow sound is sufficient to convince all that it is filled with hypocrisy and danger, we shall not share the fate of the unfortunate Laocoon. I hope we shall not invoke the wrath of Neptune, and be strangled to death with serpents.

Sir, the propositions of the Conservatives are like the earthen pots of Hannibal. They are full of snakes and poisonous reptiles, which, if thrown into the Democratic ship, will coil round the Constitution, crush and strangle our free institutions, and poison and corrupt the fountains of Democracy, from which flow the pure principles of civil and religious liberty.

Sir, when the banks suspended specie payments, the Conservative plan, which is now recommended, was in full operation; and yet the whole argument of the friends of this measure is to establish confidence in the banks, and the business and prosperity of the country will instantly revive. Yes, sir, we have heard this cry of confidence, confidence, until our ears have been shattered and our stomachs nauseated. How, sir, are you going to establish confidence in a set of institutions that are destitute, from their very natures, of the moral and intrinsic requisites which entitle them to confidence, and especially to so great a trust as that of the management of the finances of this Government. And why, sir, in May, 1837, when they were in the full possession of not only the confidence of the Government, but were in possession of her broad panoply of protection and in the practical use of her vast revenue—when their credit constituted the circulating medium of this vast, wide-spread dominion, and their paper was received in payment of the Government revenue and in all the vast and extensive commercial and mercantile transactions, and in domestic consumption—I ask, when the banks enjoyed all these advantages, public and private, why did they suspend specie payments? And I ask further, if this Government patronage—the possession and use of the vast funds of the Government, as well her deposited revenue as her undrawn balances, together with the unlimited public and private confidence which they enjoyed—was not all-sufficient to enable them to sustain themselves and to continue to redeem their bills, how will the simple act of the Government to receive in payment of her revenue the notes of specie-paying banks, restore confidence in the banks, so as to enable them to resume specie payments and revive the prosperity of the country? I leave the Conservatives to answer these questions.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] says tauntingly, "these principles [Conservative] were good Democratic doctrines in '35–36; why are they not good Democratic doctrines now?" I answer, because the local banks have forfeited the confidence that Government, or rather the Democratic party, reposed in them; and further, the question really involves no party principles, and ought to be treated as an abstract question of financial expediency. It has been made a party question for political effect.

If it was Democracy in 1835–36 to give the banks the control of the Government revenue, while they had the confidence of the Government, it is no reason why it should be Democracy in 1837–38, since they have forfeited all confidence of the Government. Prior to the American Revolution, obedience, and submission to British mandates was considered patriotic, but such obedience during the Revolution, and after the confirmation of our independence, would have been considered toryism. We have been frequently asked, in rather taunting tones, by the modern Whigs, why it is that we are now seeking a divorce from the banks, when in 1835–36, we were their friends, and used them to put down the Bank of the United States? I would ask in return why it is that the modern Whigs are now seeking an alliance of friendship, (pretended I suspect only for political effect) with the banks, when in 1835–'36, they denounced them corrupt and imbecile institutions, unfit to regulate the currency—pet banks?

Yes, it is said that the Government is trying to be divorced from the State banks.

Sir, I deny that ever the Federal Government was wedded to the banks. There is an alliance between the Government and the States: you may regard that alliance in the character of a husband, friend, protector, guardian, or what you please. To accommodate the Whigs, we will call it husband; we will agree that the sister States confederated, and gave up certain portions or parts of their independence, supremacy, and means, and out of those constructed a Federal Goverment, and imposed on that Government the duties of a husband towards them, defining specifically the power he shall exercise over them in a written Constitution, which was to stand for all time as a wall of fire to secure them from any Federal innovations upon their reserved rights and sovereignties. All this we know to be true; but was the Federal Government thereby to play the husband with and for every handmaid that the States might take into their employ. Was she to bed and board with every wrinkled yellow and toothless washerwomen that the States might engage to do that which which was beneath their dignity to do themselves? When the Federal Government united in the honorable bonds of matrimony with the States, that union was superinduced by their youth, beauty, intelligence, wealth, and chastity, and every other requisite necessary to make such an union desirable and permanent. And the defence of the peace and tranquillity of the States from foreign invasions and domestic insurrection, and some other expressed duties constitute the object for which the Federal Government was formed, all which have been imposed upon him. By uniting the Federal Government with the local banks in any Union like political matrimony, you would impose duties upon the Government which it has no power to enforce, because it cannot interfere with State institutions, this I have before stated. But, supposing that there has been something like matrimonial union between the banks and the Government, the only condition upon which that union was predicated was the just, faithful, and honest management of the Government revenue as her fiscal agents; this condition the banks have not only failed to perform, but violated in the most injurious manner, and therefore made the marriage contract not only voidable, but ipso facto void.

But, sir, I have another objection to this system which partakes of the constitutional character; and in accordance with that objection, I put the same question that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] raised. It is this: are not the officers, directors, stockholders, debtors, agents and attorneys of banks disqualified from holding a seat in Congress, owing to the direct interest which they may respectively have in those institutions, when they are made the fiscal agents of the Government? Or if you please, is a member of Congress not disqualified from acting officially on a proposition or measure connected with the banks, in which he may have a direct pecuniary interest? Should the banks be employed as fiscal agents to the Government, I trust that all banks that involve the pecuniary interest of members of Congress, shall, without exception, be excluded from such employment. Why is it the trial by jury has time out of mind been regarded as a sacred and almost apostolic mode of doing justice between man and man? It is a palladium of liberty; an institution that has done more to secure the liberty and protect the property of the citizen, as well in England as in this country, and where ever it exists, than magna chara, or the bill of rights of England, or the Revolution or the Constitution of this country, and all other causes put together. Why is it so? It is because the jury is to be composed of men good and true, who are to be neither of kin to the parties litigant nor are they to have an interest to the amount of a farthing; neither shall the facts be established upon which they are to predicate their judicial decision, be presented by witnesses who can be supposed by any possibility interested; neither is the judge who has an interest in the decision of the cause to be tried, permitted to expound or explain the law upon which the cause may turn or rest. And herein consists the value of the trial by jury; it is stripping it of every thing like interest. When so much care was deemed necessary by the common law, and our Anglo Saxon ancestors, and when our immediate ancestors have adopted the same caution and care, and made the trial by jury, with all its common-law guards and protections a part of our Constitution, to secure to us for all time in the civil protection it affords, and its security and protection consists in removing every thing savoring of interest in the trial, why is the law-making power not equally to be guarded from the corrupting influence of interest? We all remember well the national interest that was felt when the question of the recharter of the Bank of the United States was before the American people. There was a strong party who were in favor of the recharter of that institution; there was a stronger party who were opposed to it. The interest was intense on both sides; so much as even to threaten violence and revolution. The action and decision of Congress was looked to with agonizing anxiety. The removal of the deposites of the public money from the Bank of the United States and the branches thereof, and the deposite of the same in the local banks produced the same feverish excitement. And what do you think, sir? I hold in my hand the Senate journal of that time; it contains the report of a committee appointed to examine the Bank of the United States, with a view to ascertain whether any members were interested in a pecuniary sense in the Bank. This report contains the astounding fact, that the Bank had loaned to members of Congress, who then owed it, the enormous sum of $400,000. Yes, sir, members of Congress, whose pecuniary salvation from ruin, and the support of whose families may have depended on the favor and indulgence of the Bank, were a part of the men who had to decide this great question between the people and the Bank. Ought such a state of things to have existed? Ought they ever to exist again? Ought the frailty of man to be exposed to such overwhelming temptations? and ought our free institutions to be exposed to the blighting and withering effects of such temptations? The law-making power is supreme over every temporal institution, except the Constitution; it is the fountain and source of all power; and if poisoned, all the streams that flow from it, will carry poison and death, by every medium through which it flows, to all our institutions; and even the Constitution, which is protected mainly by the sanctity of an oath of those who administer its powers, may totter and tumble by the same poisoning and corrupting influence of pecuniary interest.

I hope for the honor and reputation of this Congress, and for the credit of the nation, the sanctity and preservation of the Constitution, our great charter of rights, and anchor of our political hopes and civil liberty, that no member of this Congress has an interest in local banks that could possibly sway his vote, or swerve his judgment; or, if he has, I hope he has not so far forgotten his duty to his conscience, his God, and his country, as to have voted on a question involving that interest. I do not charge those members of Congress, who were indebted to the United States Bank, with being interested in the recharter of the Bank in consequence of the accommodations which they had received at its hands, or of being overawed by its threats; but to show that the Bank had some interest in making friends to its cause, I will refer you to a portion of the same report of the Senate committee. I allude to that part of the report which relates to the New York Courier and Enquirer and its editor. I defy any man to come to any other conclusion, who will carefully and impartially examine that part of the report, than that the Courier and Enquirer, type, press, printers' devil, editor, books, and bonds, were bought by the Bank of the United States for the consideration of $52,000. Yes, sir, that vile sheet of slander and corruption —that polluted sewer, through which Bank slander, foul detraction, and the basest and most infamous falsehoods are continually flowing in one uninterrupted torrent to the public mind, is now the property of the United States Bank, or its friends and allies, bought and used for corrupt political purposes, to serve the degrading and servile ends of the Bank, together with its editor, the degraded coward, and the bought up vassal, James Watson Webb.

Let me hope, that so long as there is a connection between the Government and the banking interests of this country, that the great interest of the Government and the rights of the people may be defended from the corrupting effects of selfish and interested legislation. Should Congress neglect or refuse to interpose their authority against a principle and a practice so pernicious in its nature, and so dangerous in its practice, so subversive of justice, and degrading to the character of our free institutions, I hope the people will take the matter in hand, and do justice to themselves, and honor to their country. But it is said that there is less security in keeping the public money by the Sub-Treasury plan than by banks. This seems to me to be a strange objection, and must rest upon one of two reasons, perhaps both; one must be that Government cannot make vaults, boxes, or safes as strong as the vaults of the banks. The best way to get clear of this objection is, to treat it as unworthy of notice—so I leave it. The other objection may be, that there is not as much moral honesty among men as there is among banks: this may be, but it is unnecessary to speculate in theory and probabilities, when we have experience and facts to govern us. From an examination of financial reports in a given time, perhaps since 1814 to this time, we have the exhibit of about $13,000,000 lost by banks, and about one million of dollars by individuals, when the chances to lose by individuals were two to one, as all the revenue was twice in the hands of individuals, and once in the hands of the banks, viz: once in the hands of the receiving officers, then in the banks; next and last, in the hands of the disbursing officers. I ask, then, if the public money must be, and has been, first in the hands of public officers; and last in the hands of public officers, what benefit does the Government gain by placing her money in the banks, by way of handing it over from the first class of officers to the second. So much for practice and experience. This objection to the Sub-Treasury scheme, only deserves answering from the respectability of those who make it, and not from any force in itself. Let us examine the theory and moral of the objection. Men have an honorable and a moral reputation to maintain, involving pride of character and standing in society, far above any pecuniary consideration; banks have a pecuniary credit to maintain, involving nothing higher than dollars and cents, and whatever course of civil conduct will secure the most of them is their course, without a conscience to dictate in the matter. Men have a conscience whose peace must be consulted; they also have a body to be imprisoned for purloining the public money, or to be punished corporally for crime or fraud. "Banks have neither bodies to be kicked, or souls to be damned." Therefore, in every moral and respectable sense, men have the advantage over banks as fiscal agents of the Government. Moreover, this bill has provisions that go as far as strong boxes, strong safes, and strong vaults; moral obligations, penal, and pecuniary bonds, corporal punishments, degrading imprisonment, and loss of liberty and reputation, can go to make the public money safe.

But it is said that the Independent Treasury will be more costly to the Government than the method of using the banks. The additional expense is a matter so inconsiderable, that it is unworthy of consideration. The advantage of always having the money in possession, for the support of the Government, the security of the country, and the protection of the people under all emergencies, is more than a compensation for the small additional expense. The expense of four receivers general, and four or five additional clerks, which cannot exceed fifteen or twenty thousand dollars; and the establishment of places of security, which may cost fifteen or twenty thousand dollars more, which would make thirty or forty thousand dollars for the first year, and half that sum each year after. This is a small sum to constitute a serious objection to a scheme so much wanted, and so absolutely necessary.

But it is said that this plan is going to increase the Executive influence and Executive power. This is a stale cry. We have heard the cry of Executive power and Executive influence raised on a thousand changes this session. But this objection comes in bad time, and bad taste, from a party whose fundamental principles are an increase of Executive power, and whose watchword is Federal influence. But, sir, this objection is like many of the others: it is without foundation; and if it were for me to invent a plan of stripping the Executive of a portion of his influence and power, I would think myself happy and lucky in the discovery of the Independent Treasury plan.

How is it in regard to the plan that connects the Government with the banks? The President may, through his Executive officers of the Treasury, control, for political purposes, the banks. Having the selection of the local banks in which the deposites are to be made, he may make a compliance on their part with his political plans a condition. The alliance and connection may be of that character, and the control of that nature, that he may make all persons interested in the deposite banks subservient to his purpose. He might, through the banks, wield an influence dangerous, yes, destructive, to this Government, and the overturning of all our free institutions. The thought is shocking to the man who will properly appreciate the danger of throwing into the hands of the Executive the control (it may be for political purposes) of the whole American revenue, through as many banks as he may see fit to employ, or as many as could be brought to his own corrupt terms.

Sir, it seems to me that no more powerful method could be invented to bring this Government to any terms, and to any situation that a corrupt Executive might see fit, than to give him the control of the banking interests and powers over the country. Suppose that the President was to form an alliance with the banks, and that alliance had for its object the increase of his Executive power, and the augmentation of their capital and profits: here would be a union of interests at the expense of our free institutions and the liberty of the people, but perfectly in harmony with each of their natures and characters: for it is natural for Executive power to desire to increase its influence, and extend and augment its powers indefinitely; and it is natural for banking institutions to extend their credit, augment their influence, and increase their profits; and whenever those two influences are brought to bear upon one or more objects, for the political influence of the one and the pecuniary interests of the other, the result may be dangerous to the liberties of this country.

It seems to me that the direct tendency that the Sub-Treasury plan has to strip the Executive of power, by his connection with, and control over, the banks, that might be dangerous, is one of its greatest commendations; and if there were no other advantages to attend its adoption, that alone is sufficient to recommend it, at least to those who look with a jealous eye upon Executive powers and Federal influence. The Sub-Treasury plan contemplates the increase of four principal officers, whose duty it shall be to receive the public moneys; (this duty is now performed by Executive officers;) and perhaps six subaltern officers, such as clerks. It is possible there may be an increase of ten or twelve Executive officers, added to ten thousand that now exist; (a mere drop in the Ohio.) And what does the bill provide as an offset to this increase of Executive officers? Why, sir, it places the Government revenue beyond the control of the Executive influence, strips him of all power to exercise an undue influence over the banks or any other corporate institutions or private individuals, by means of the public revenue.

But the enemies of this Administration say that this Independent Treasury scheme is an attempt secretly to establish a Government Bank. This is not the fact, nor are those who make the charge sincere. If they thought so, they would sustain the measure to a man; for a Government Bank is the watchword with them. Every local interest, and every general interest too, is made to yield to the establishment of a National Bank with them. What is a bank, sir? My experience teaches me that it is an office of discount and deposite. It has stockholders, directors, a president, a cashier, and tellers. It discounts its paper, that is, its promises to pay, on the silver and gold in its vaults. Sometimes it discounts without either gold or silver. It receives money in deposite, and discounts upon its deposites. It deals in exchanges, that is, it buys and sells bills of exchange. It grants credits on its books, and transfers the amount of credit from one merchant to another. It buys and sells stocks. These are attributes and functions of a bank. Now will any gentleman here point to me any one of these powers as connected or belonging to the bill establishing the Independent Treasury, though all are necessary to make it a Government Bank, or bank of any kind; and, until that is done, I will hope to hear no charge of this kind against this measure.

Some of the enemies of this Administration say that the attempt to establish an Independent Treasury is an attack upon the whole credit system. Sir, I repel the charge, and repudiate it as I would the attempt, let it be made by whom or by what party it may. I know no better method of regulating the credit system, than by the check which the collection of the Government revenues in gold and silver would establish. The great objections of the Democratic party to banks, grow out of their hostility to the establishment of institutions that have for their object inequality of privileges; but in addition to this general objection, (which has its origin in the Constitution and in the nature of our Government,) they object to banks, because the currency of the country is made unsteady. By the fluctuations of the currency, all pursuits in life are made uncertain, and the whole credit system made as unsteady and as uncertain as April weather. To-day, a man may be worth $50,000 in paper prices; he may owe $10,000 in paper contracts. To-morrow, the credit of the paper system may be blasted, and it may take the man's $50,000 to pay the $10,000 which he owed. Hundreds and thousands of instances of this character can be produced, where men, who, by industry and economy, have laid up what they supposed would be a competent living for themselves in the afternoon of life, have, by the destruction of credit and the consequent downfall of property, been reduced, in ten short days, from supposed affluence to poverty and wretchedness. There are none of us who have reached the meridian of life, but have seen more than one period of universal destruction of credit, confidence, trade, and commerce; and it is the nature of unrestrained banking to produce periodical prostration and ruin, with all the effects of poverty and its train of evils, such as the loss of private and public confidence, and the destruction of every moral and social feeling that constitutes the ties of society and civilization. The evil does not consist in banking or the credit system; it consists in the unrestrained exercise of the banking powers and the improper and imprudent issues of paper money. In proportion to the increase of circulating medium, whether of gold or silver, so will the price of every marketable commodity, as well of personal as of real property, increase. If there are five dollars in paper in circulation to one in specie for the redemption of that paper, so long as it has credit, and the confidence of those who receive it and pay it out, property of every description will be estimated in proportion to the amount of paper actually in circulation. Purchases are made, and debts contracted, all with reference to the fictitious value. When the time comes that this paper must be redeemed—that is, when the people begin to lose confidence in the ability of the banks to redeem, or a demand comes from abroad for the liquidation of our commercial debts, which must be paid in gold and silver, bank paper having no circulation or credit abroad—then it is the banks are compelled to stop issuing, contract their credits, call in their debts, and generally shut up shop; that is, stop specie payments. Money, by this operation, becomes scarce; property falls in value to the specie basis; debts which were contracted in paper times must be paid in specie, the effect of which is to compel the debtor to pay to the creditor five dollars for every one he really owes him, or for which he ever received consideration. When the paper balloon was inflated to the extent of its capacity and elasticity, large contracts were made for real estate, merchandise, or commerce, and half the price paid down. Now the paper balloon has burst, the price of property has fallen four-fifths. The consequence is, that the money advanced upon the real estate, merchandise, or commerce, is lost to the purchaser, and the property will not sell for more than half as much as will pay the balance which is due on it. This is the financial operation by which thousands of as honest and industrious citizens as ever adorned any country, or any society, are brought to sudden and unexpected poverty and ruin, by circumstances and operations over which they have no control. And these are some of the effects produced by unrestrained banking. I stated that this state of pecuniary ruin—which, ever since the introduction of the banking system, as now conducted, has produced periodically—may be brought about by foreign demands for specie, and generally is. I will tell you how it is; and to illustrate it more clearly, I will confine illustrations to the operations of a single bank, but which will, and does, apply to all. Supposing a bank is authorized with a capital of $500,000: the requisite number of instalments is paid in; the bank commences operations; discounts paper on the specie paid in on its stock shares; deposites are made in it; it discounts on its deposites; and its paper, now spread far and wide, has become the circulating medium of the country. Its paper answers all the purposes of domestic exchange and consumption. Prices rise in proportion to the quantity of paper in circulation, but the credit and circulation of the paper being confined to its own country, the price of our produce is not raised abroad; foreign produce is invited here, while our produce bears so high a price at home, that it will not admit of exportation. The consequence is, that our specie must be taken out of the country, or exported, to pay for our own importations. This produces a constant flow of the precious metals from our country, and no return. This operation is made more fatal by the contracts of foreign and domestic debts contracted in the course of commercial trade. Exchanges are now against us; the balances must be paid. The commercial or importing merchants are called upon to pay their foreign debts in hard coin; they, in turn, are compelled to call upon their customers, the country merchants; and the country merchants are compelled to call upon their customers, the people, and the people upon their debtors and the banks. Then the calamities begin which I have before described; and this development accounts for the causes of all the difficulties that this country, this people, and this Government, have suffered for the last year in their commercial and financial affairs, although the whole blame, for political effect, is laid at the feet of the Administration. I have said all those pecuniary and commercial difficulties grew out of unrestrained banking. It is true, and there are other difficulties which I have not named, nor have I time to name them. I will name one: when money is made plenty, and prices are thereby made high, great inducements are held out to all classes to engage in speculations. The carpenter's bench, the shoemaker's seat, and the tailor's board, are robbed; the anvil is deserted, "and the plough is left to rust in the half-finished furrow;" all by the alluring prospects which a bloated paper currency holds out to make fortunes suddenly by speculation. The more honorable, but slow, methods of making a living by honest industry and useful employment, are given up for speculating pursuits, about which more than two-thirds of those who engage in them know nothing.

Soon after I arrived here at the extra session last summer, I visited the port of Alexandria. I became acquainted with the Danish Consul, who invited me on board a ship which was then in port. On being introduced to the captain, I asked him where he was from. His answer was, from Prussia. What is your lading? Wheat. I felt surprised that wheat should be imported between four or five thousand miles across a boisterous and tempestuous ocean, with all the risk of the sea, from a frozen and sterile country between the 55th and 60th degree of north latitude, and a land of despotism, to this fertile and mild climate and land of liberty, which is proverbially all over the world an agricultural country. I was so much surprised, that I was induced to inquire what he paid for his wheat in Prussia, and think he said $1 25 per bushel. What do you get for it here? $1 75. What do you pay your sailors? $8 per month. What is the price of labor in your country? $8 per month. What kind of money constitutes your circulating medium? Gold and silver is our consumptive medium. These answers unfolded the secret. Here it is proper to remark, that nothing in the currency way could be taken for this wheat but gold and silver. Our paper would not pass in Prussia, and what produce we had to spare bore so bloated a paper price, that it would not bear shipping to Prussia. But the secret was, that labor and produce in Prussia was at the specie standard; here it was at the paper standard; or, in other words, produce and labor there bear their real value; here they bear a fictitious value. This was produced by the unbridled manner in which banking was conducted. Permit me, sir, to read an article from a German paper, printed in the district which I have the honor to represent. I think the article excels any thing I ever read for brevity, truth, candor, and comprehension. Here, sir, it is: it is in point:

CAUSES OF THE LATE REVULSION.—I believe that justice requires that we should attribute the disorders of the times to other causes than the measures of the late or the present National Administration; and, first, among those causes I would name—

The excessive issues of bank paper with which the country has been flooded, and the consequent abuses of bank credits.

2d. The vast sums invested in unproductive lands, city and village lots, fancy stocks, and other property, by men of limited resources.

3d. The great excess of our importations above our exports—contracting large debts abroad, the payment of which required the withdrawal of an equal amount of our capital from the ordinary channels of business at home.

4th. The almost total neglect of that most useful, as well as most honorable, of all employments, the cultivation of the soil, observable in some sections of the country, and the consequent necessity for the importation of bread stuffs.

5th. Extravagance in expenditures of all kind; and the luxurious style of living, and the habits of idleness in which too many have, for years past, indulged. R. C. GREENE.

Then, sir, I say that the principle in the Independent Treasury scheme that makes the Government revenue collectable in the constitutional currency, is one of the best principles or means that could be adopted to regulate the discounts of the banks, and balance trade, commerce, credit, and agriculture; and any man whose mind is unswerved by party considerations, and uninfluenced by selfish interest, can see in this provision of the Independent Treasury scheme sufficient reasons why it should become the settled and permanent law of the land. While it exists, the banks will always be kept under proper restraint, and the currency of the country will always be redeemable, and of a creditable quality; nor will it ever in quantity (as it never should) exceed the wants of the country. But take away the restraint from the banks, and we are subject periodically to all the distressing and desolating effects by the violent and sudden expansion and contractions consequent upon an unrestrained paper circulating medium.

But, sir, we have been told that it is the office holders who are urging this ruinous measure upon the country; and we hear a great deal about office holders. This measure is the measure of the office holders, and that measure is the measure of the office holders: it is office holders in the morning, office holders at noon, and office holders in the evening: we can hear the hyena howl about the office holders on our going out, and on our coming in; in our eating, our drinking, in our sleeping, in our waking, and in our praying, (when we do pray.) Sir, there may be something degrading and criminal in holding an office; but I believe I would a little rather be a comfortable, fat, well-fed office holder, than a lean, lank, hungry office seeker. The former situation is quite as honorable as the latter, and much more comfortable. Constant murmurings and complaints about the office holders have ever been considered worthy of a demagogue. What is meant by this incessant cry against the office holders? Is it to disband all the office holders, and dissolve the Federal Government, and return to a state of originality, or is it merely to open the way for a new and hungry swarm of office seekers, to sap the last drop of Uncle Sam's blood from his already exhausted veins? Where is the Government that ever had a spark of freedom, but what was conducted by office holders, and a regularly organized system, with proper checks and balances to guard against usurpation, or the undue exercise of power? We may disband our Federal officers when we wish to establish the Agrarian system, or exchange our free institutions and our republican Constitution for an unlimited despotism, like the Autocrat of Russia. But suppose the ins are ousted to make room for the outs, as that is the object of the cry with which our ears are incessantly grated, would the public be benefitted by the change? Would the expenses of the Government be diminished? The Federalists have had the sway twice since the organization of our Government, and they were hardly well seated in power, when the people flirted them into the mud; and it will be so again, whenever they get into power. A few Federal strides of official power will bring down the popular indignation upon them. What power they may gain by the sleeping apathy or unsuspecting carelessness of the people, will soon be wrested from them by a fearful wakening up.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] advanced some strange doctrines on the subject of banking, calculated, I think, to arouse the most unsuspecting. He tells us that the banks are never able to redeem their paper. It is preposterous to suppose that they can. Such a supposition is vulgarism; and it is such vulgar ideas that make people rush to a bank whenever they suspect its ability to redeem its paper. This may be vulgarism, sir, on the part of the people, but it is a vulgarism that has its foundation in justice and self-defence, and will never be cured in a land of freedom by any species of Bank refinement. If it is a vulgarism in the people to expect the banks to pay their debts, and to call upon them, upon their promises, to do so, it is immoral and fraudulent in them not to pay.

I think he told us that the banks of England had a provision in this charters, by which they were guarded against captious calls for specie redemption of their paper. I would like to see one of our western buckeye woolhats interrogated at the counter of a bank whether he made his demand for the redemption of his note in a captious manner or not. I think Mr. Corset would be apt to get his stays broken.

Gentlemen, who have been singing praises to the banks, and the banking system, constantly refer us to the wealth, the power, the independence, and the grandeur of England. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND] tells us that she has ruled the commercial world, as she sways the ocean, against the combined powers of Europe; and all this by the glorious and happy influence of her credit and banking system.

Mr. Speaker, I will not detain you now, by giving you an account of the English national debt, which is more than all the dray horses in her kingdom could draw in dollars. Her eclesiastic estate, her entails, her rotten boroughs, her tythes, her lords—spiritual and temporal—her monarchical department, &c.

I have never heard of the powers of Europe being combined but once, and that was to put Buonaparte down, and England was in the combination; and Buonaparte would have whipped the whole concern, had it not been for the treachery of some of his officers. But this is not the first time in the history of our political and legislative service that we have had England offered to us as the proper model of a Government. The argument is a Tory and a Federal argument. It is the same that was used by the Tories during the Revolutionary war against the Patriots. It was that argument that prolonged the war for many years, and increased all its hardships—the loss of thousands of lives, and the destruction of millions of property. It is an argument that true hearted Americans never want to hear. It is the argument that was used by the Federalists and Tories at the formation of our Government. The very man who introduced the English banking system into this country, [Alexander Hamilton,] said that the British Government was one of the most splendid fabrics on the face of the earth. It is the same argument that was used to establish the alien and sedition laws, that brought disgrace on our free institutions, infamy upon the memory of our Government, and placed a foul and everlasting stain upon the American statute book.

It is the same argument that was used to prevent the repeal of the same odious laws; it is the same argument that was used to prevent the election of the distinguished statesman, philosopher, and patriot, THOMAS JEFFERSON, by whom Federalism was routed, "horse, foot, and dragoons," for a time, the Constitution restored to its original principles, and many who were imprisoned in loathsome and pestilential dungeons by the alien and sedition laws were restored to the light of heaven and the bosom of society. It is the same argument that was used against the declaration of our second war for independence, though our seamen had been pressed, our navy disgraced, our commerce assailed, and our national flag dishonored. It is the same argument that was used by the same Tories and Federalists against our rejoicing in honor and gratitude over our national victories, which was regarded as a sin, inasmuch as the war was "an unjust and an unholy war. It is the same argument that was used to justify the treasonable practice dayly exercised, of giving comfort and aid to our enemies, and of denying aid and munitions of war for the relief of our suffering frontier. It is the same argument that was used to cheat the people out of their Republican President, fairly elected in 1824, in violation of the principles of our Constitution, our free institutions, and the sacred rights of the elective franchise.

It is the same argument that was used to prevent the election of General JACKSON in 1828, and urged with double energy, because he had thrashed the red coats of their beloved England on the plains of New Orleans. But the argument was unavailing. JACKSON was elected; the Augean stable was swept, and the rolling tide of Federalism was thrown back. It is the same argument that was used to prevent his re-election, and to renew the charter of the United States Bank, by which it was intended to merge the pecuniary interests and political liberties of this country in British capital and British power. But the people met the argument, put down the Bank, and redeemed the country, by the re-election of General JACKSON. It is the same argument that was used against the confirmation of MARTIN VAN BUREN as Minister to the Court of St. James. He was rejected because he was a little too much given to the institutions of his own country, and a little too much opposed to the institutions of England, whose praises we have heard sang in such loud and long strains in the discussion of this question. It is the same that was used to prevent the election to the Vice Presidency of the same distinguished and talented individual; and the same that was used to prevent his election to the Presidency. It is the same that was used to prevent the election of RICHARD M. JOHNSON to the seat he now occupies in honor to his patriotism, his services to his country, and the scars that cover his body received in her defence, and the duties of which he discharges with so much ability, credit to himself, and advantage to the country, and the satisfaction of those over whom he presides.

In short, sir, the glories and splendor of England is a standing argument with a certain party against every thing proposed to advance the interests of this country, to establish on a firmer basis our free institutions, or to spread broader and wider the principles of Democracy. The enemies to Democracy and this Administration, are daily singing praises to their Whig victories: bright prospects of glory await them. You may see them in groups by night and day congratulating each other and the Federal party, on the success that awaits their toils in the Federal field for their promotion, the success of the Federal party and the establishment of Federal principles. It requires but little stretch of the imagination to see them with their leader [H. CLAY] parcelling out the spoils, and assigning stations to the commanding officers from their first general to their fourth coporal. But, sir, disappointment awaits them, still disappointed hope must be their lot for a time! Yes, sir, the little Duchman blockades their passage to glory. About the year forty he will again move his wand over the heads of the American people, and their hearts will beat in his breast; his patriotism, his talents, his political integrity, his sound Democratic principles, and his services to his country will rise vividly in the recollection of every lover of American freedom, and the Magician is again placed in the President's chair; while old Tecumseh's claim to national gratitude will retain him in the possession of his present situation, and the laurels that his gallantry and dauntless bravery so gloriously won for him at the battle of the Thames will still adorn his memory. Sir, we have some struggling about currency; some is for one kind and some for another; some for a National Bank paper; some for local bank paper; some for shinplasters; some for all kinds of paper, so that it smacks of the beauties and glories of the British banking system; and here and there we find one who is inclined to the American constitutional currency, viz: gold and silver. There may be some uncertainty how this game may end, and what the financial currency may eventually be; but I can tell you, sir, of one kind of currency we will have for the next seven years. It is a political currency, signed by the magician of Kinderhook, and endorsed by Tecumseh of Thames memory. This paper will pass all over these United States; and it will not be like your common paper currency, five per cent. below par at New York; twenty per cent. below par at New Orleans; fifteen per cent. at St. Louis, and so varying at every principal mart or seaport town in the United States. No, sir, it will be at par at all times and all places, and compared with its antagonist, paper will be at least 33⅓ per cent. above par. The Kinderhook paper will pass current with the Dutch, who deal in nothing but sound currency; it will pass current with the Irish, who are Democrats by nature, and it will pass current with all who love freedom and equal rights; all who go in for the support of the Constitution, the defence of our free institutions, and against the establishment of a British Bank upon American soil.

But, sir, we have been told by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] that this bill contains a provision embracing the principles of the Treasury Circular, which was repealed but the other day by a large majority of both branches of Congress. Yes, sir, it contains such a provision in part. The Treasury Circular made a discrimination in the kind of currency that should be received in the payment of land over a certain amount, (320 acres,) and the kind of currency that should be received from custom-house and other officers—the former being made payable in gold or silver, and the latter in the paper of specie paying banks. This bill provides for the gradual collection of the whole Government revenue in the constitutional currency, and that is one of its most valuable features, as I think has already been shown.

The object of the Treasury or Specie Circular was to prevent the whole public domain from being engulfed in the vortex of speculation. Such was the rage for land speculation, that the poor and industrious man, for whose use the lands are really held in trust, who, when he purchases, purchases for the purpose of settling on and improving the land, to the advancement of agriculture, the benefit of society, and the pecuniary interests of the State or Territory in which the land may lie—I say such was the rage for speculation, that the poor man, after travelling perhaps many hundreds of miles with his knapsack on his back, and his staff in his hand, for the purpose of purchasing a home for himself and his family, was not unfrequently compelled to return to his home without being able to make a purchase; or he was driven to the dilemma of purchasing second handed at a great advance, or taking land of an inferior quality. It was to remedy this evil that the Specie Circular was put in operation—an evil which ought not to be tolerated. It is an evil which no friend to equal rights, if he properly appreciates it, would be willing should exist. It is an evil that I shall ever while I have a stand here oppose; and the specie provision of this bill is well calculated to restrain within some bounds this evil, but not to the extent that it should. I shall never feel satisfied on this point until I see the sales of wild land limited to the actual settler, and in amount to half a section. If this rage for speculation in the public domain is permited to go on unlimited, it will not be half a century until all political names and party distinctions will be merged in the feudal names of landlord and tenant. Then we will have the beauties and glories of the British Government, indeed, to the satisfaction of a certain party, who are always singing hallelujahs to her.

One gentleman, [Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi,] in his praises of the banking system, stated that there was no real difference between capital and labor; and, between the capitalist and the laborer, both enjoyed equal advantages from capital; they were so intimately connected that they were the same. Well, this is very fine. If it is true, I suppose the capitalists will have no objection to exchanging situations with the laborer; that he will give up his capital to the laborer; and all his lands, and houses, and chattel property, and introduce him into his parlor, upon his soft, brilliant, Turkey carpeting; give him the key to his costly sideboard, and the freehold to his rich wines, gold goblets, cut glass decanters, and his massy plate, together with his soft sofa to lounge upon; and he, the capitalist, will enter the field of toil and sweat, and there labor from morning till night, day after day, week after week, and month after month, to the end of the year, when he will find that he has just made, with all his toil, a scanty living to the end of the year for his family; and that the last scanty supper that he and his family eats at the evening of the first year makes it necessary for him to be early in the field on the morning of the second year to procure by his continued toil their next breakfast. When will such an exchange as this take place think you? It will be when the lion and the lamb shall lie down in peace together. It will be found that there is a great difference between labor and capital; a great difference between the comforts and happiness of the > "King in the parlor, counting up his money, and the laborer, who too frequently, owing to some of our monopolizing institutions, and unequal systems, has to eat bread in sorrow, and frequently gets but little to eat.

> The maid in the kitchen, eating bread and honey;"

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will not infer from what I have said, that I am an enemy to the banks, or to the banking system, if conducted on proper principles. I know that the people of this country will have banks; perhaps the commercial interests of the country require that there should be banks, at least, of exchange and deposite, if not of discount. But I see no necessity, justice, or political propriety, in keeping up a system of banking which has powers and privileges that have a direct and unavoidable tendency to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer, or that banks have untramelled sway over the whole moneyed interest of the country, and control of the value of property of every description.

I am unfriendly to the system that puts it in the power of banks to make money plenty or scarce—to raise the price of property a hundred per cent. above its value, or reduce it twice that sum below par, at their will and pleasure, and benefit themselves by the operation, at the expense of the fortunes and happiness of the balance of the community; and such is the nature and tendency of the present system. I believe I voted for the incorporation of most of the banks in Ohio, incorporated since 1828. I done so, not because I was in favor of the principle of banking, but because I was instructed so to do by those I had the honor to represent in the State Legislature, and because I thought the immediate interests of the country required the establishment of local banks at that time, at least in Ohio, for reasons which probably apply to other sections of the Union.

I think it was between the years 1832 and 1834 that the most of the modern banks were incorporated in Ohio. The people of the United States had determined, through the ballot-boxes, in a manner and by a vote which could not be misunderstood, that the Bank of the United States should not be rechartered. The debts in the State due the branch ot Cincinnati, I think, amounted to near $2,500,000. I think our canal debt, about that time, was about $5,000,000. The branch bank was calling in twenty per cent. every sixty or ninety days, as the case might be, and the interest on the canal debt had to be paid annually, in addition to keeping up the canal sinking fund.

To support all this, as well as the necessary quantity of circulating medium for domestic consumption and the ordinary exchanges, as well as the necessary and indispensable Government revenue—I say, to sustain all this, there was (exclusive of the capital of the United States Branch Bank) only about four and a half millions of bank capital in Ohio, one-third of which was domestic. This, sir, is a general view of the finances of Ohio when her late banks were incorporated. She was in an embarrassed situation, and it was to give her temporary relief that the banks were established. It was by inviting foreign capital to the State, and to bring into active use the dormant capital that was in the State, and to supply the place of the capital and circulation of the branch bank, which was about to be withdrawn from circulation and from the State, and to prevent a state of pecuniary ruin and desolation which had swept over the State of Ohio like a pestilence, that withered and blighted every thing living that fell within its influence, once before, (in 1819) by the sudden curtailments of the branch bank at Cincinnati. It was to prevent a return of a calamity of this kind that the late banks were incorporated; and I am happy to say, and it is due to them to say, they had the effect; they warded off the blow, until the State was relieved from her embarrassments by her own resources, by the economy and industry of her citizens, and the fertility of her soil. Although I am opposed to some of the privileges these banks possess—believing, as I do, that they are contrary to the spirit of our free institutions, and dangerous in their tendency to equal rights—yet I shall never regret the part I took in their establishment. I believe they have done some harm, but I believe they have done more good. I know that, let them take what course they may, or terminate in what evil they will, they never can produce more evil than the winding up of the United States Bank would have produced, had they not have been established. I think the charters of the banks of Ohio, generally, expire by their own limitation in 1843. I am no enemy to them. I hope they may be permitted to live out their days in peace, and that they may be permitted to enjoy, uninterruptedly, the benefits which their charters entitle them to; and when the time comes for their renewal, if it is thought expedient to renew them, such restraints may be interposed as will secure equal justice to them and political and pecuniary security to the State and the people. The intelligence and patriotism of the people will provide for the times; they will do what is right and just for the country and the banks.

The feeling which I have expressed in relation to the banks of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, I extend to the banks of other States, so far as such a feeling is necessarily connected with my representative duty as a member of the American Congress.

We have heard another objection to this measure, and I give the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. PRENTISS] credit for his candor in openly making the objection. I like such honest, unsophisticated candor.

His great objection rests upon the fact that this is an Administration measure. It is alone sufficient to call down all his hostility and opposition, that it comes from the Administration. Yes, sir; and I suspect that this is the great pinch with some other gentlemen, if they would be candid. This measure smacks of Democracy; there is something wrong about it; it comes from an Administration elected by the people; an Administration, in every possible way identified with the people, and an Administration solemnly pledged to carry out the will and the wishes of the people to their best interests. Yes, sir, there is where the shoe pinches. If it had been a measure of the banks, in place of the people's Administration, the gentleman would have better understood it, and been ready and willing to have appreciated its importance. Sir, we have heard an almost incessant torrent of abuse againt this and the preceding Administrations; and most of this abuse has been poured forth upon the devoted heads of the Administrations for carrying out measures which have originated with the people, or which the people have expressly required them to carry out. Do gentlemen reflect, that in denouncing this Administration in such unmeasured terms, and the measures which they are bound to carry out, they are calling in question, not only the political capacity of the people to elect their representative and executive officers, but also their qualifications to judge of the propriety and necessity of measures in which they have a right to instruct, and to call their officers to an account at the bar of public opinion if they disobey? Sir, there has been no man in this House at whose hand the Administration has received more abuse than the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL.] There is no man who has more violently assailed and opposed every leading measure of the Administration than he has—as well measures that have originated with this Administration as those that fell to it to carry out that had their origin with the last Administration. Such a course I did not expect from him. I came here expecting a different course. If I were asked, what is the greatest qualifications in a statesman, I would answer, patriotism and virtue. What would you require as evidence to establish in your mind those qualities in any given statesman? I would say, consistency must be one of the evidences.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a pamphlet containing a political speech, made by the gentleman at Vaxhall Garden, in the State of Tennessee Sir, I will not detain you to read extracts from his speech, whenever and wherever they occur favorable to General JACKSON's administration, and to the measures of a leading character which that administration was bound to carry out. Let it be sufficient for me at present to say, that his speech abounds in eulogy to JACKSON's administration, and in streng and powerful appeals to the people of Tennessee to carry out his leading measures. He tells the people of Tennessee in substance, that General JACKSON is soon to retire from office, and that the welfare of this Union, the preservation of the great leading principles (Democratic) of the party and the highest interests of Tennesee, require that Judge WHITE should be General JACKSON's successor. Judge WHITE has always been a firm and decided supporter of General JACKSON, a Jeffersonian in principle. No man was more thoroughly acquainted with the leading measures of General JACKSON's administration than was Judge WHITE. I was delighted when I read this speech. I expected to find in Judge WHITE and the gentleman two devoted friends to the Administration, (now that Judge WHITE had failed in his election, and no longer a candidate,) but what was my surprise when I came here, to find the gentleman himself, and Judge WHITE also, the most violent opposers, not only of the Administration, but of all the important measures commenced in the late Administration, and which this Administration stands pledged to carry out! The party, the Administration, the measures of the Administration, the honorable SPEAKER, and even the retired patriot of the Hermitage, have been alike the subjects of the gentlemen's abuse. Yes, sir, the honorable SPEAKER, whose situation places him beyond the power of retort and defence, without a violation of the dignity and character of his station, the dignity and character of the body over which he presides, and the dignity and character of the nation for which they legislate—I say, even his situation has not secured him from the gentleman's buse, although his tongue has been tied, and his hands bound. Nor, sir, has the bleached head and withered form of the retired inmate of the Hermitage been sufficient to secure him from the outpourings of slander and detraction. His palsied hand and tottering frame, together with the recollection that the tooth of Time has been wasting him for seventy winters, admonish him that the sun of his day has sat—the death bell of three score and ten begins to ring in his ears, and the clouds of eternal night begin to thicken and darken about his pillow, yet his enemies are unwilling that he should cease to be the subject of base detraction; and even his fellow statesmen and one of his followers and political disciples is found to be the foremost and most unrelenting in persecution, still holding the poisoned cup of slander to his quivering lips, even to the outpouring of the last dregs of bitterness and bonds of iniquity.

The gentleman and Judge WHITE had always been supporters of General JACKSON and of the Democratic principles, or at least so professed to be. All the constitutional principles recognised by the Democratic party, from the commencement of the Government to the time they left the Democratic party and the people's administration, they professed to support; such as financial economy, and strict construction of the Constitution; hostility to a National Bank; legislation confined to the actual wants of the people, and within the limits of the Federal Constitution; opposed to extravagant appropriations, or any other appropriations not warranted by the Constitution. All these, and many other principles of a like nature which characterize the Democratic party, and make up their code of principles, these gentlemen professed to believe in, and by them, in their political course, to be governed; more especially political hostility to all institutions that have for their object the establishment of exclusive privileges, and unequal pecuniary and political advantages to a favored few at the expense of the many, and to the prejudice of our free institutions, that have for their object equal rights to all.

But where do we find the gentleman [Mr. BELL] now? Fighting with the Democracy and the Administration, on whose flag is inscribed equal rights to all? No, sir; the American motto, simple and short, "E pluribus unum," has no charms for him; he goes the royal banner, bearing the inscription of a British bank. Is the gentleman exerting himself now to prevent the necessity of incorporating a National Bank? Is he now exerting himself, with the Democratic party, to establish a sound, constitutional currency, which has ever been a favorite measure with the Republican party and the supporters of the Constitution, and always opposed by the British bank party? Is he now engaged in sustaining all those principles, in short, that have for their object the security of justice and equal rights between citizen and citizen, and to prevent Government encroachments upon any? I hope his private feelings may justify an answer in the affirmative to all these interrogatories; but his speeches, votes, and the party with which he is acting, will not. How will the gentleman account for the extraordinary position he occupies, and the course he is pursuing? Has he left the Democratic party, or have the Democratic party, consisting of more than two-thirds of all the people of the United States, of men, women, and children, with all the long and well established Democratic principles and practices that have existed from the commencement of the Government to this time, left him? One or the other must be the case; and which is most credible, according to our understanding of men and things?

When the gentleman goes to a good comfortable fire on a cold winter evening, and gets one side warmed, does he turn round to warm the other, or does he sit still, his chair on a pivot, and cause the fireplace, chimney, house and household, to be turned round? When the gentleman feels disposed to discharge his representative duties, does he come to the Capitol, walk in with hat in hand, take his seat by his desk as other members do, or does he cause this magnificent pile of noble and grand architectures surpassing any thing of the kind in the world, to be carried to him? Lastly: does this world turn round on its axis once in twenty-four hours, by which night is produced, so well suited to the repose of the wearied creation, and by which the morning sun is made to rise to cheer the busy world; or does the sun travel round the world to produce these desirable effects? Certainly the former is most natural, as well as most credible; more in accordance with the well-established prineiples of astronomy. In the first proposition, the surface of the earth would have to move but 24,000 miles in twenty-four hours. This distance is astronomically credible, within the pale of human understanding, perfectly finite, and within our comprehension of divine power. But, by the second proposition, the sun would have to move in his orbit an incredible distance; let us see how far, sir. The sun is, in round numbers, 95,000,000 of miles from this earth; a great distance, but this is but one-half of the diameter of the circle of the orbit he would have to perform: the whole diameter would be 190,000,000 of miles. This is a greater distance, and almost incredible; but it is but one-third the distance of the cycle. The whole distance would be three times the diameter, which would be 570,000,000 of miles, which the sun would have to move in the space of each twenty-four hours—a distance incredible; a distance almost infinite, a motion of velocity beyond the capacity of human comprehension, and almost beyond Divine power. I hope, sir, that the gentleman will not drive his friends to the dilemma of believing what is incredible in itself. I hope he will agree, and permit his friends to believe, that when he takes his seat by the fire on a cold evening, when he gets one side warmed he turns the other to the fire, and does not require the fire to be turned to the cold side; that when he is disposed to give his attention to his official duties he comes to the Capitol, and does not require the Capitol to be taken to him; that when it pleases the Almighty to produce, through his Divine goodness, the pleasing, useful, and delightful changes of day and night, he causes the world to move round its own axis once in twenty-four hours, in place of causing the sun to move round the world; and that the gentleman has left the great Democratic party, and that it has not left him.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen some service in the political wars. I have been an attentive observer of political men and political measures. I have read some history, (not much.) I have seen some deserters from the Democratic standard, some traitors to the Democratic cause and the Democratic party, and the result of my experience in this matter is, that all the tracks of traitors go from the Democratic standard—none directed towards it. Of all the tracks that I have seen, the heel is towards the Democratic standard, and the toe towards the Federal Bank standard. I suppose pecuniary avidity accounts for this singular fact. I suppose it proceeds from the same principle that induced the children of Israel to desert the standard of Moses, (although witnessing and enjoying the daily manifestation of Divine goodness,) and bow down in humble adoration to Aaron's golden calf; for, sir, Democracy has nothing to pay her troops with but patriotism and love of country; but her dissenters, those who can sing hosannahs to the Bank, can be accommodated with "honorable facilities."

I find by what little history I have read, mankind is the same in all countries, at all times, and in all Governments; and such is his depravity, that his civil, moral, and religious obligations constitute but frail ligaments, when attacked by the "shears of the fatal sisters, Ambition, Avarice, and Power." Sir, there is no crime that is capable of entering the human heart, that is so abominable as that of treachery. If there is any one crime of an infamous and base character that is more abominable than another in the sight of God and man, it is treachery. If there is any one infamous crime that more deserves the curse of the Almighty and the universal execration of man than another, it is treachery. The best men that ever lived, and bound society together, have been brought to infamy, the stake, and the guillotine, by treachery. Even the Savior of mankind was brought to an infamous death and the cross by the treachery of one of his own disciples. Kingdoms, Empires, and Republics have been prostrated, subverted, and brought to ruin and annihilation, by treachery. There has been no Government or party of a Government since the first dawn of civilization and political organization, but has been cursed and tortured with traitors.

There is no one who cries louder for the liberties of a country than a traitor, and that, too, frequently when the vilest plots may be ripe in his heart for execution. Patriotism and economy dwell upon his lips, when foul conspiracy, despotism, and extravagance rankle in his heart. Prostration of the Government, the downfall of its free institutions, and the degradation and poverty of the people, are watchwords and cardinal maxims with him, so that he can thereby obtain the rule, and sway the sceptre. Carthage had her Hanno. When the brave Hannibal, at whose approach the lofty Alps bowed, and the rivers, as it were, dried up, planted the Carthaginian standard on the plains of Cannæ, and one victory seemed but to make way for another over the arms of Rome, until the very walls of her city shook, and her citadel trembled; it was under circumstances so honorable to the arms of his country, that Hannibal despatched his brother Mago to Carthage with the news of his greatest and last victory, and at the same time, to demand succors, in order that he might be enabled to put an end to the war. Mago, being arrived, made in full Senate a lofty speech, in which he extolled his brother's exploits, and displayed the great advantages he had gained over the Romans. And to give a more lively idea of the greatness of the victory, by speaking, in some measure to the eye, he poured out, in the middle of the Senate, a bushel of gold rings, which had been taken from the fingers of such of the nobility as had fallen in the battle of Cannæ. He concluded with demanding money, provisions, and fresh troops.

Hanno, who headed a faction opposed to Hannibal, and opposed to the war with Rome, said that the exploits of which Hannibal boasted so much, were wholly chimerical and imaginary. "I have cut to pieces (says he, continuing Mago's speech) the Roman armies; send me some troops." "What more could you ask, had you been conquered?" "I have twice seized upon the enemies' camp, (full, no doubt, of provisions of every kind,) send me provisions and money." "Could you have talked otherwise, had you lost your camp?" What must have been the surprise of every one whose hearts beat in gratitude for Hannibal, and in patriotism for Carthage, to hear one of her Senators, in the face of his country, attempt to blight the ardor of so successful a General, and dishonor her armies in the face of the world? Such was the fact. Here we have an instance of vile treachery in the person of Hanno, who would prefer to see the whole expedition against Rome fail, the proud and terrible name of Carthage sink, her victorious arms disgraced, and her proud fame wither and wilt, rather than that Hannibal, towards whom he was inimical, and of whom he was jealous, should succeed in subduing Rome. Sir, I have not time to specify particular instances of treachery in the several Governments of the old world. But history informs us that the orators who were loudest, most eloquent, and apparently most zealous, in protecting and defending the liberties of Athens, were easiest seduced and the soonest bribed to the standard of Macedon by the gold of Philip.

Sempronius, who had declared for the standard of Cato and for the patricians of Rome, was loup-est and most boisterous against Cæsar when in the Senate at Utica; and in the presence of Cato, such were his outward displays of patriotism and zeal for the cause of Cato, that he would shake the Senate walls with denunciations against Cæsar; and yet all his patriotism dwelt upon his lips. Foul treachery and infamous conspiracy saturated his heart, and every secret moment was used with Syphax, the Numidian general, and his partner in treachery, in preparing his troops to fly to the standard of Cæsar, and drench the streets of Rome with the remainder of the patrician blood. Sir, in honor of my own country, I would conceal the fact that America has had, and I am afraid now has, her traitors. Did not the history of the vile Arnold spread far and wide over the civilized world; and the name of Aaron Burr, not less to be abhorred, but which still lives in infamy in our own recollections, and to the disgrace of some who survive him, has had his biographers, his adherents, and his eulogists!

Mr. Speaker, I hope the Independent Treasury scheme will become a law; I hope so, because I think the highest interests of the country require it—I mean every interest connected with trade which requires the establishment of a sound currency. I think it of vast importance to the banks that it should become a law. I would be at a loss to know what better to recommend for their interest, and I am in possession of letters from presidents and cashiers of banks, and intelligent merchants, sustaining me in this opinion. I think the preservation of the Constitution and the sovereignty and independence of the Government requires that it should become a law; and lastly, a look upon the establishment of the Independent Treasury, as the only means of preventing the establishment of a National Bank which I would look upon as the greatest calamity that could befall this nation and this people.

REMARKS OF

MESSRS. CALHOUN AND BUCHANAN,

In Senate, June 28, 1838—On the amendment of the latter to the bill introduced by Mr. WEBSTER in relation to the deposites of the public money.

Mr. CALHOUN arose and said:

I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] in the first instance; and, if that should fail, vote against the bill itself. I am opposed to both, and prefer things as they are, to either; but, if one or the other must prevail, I would rather see the bill succeed than the amendment. I prefer the bill, among other reasons, because it comes from the proper quarter—from the responsible party. We who are in favor of the Constitutional Treasury (for that is the proper name) have done all we could to effect our object; all have been defeated for the present. We have already made all the concessions consistent with the great and constitutional ground of separating Government and banks, which we have pledged ourselves to maintain. In order to effect this most important object, and to avoid the possibility of a pressure in carrying it through, we proposed to effect the separation gradually and slowly, through the long period of seven years. But, notwithstanding this liberal concession, we have been defeated on a vote, going directly to the merits of the question, by a small majority. Our defeat has shifted the responsibility. It is admitted on all sides that something ought to be done, and that the revenue ought not to be left under the mere discretion of the Executive. We, who are for the separation, have met the responsibility fairly and fully, by proposing what we believed to be the proper remedy, and have failed; and it now belongs to those who have defeated us to propose theirs, or to stand responsible for the continuance of the present state of things, to which all sides are opposed. Our Government, it must be remembered, is very different from that of Great Britain. There the responsibility is wholly on the ministry, which is forced to retire on a defeat, or to dissolve Parliament, and make a direct appeal to the people; but according to the principles of our Government, all are responsible; with this difference only, that the Executive, who is charged to administer the Government, is bound to recommend, in the first instance, the measure he deems proper, which, if it fails, throws the responsibility to find a substitute on those who have defeated his recommendation. In this case I am for leaving the responsibility where reason, and the forms of our Government, place it. The Senator from Massachusetts, feeling this responsibility, has brought forward this bill; and although I cannot, in conformity to my principles, give it any support, yet with these views of the two measures, other considerations being equal, I should prefer that the bill should be adopted rather than the amendment.

There is another view of the subject which raises strong objections in my mind to the amendment. Coming from the quarter it does, it is calculated to distract and confound the friends of the Constitutional Treasury, though I feel confident it was not so intended. I do but justice to the mover in saying, his declarations and votes, when not instructed, have been uniform and steady in favor of this great measure of reform; but it is not the less certain, that the measure he proposes must have an unhappy effect. It cannot be disguised that the real issue is between the Constitutional Treasury—that is, that the Government should collect and keep, by its own officers, the revenues in the currency of the Constitution, free from all connections with private corporations—and a National Bank. This is the real issue that divides the people and their representatives.

There are, indeed, a few respectable individuals who are in favor of the pet bank system, and still fewer in favor of special deposites; but they are too few to make a party, or to be taken into the estimate. It is desirable on all sides that the real issue should be seen, and that the people should prepare to meet it. It is indeed a great issue, involving a great revolution in our social condition, and the fate of our free institutions. The proposition of a special deposite system, coming as it does from a friendly and prominent quarter, cannot but tend to confound the friends of the Constitutional Treasury at this critical moment, and excite distrust and suspicion. It illy accords with the lofty position that we have sustained, I will say, with such triumphant and unanswerable arguments, and which have done so much to brace and prepare the public mind to meet this mighty contest; and in this case I cannot but regret the move as very unfortunate. If there ever was a move that required inflexible firmness, and when the least giving way was hazardous, it was this. Our cause is good. We have truth, reason, justice, and the Constitution on our side; and these, if the cause be firmly and manfully maintained, must in the end prevail. I have never yet seen a good cause, supported as it ought to be, fail of success. In this case I always dreaded the onset. I saw the power of the opposite side sustained by the almost undivided banking interest of the country, and knew how imperfectly the question at issue was understood by the country at large; while, at the same time, I clearly perceived that such was the solidity and strength of our cause at bottom, that if we could resist the first onset without being utterly overwhelmed, victory in the end, if we stood fast, was inevitable. Well, we have met the first shock; and though defeated, so far from overthrown, a few more votes would have carried the cause triumphantly through both Houses. We have now only to stand fast till the people shall come to the rescue of the Constitution and our free institutions; and come they will, with an overwhelming rush, when they come to understand the true character of the issue, if we, whom they have appointed to stand sentinels, do not desert or betray our trust. Thus regarding the character of the struggle, I would have a strong repugnance to vote for the amendment, coming from the quarter it does, even if I thought much more favorably of it than I do.

But, independent of these considerations, I cannot give it my support. I consider it of itself much more objectionable than the bill. The adoption of either would restore the pet bank system; but the latter, in a much more objectionable form, as will be manifest on a comparison of their respective provisions. They both propose to make the banks the depositories of the public money, and to collect the revenue in bank notes. The essential difference between them, and the only essential difference, as I shall show, is that the amendment proposes to repeal entirely the deposite act of 1836, as far as it relates to the banks, and the bill to retain it, with some, but not very important modifications, which it is not necessary to enumerate. The difference, then, is this: if the amendment prevails, we shall have the pet bank system, without any legal restrictions or limitations, as it stood prior to the passage of the deposite act of 1836; and if the bill prevails, we shall have it with all the restrictions and limitations which that act provides, except, as I have stated, a few not important modifications. The repeal of the act would give the Executive the right to select what banks he pleased, and as many as he pleased, to keep the public money; to dismiss them at his pleasure; to establish what regulations he chose; and to bestow or withhold favors at pleasure; in a word, would place the whole under his unlimited will and discretion. Such would be the case, if the amendment should prevail. On the other hand, if the bill should, the selection, the dismissal, the regulation, the duties to be performed, and the compensation to be paid for the use of the public funds, would all be under the control of law, instead of being left to Executive discretion. I am, said Mr. C. opposed to discretionary power; and when forced to decide between a system of deposite regulated by law, and one left to discretion, must prefer the former, though decidedly opposed to both; and must, therefore, vote in the first instance against the amendment, and, should that fail, against the bill itself.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he would not enter upon a general discussion of the question; but the remarks which had just been made by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] rendered a brief reply from him absolutely necessary. He wished to place himself in the position he desired to occupy before the country, in relation to this amendment; and that too, so clearly and distinctly, as to prevent all misrepresentation. This was a duty which he owed to himself, especially as the remarks of the Senator, and from first to last, showed that he had entirely mistaken the whole tenor and effect of the amendment. Indeed, if he had never read it at all, he could not have been less acquainted, than he seemed to be, with its provisions.

Mr. B. regretted that the Senator had preferred the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] to his [Mr. B's] amendment; and his astonishment was fully equal to his regret. After all he had said against the deposite bank system, and in favor of separating the Government from banks, Mr. B. could not have anticipated that he would prefer the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts, which was a perfect preforation of that very system with additional privileges, to the amendment, which would effect an entire divorce of the Government from all banks as general depositories. Had the Senator determined to vote first for the amendment, and then after its insertion to vote against the bill as amended, I should have understood his course. At present, it appears to me to be perfectly incomprehensible.

The Senator commences by stating that as we have been defeated on the Sub-Treasury bill, which was our favorite measure, that therefore we are not bound to propose any other mode of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public money. That this defeat has thrown the responsibility entirely upon the Opposition; and it has thus become their duty, and is no longer ours, to propose measures for this purpose.

Now, sir, what is the plain meaning of this proposition? That those to whom the people of this country have entrusted the administration of their Government shall abandon this trust altogether, when they find that a majority in either House of Congress have refused to adopt the measure which they had recommended—that they shall then fold their arms, and appeal to their enemies to introduce some other measure. We cannot discharge our duty to the people by pursuing any such course. We cannot abandon the helm without disgrace. If we have been defeated in our favorite measure, we ought, without deserting our principles, to resort to another. The great, the leading object is to separate the Government from the banks as general depositories, and thus to prevent them from trading on the public money. Keeping this great principle steadily in view, it is our duty to adopt any measure likely to obtain a majority, which will secure the public money, and place it under the guard of laws. It will not do for us to say to the people, you shall take the Sub-Treasury, or you shall have nothing. Such a determination is opposed to the genius of our institutions. The President of the United States, although as great a friend of the Sub-Treasury as any of us, did not agree in opinion, on this point, with the Senator from South Carolina. Although, in his message at the commencement of the session, he strongly recommended the adoption of the Sub-Treasury system; yet he suggested an alternative—a second choice. It is upon this suggestion that I have acted, and my amendment has been framed in strict conformity with it. I need not again read to the Senate what the President has said upon this subject. We, as friends of the Administration, and I esteem myself as good a friend to it as the Senator from South Carolina, cannot shift the responsibility from ourselves to our political opponents, by telling them that because they have rejected our favorite measure, the duty devolves upon them to propose a substitute. Suppose they refuse to do it, shall we stand still, and leave the country to suffer? We can only relieve ourselves from our responsibility, by presenting every reasonable measure; and if they choose to reject them all, we shall then, and then only, stand acquitted before the country; and they will then, and then only, be held responsible.

The Senator from South Carolina says he is opposed to the extension of Executive discretion. So am I. One chief object of my amendment was to limit, not to enlarge, Executive discretion, and to prescribe, by precise law, the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the public money. This amendment was prepared with great care, and after consultation with some of those who best understand the subject. I had two purposes in view. One was to direct the Secretary of the Treasury in what manner he should dispose of the bank notes which he might receive in payment of the public dues; and the other, to produce an entire separation of the money of the Government from the business of the banks. I thought the amendment would accomplish these two objects; and yet, strange and wonderful to tell, the Senator prefers the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because my amendment, as he says, leaves every thing to Executive discretion, and restores the Pet Bank system without any limitation whatever. I have never been more astonished in my life than when I heard these objections to the amendment.

What, sir, this amendment a return to the old Pet Bank system, to use his own phraseology, when it declares in so many words that no bank notes shall be placed, "either on general or special deposite," with any bank whatever! This single provision entirely severs the connection between the Government and the banks, as general depositories, which had been created by the deposite act. It renders it impossible that the banks shall ever again trade upon the public money; and yet the Senator has declared that, should it prevail, it will be a restoration of this very system without any limitation whatever. It is impossible to argue against such statements. In order, however, to tear up this system by the roots, my amendment proposes to repeal the deposite law altogether, which he so much condemns; and yet, notwithstanding, he argues strenuously against this repeal, and says its effect would be to leave the public money entirely to Executive discretion. This might have been the consequence, had I been guilty of the folly of attempting to destroy one system without substituting another. That is not the case. The two first sections of my amendment prescribe clearly what shall be done with the public money, between the time of its receipt and its disbursement. It is to be kept in the hands of the collectors and receivers, and is to be disbursed by them during fixed periods, not exceeding sixty days; and the balances remaining on hand at the end of these periods are to be converted into specie, and, for greater security, are to be placed on special deposite, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in the vaults of such banks as may be selected by the Treasury Department. Every necessary power is conferred upon the Department to render these deposites special, in the strictest sense of the word, and to confine the banks to the mere safe-keeping of them, in the form they are delivered. The vaults of the banks are to be substituted for the private houses of the collectors and receivers, as places of greater security. In substance, this is the very same provision, in regard to special deposites of specie, as that contained in the Sub-Treasury bill, which received the warmest commendation of the Senator. Under that bill, in every portion of the Union, except the six places where there are mints, or where receivers general were to be established, the public money, in specie, was to be placed in such banks as the Secretary of the Treasury might select, on special deposite. And yet, after all, the Senator prefers the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts to my amendment. He prefers the old Pet Bank system, with new privileges, to a system which will keep the Government money in the hands of Government officers, until it shall accumulate to such an amount as to render it insecure; and afterwards place it, in gold and silver, on special deposite with the banks, precisely according to his favorite plan. The Senator even says that the bill is greatly superior to the amendment.

And what is this bill? It is not only a revival of the old deposite act which he so much abhors, but an extension of its provisions to embrace all banking associations which may hereafter be established under the general banking law of New York, and under similar laws of other States, which may be passed hereafter. Nay, more: it repeals every restriction, and directs the employment of all banks, notwithstanding they may have issued, or shall hereafter issue, notes of the very lowest denominations.

Now, sir, it is certain that the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts cannot pass. I would, therefore, ask him, as an enemy of Executive discretion, whether he will consent to go home and leave the whole revenue of the United States in the hands of the Executive, without any legal provision whatever, unless it may be in regard to deposites made with the few banks which have not forfeited their right to become general depositories? This is the question. As a friend of my country, and a friend of the Administration, I am unwilling to pursue such a course.

We shall then have no law except the act of 1789, which I have shown on a former occasion was wholly inadequate to meet the crisis. It merely provides that the Treasurer shall receive, keep, and disburse the public money; and was evidently intended for the infancy of our institutions, and for hard money alone. But under the joint resolution of 1816, as soon as the banks shall resume specie payments, nearly the whole of the public revenue will be received in bank notes, or, what is the same thing, in drafts on banks. What is the Secretary of the Treasury to do with these notes and drafts? Will you leave him without the protection of any law upon the subject? His position will be most embarrassing. If he demands gold and silver from the banks to meet the wants of the Government, this will be denounced as an abuse of his discretion, and as an evidence of hostility to these institutions. Should he keep a mass of bank notes on hand, and any of the banks become insolvent, and thus the Government sustain loss, he will be loudly condemned for favoritism towards them. If, in the exercise of a sound discretion, he call upon some banks to redeem their notes in specie, and not upon others, this will be considered as proof of guilty partiality. Let him do what he may, he is equally certain of censure. As a man, desirous to maintaining a fair character with my countrymen, I would not accept the office, of Secretary of the Treasury, at the present crisis without any law to guide me, for the wealth of the Indies. Charges will be echoed and re-echoed, by the enemies of the Administration, against the Secretary, from every portion of the Union, for the purpose of driving it from power. Ought any of its friends to place it in this situation? Ought the present state of things to continue until the session of 1839, '40? Before that period, we cannot entertain the most remote hope of passing the Sub-Treasury bill. Ought we to attempt nothing, because we cannot obtain every thing? The country will never sanction the principle advanced by the Senator from South Carolina, that because we have tried one measure and failed in it, that therefore the responsibility of introducing another will devolve exclusively on the enemies of the Administration.

What shall the Secretary of the Treasury do with this mass of bank paper, after it shall have been received in payment of the public dues? My amendment answers the question in a plain and satisfactory manner. He shall pay out the bank notes, by drafts on the collectors and receivers, to the public creditors, who may bona fide elect to accept them during periods of sixty days; and at the end of these periods, the collectors and receivers shall make settlements with the banks whose notes they hold, and the balances shall be converted into specie, and placed with the banks on special deposite. Should the security of the public money at those points where the largest amounts are collected require more frequent settlements, the Secretary is authorized to direct them to be made. In all cases, this would be much more liberal than the rule of the old Bank of the United States, which required weekly settlements with the State banks. At these settlements, the banks would receive credit for the Treasury drafts in their possession, and the balance would be struck and converted into specie. That this would not operate with too much severity upon the banks, I have shown in the remarks which I made when I offered the amendment.

This amendment removes all Executive discretion except what is absolutely necessary from the nature of the subject; it prescribes a precise rule of action which would be known to the whole country, and it shields the Secretary of the Treasury under the laws of the land, to which we all must submit. It substitutes the law of Congress for the will of the officer; and if this law be fairly obeyed, all complaints against the Administration in relation to the use of the public money must cease.

But the Senator is opposed to my amendment, because it will bewilder and confuse the public mind, in relation to the issue presented to the people between a Bank of the United States and a Constitutional Treasury, limited in its receipts and its disbursements to gold and silver. Now, sir, in my opinion, this amendment, even if it had no other merit, ought to prevail; because it is the best, if not the only means by which we can reach this Constitutional Treasury. Great and fundamental changes in the settled policy of a people, unless under extraordinary circumstances, can only be accomplished gradually. The public mind must first be prepared to adopt them. For this reason, it appears to me unwise to refuse to make any advance towards our object, because we cannot reach it at one bound. Public opinion, I firmly believe, is already prepared for a separation of the money of the Government from the business of banks. My amendment completely accomplishes this purpose. It divorces Bank and State; and provides a distinct and independent mode of keeping the public money, such as has been suggested by the President, and is already to a certain extent practised by the Treasury Department. Let us take this first, this important step; and wait for better times to accomplish the remainder. The Senator himself was in favor of proceeding gradually. Under his amendment to the Sub-Treasury bill, we should have been eight years in reaching exclusive specie receipts and payments.

Upon the whole, I flatter myself that as the Senator has most certainly misapprehended my amendment in every essential particular, he will upon reflection, change his opinion, and give it a preference over the old pet bank system, which the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to re-establish.

Mr. CLAY then addressed the Senate in opposition to the amendment, and in reply to Mr. CALHOUN; after which, intended to represent me as a partisan of the Administration. I have no fear that they would have the least possible effect within the limits of these walls, where my course is well known and understood. I confidently appeal to every Senator present, whether my acts and votes, on all occasions, have not been in strict conformity to principles which I have been known long to entertain. Not an instance can be pointed out to the contrary. But though the Senator's declarations will be harmless here, they may not be so beyond these walls, where they were intended to have an effect, if I should remain silent; and it is only on that account I notice them. I am no partisan of any man, nor any Administration. I am free to act on all questions according to my unbiassed judgment, unembarrassed by party trammels. I concur with the Administration on the great question of the Constitutional Treasury, and have, and will continue to give them, so far as that is concerned, a sincere, decided, and hearty support; and shall stand prepared to support or oppose whatever other measure they may propose, just as it may, or may not, accord with my principles and views of policy. I hope they may give me many opportunities to support, and few to oppose, them. It is my fortune to stand here alone, looking to no other guide in the discharge of my duty but God and my conscience. I seek neither office nor popular favor.

The Senator asks me if I belong to that sectional party in the South, which he intimates has views not very friendly to the continuance of the Union. He was not very explicit in his reference. If he means the party there which has stood up for Southern rights and interests—the party opposed to the Tariff and his American System, to unequal and excessive duties and appropriations, the party opposed to Abolition, and in favor of the direct trade—I am proud to say that I do belong to that party; but, if he refers to any party entertaining views or feelings hostile to the Union, I have only to say I know of no such party there, nor do I belong to any such.

Providence (Mr. President) has pleased to cast my lot in the weakest and most exposed section of the Union; and I have, and shall continue to defend it, as far as my abilities go, against all oppression and unconstitutional acts, without regarding how it may affect my popularity and standing in other quarters. Nor, in doing this, am I in the least actuated by a feeling of hostility towards this Union, or any section of the country. I defy my most bitter enemy to point out any act of injustice or oppression towards any other portion of the Union, that I have ever countenanced, unless, indeed, resistance to injustice towards my own should be considered injustice towards other sections, which might be benefitted by it. So far from hostility, I have been governed by directly the opposite motives—by a deep and an abiding attachment to the Union, and the most anxious desire to preserve it and its integrity. Our Union rests on justice—on the equal distribution of its advantages and burthens. So long as that is preserved, there is no danger of the Union; while, on the other hand, if it be habitually and permanently disregarded, nothing can preserve it. He knows nothing of the human heart, or the working of a political system extended over so wide a country, who does not see that there must be a constant tendency on the part of the stronger portion to monopolise all the advantages for itself, and to transfer all its burthens to the weaker. Nor is he less ignorant, who does not see that such a tendency must, in the end, prove fatal to the Government, if not steadily and successfully resisted. It has been my fortune to see and act on these principles, and in doing so I have been governed not only by a sense of justice towards those whom I represent, and the portion of the country to which they belong, but by deep devotion to the interest of the whole Union. The Senator seems to take a different view. He would seem to regard resistance to wrong as hostility to the Union, and the support of aggression as the means of preserving it. He habitually confines his censure to those who oppose oppression, without ever raising his voice against the oppressor. I am, however, glad to see that he does not entirely deny the truth of the principles on which I act. He is at last compelled to admit, that Abolition is making greater progress than he had anticipated, and to acknowledge that the time may come when he shall be compelled to take a stand and lead against the fanatics. We may then oppose aggression, I suppose, without losing attachment to the Union, at least on the Abolition question; but if we may do it in that case, I would ask why we may not also against the Tariff and American System, and other oppressive measures to which the South has been opposed? Why shall it be justifiable in the one and not in the other case?

The Senator thinks I have been too stern and uncompromising in my opposition to the fanatics, and that its effect has been to increase their number. He would take a more compromising course. He would have opened the doors of this chamber to their admission, and reasoned the case with them, whether we had a title to our property or not. Without adding a word, I leave those interested to judge which of the two courses is the safest and best.

The Senator regards the defeat of the Constitutional Treasury bill in the other House, as a complete overthrow, and raises the shout of victory. He greatly mistakes. It is but a skirmish at the commencement of a conflict, which is destined to last for years. The cause of the struggle is too deep to terminate with the first onset; and so far from being discouraged by the slight defeat which some half a dozen of votes would have turned into a victory, I feel a renewed assurance of final and complete triumph, if we but stand fast. What I always dreaded, as I have said, was the first shock. I never doubted, if it could be resisted, a final and glorious triumph awaited the cause we advocated. We have now met the first shock; and, so far from being overwhelmed, we have been defeated by only a few votes. Time is now working for us. The discussion is gone to the community. Truth and reason are on our side. Our arguments neither have, nor can be, answered; and time and reflection only are wanting to give them their full effect. The people are roused; and their attention is intensely directed to the subject, which will not fail to tell hereafter.

In the mean time, the difficulties on the opposite side will soon begin to present themselves. They have thus far had the easy task of being the assailants, but the very victory, of which they boast so much, throws the responsibility on them, and will compel them to move; and let me tell the Senator, when he comes to bring forward his gigantic scheme of blending into one the General and State Governments, and uniting the two with the great capitalists of the country in his fifty million bank, with the view of controlling the currency and industry of the country. When, in a word, he comes to rear up his bank monarchy to govern the country with despotic sway, he will begin to find his trouble. He will find it no easy task to fix on the seat of its empire, and place the despot on his throne; and whenever he attempts it, let me tell him, instead of a slight defeat of a few votes, as we have experienced, he will be overwhelmed with a Waterloo overthrow, from which he and his cause will never recover.

REMARKS OF MR. GARLAND, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, July 2, 1838, in Committee of the Whole, on the Harbor bill. The motion pending being to amend the bill by making an appropriation to purchase the stock of the Louisville and Portland canal.

Mr. GARLAND said that he did not rise for the purpose of discussing the particular merits of the amendment proposed, but to express his opinions upon this subject generally, which were in opposition to the bill, and the whole system of internal improvements by this Government. He said he had not before had an opportunity to state his objections to this system, which he now proposed very briefly to do. The Constitution gives no power to the Federal Government to invade the territorial jurisdiction of any State, at the expense of its sovereignty. It can acquire no right of property or permanent jurisdiction over the soil in the States; if it could, then the States were not sovereign, but hold their right of property at the discretion of this Government, which would constitute this a consolidated and supreme Government over all the power and jurisdiction of the States. The powers expressly delegated to this Government, were the only powers which this Government could exercise; and they, in no case, required this supreme power and jurisdiction over the soil of the States, as necessary to their exercise. The soil constituted the jurisdiction of the State, and to that must be referred the jurisdiction over navigable streams; one jurisdiction could not attach to water, and another to the soil which it covered; jurisdiction of the one was jurisdiction of the other, and the establishment of ports of entry could not confer jurisdiction. The arguments derived in favor of constitutional power from the establishment of ports of entry was utterly fallacious; and, if true, would subject every stream in a State to the control and jurisdiction of this Government. If this Government possessed this power over navigable streams within the jurisdiction of a State, upon the same principle it had it over the soil, and might cut and construct roads and canals at pleasure, and thus plant its officers and jurisdiction through all the valuable arteries of the States, to the exclusion of State authority. This would be the inevitable result; and when the Federal Government should have completed the establishment of its jurisdiction upon bays, harbors, and rivers, it would take up roads and canals, and finally draw into its vortex all the valuable jurisdiction of soil and avenues of trade, to the ruin and impoverishment of the State Governments, and sink State power into insignificance and contempt. He warned gentlemen, particularly those who valued the power, efficiency, and respectability of the States, to ponder well the ground upon which they stood, and the danger to which they were exposing the jurisdiction, power, and interests of the States. Once let unconstitutional Federal power, with the immense influences which it could exert, get firm footing in the States, and its ultimate absorption of all the valuable powers of the States was inevitable.

It was said [said Mr. G.] that this bill only made appropriations to complete works already began. Sir, said he, this had been the practice from the foundation of the Government, and there were always some unfinished works on hand, and, it seemed, few were ever completed. The Constitution was first violated, and then continued appropriations were sought to complete the violation. Mr. G. said he did not understand how one violation of the Constitution could justify another; and if the first appropriation was in violation of the Constitution, the second was equally so; but yet, sir, under this garb, appropriation after appropriation had been made, until many millions of money had been expended in utter disregard of constitutional power.

The gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. CUSHMAN,] said truly, when he said that this system is objectionable, because of its inequality; nature has created the inequality, and the Constitution has therefore left the work of internal improvements to be conducted by themselves. But, sir, some gentlemen shelter themselves under the mantle of nationality. This Government, say they, has the power to construct works of a national character; this surrenders the whole power. Who is to judge whether a public work is national? This Government! What limit is there, or what appeal from its judgment? None whatever! What remedy has a State if the power be indiscreetly exercised? None! The plain solution of the proposition is, that, although this Government cannot enter into a single State, and construct public works, yet, by running through two or more States, it can exercise the power, and run through the whole, or as many States as it pleases, without any limit or control. It is only necessary to dub it "national," and the jurisdiction is acquired.

The numerous propositions and the insignificant streams proposed to be improved, warn us of the extensive and dangerous extent to which this system may be pressed; and the logrolling by which it may be carried, all warn us of the dangers to which we are exposed. He knew, he said, this was old fashioned Virginia doctrine, and would have but little weight; yet it was true, and time would develope the impropriety of departing from it. He said he should vote against this, as he should every other bill of like character; he would vote for the improvement of a harbor really within the national jurisdiction, but if gentlemen choose to hang so many dead weights upon it, he must vote against it. He would not vote for a host of unconstitutional works to save a constitutional one.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

SPEECH OF MR. GRAHAM,
OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, May 24, 1838—On the bill making an appropriation to prevent and suppress Indian hostilities.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The bill now under discussion proposes to appropriate money to prevent and suppress Indian hostilities. This appropriation is asked, not to declare war against the Cherokee Indians, but to prevent and suppress a protracted and bloody war by them upon the white settlements in North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia. This objects meets my decided approbation. The volunteers and militia now called by the Government into public service for this specific purpose must be supported and paid. A small portion of the Cherokee country laps on the southwestern part of North Carolina, and lies within the limits of the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent on this floor. I have no hostile feelings to the Cherokee Indians; my constituents and my State have no unkind feelings to them. Since the treaty of Hopewell, in the year 1785, down to this day, the State of North Carolina has uniformly acted with justice and generosity towards those Indians; and my constituents have respected their rights, and dwelt in amicable relations on their frontier borders. The treaties of 1817 and 1819, granting reservations of land to certain resident Indians, were productive of much confusion and some litigation in North Carolina; still the Indians and their council were always well satisfied with the decisions of our courts; for justice is ably and impartially administered in North Carolina to all classes and to all colors. About one hundred Cherokee Indians, seven or eight years since, voluntarily left their tribe, and removed themselves to a white settlement in my district; and I am informed they are temperate, orderly, and industrious, and dwell in peace among their white neighbors. I am further informed, by late letters, that the Indians are now coming from all parts of their nation, and taking refuge in my district. I mention these facts to repudiate and repel all the unfounded charges of oppression and cruelty that have been hatched in sickly sympathy, and conjured up in this debate, so far as they relate to me and mine, and to demonstrate that my district and State have at all times acted with justice, liberality, humanity, and mercy, towards the Cherokee Indians. Some of the Cherokees are more civilized and cultivated than any other Indians with whom I am acquainted; still the great body of their tribe are cruel, savage Indians; and God forbid that I should ever surrender my country and forsake the white people for the red race.

In the year 1835 the Cherokee chiefs sold by treaty all their lands east of the Mississippi river to the United States, for the gross sum of five millions six hundred thousand dollars, ($5,600,000,) and agreed, on or before the 23d day of May, 1838, to remove west of the Mississippi river, to an extensive territory allotted to them by different compacts, and embracing, by computation, thirteen millions eight hundred thousand acres of land. It is now alleged here in debate that this treaty is fraudulent and void, and that the appropriation now demanded to execute it, and preserve the peace, ought to be withheld or suspended until we pronounce that treaty fair or foul, good or bad.

Mr. Chairman, I hold, and now contend, that the Constitution of the United States has conferred upon the President and Senate, alone and exclusively, the treaty-making power. This branch of Congress has nothing to do in making or unmaking treaties. This House has the rightful and constitutional power over the purse and money of the people; and, in pursuance of that very power, so vested, this House, two years since, made an appropriation of five millions six hundred thousand dollars to execute and fulfil this treaty. Yes, sir, the journal of 1836, which is now before my eyes, proves that one hundred and twenty-five members voted for the appropriation, while only forty-three could be found to vote against it. This treaty, therefore, was made and ratified by the proper parties to whom the Constitution committed this high trust, and was solemnly approved, in appropriating the ways and means for its execution, by a large majority of the representatives of the people. It has now become the supreme law of the land, and both State and individual rights are vested under it. The contract is no longer executory, but in part actually executed, and hundreds of Indians have received thousands of dollars and removed to the far western wilderness, under its bountiful provisions. I could not if I would, and would not if I could, overthrow and demolish it.

The very question involved in this treaty, and at present under investigation, was solemnly decided by both branches of Congress, about two years ago, in a protracted and perplexing controversy with France. France then delayed and declined to perform her treaty stipulations and obligations with the United States. What then did this House say to the "law's delay and the insolence of office?" The answer was unanimous: we will stand upon our constitutional rights; we will not look back, beyond or behind the treaty. The French case is analogous and parallel to the Indian case; it decides it. We cannot now look back, behind or beyond the Cherokee treaty, solemnly made and ratified by the President and Senate. We cannot rightfully get over it, under it, or around it, because the Constitution has erected an impassable barrier between us and the treaty-making power.

Mr. Chairman, although this treaty is a constitutional shield in defence of the ground I assume, yet I will proceed and show, I think, to the satisfaction of all unprejudiced minds, that the Cherokee treaty of 1835 was fairly made, upon a full consideration, and ought to be fairly and truly executed; that a more beneficial and liberal treaty was never made with any tribe; and that no real and sincere friend of the Indians should wish to see it abrogated, nullified or violated. Now, sir, to the law and to the testimony. The most intelligent and influential Cherokee chiefs are quite rich, (the owners of valuable lands and slaves,) and they have become so by the frequent receipts of annuities and appropriations from the General Government, while the great mass of the tribe are poor, very poor, miserable creatures. The chiefs and head-men are generally white Indians—not red Indians. By white Indians I mean those who have more of the white man's blood in their veins than they have of the Indian stock. John Ross, the principal chief, is seven parts white, and only one degree Indian. Mr. Chairman, are you acquainted with the Indian character and customs? If you are, you know they repose implicit confidence in their head-men. The law of their nation is the will of their head-men. All the treaties of the United States with the Indian tribes have been made with their chiefs. The Cherokee Indians have, for a number of years, had serious difficulties with the State of Georgia; and, to add to their misfortunes, they also have had bitter internal divisions among themselves. The chiefs and tribe have split into two formidable parties. Amidst these difficulties and dissensions, John Ross and his party, delegates, in the year 1835, came to Washington, and offered to sell all the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi river, for the gross and lumped sum of twenty millions of dollars. This proposition was promptly rejected by the President (General Jackson) as being too extravagant and enormous, and very far beyond the real value of the land. Ross and his associates then addressed a note in writing to the President, reminding him "that he has often remarked, that he would grant the Indians as liberal terms as the Senate, or the friends of the Indians, would be willing to allow;" and he asked that his proposition might be submitted by the President to the Senate, for their sense and opinion thereon. In this fishing diplomatic note, Ross wishes the sense of the Senate to be ascertained and pronounced, but does not promise to stand by their judgment. The President and his Secretary at War perceived the bait on the hook, and declined all idle children's play with this adroit and skilful negotiator. Let it be borne in mind, that at that time the majority of the Senate were politically opposed to the President. Ross and his party then made another proposition of sale to the President, and reference of value to the Senate, which I will read from their own words:

FEBRUARY 28, 1835.

SIR: Having submitted a proposition for a final adjustment of our difficulties with the Government of the United States, and understanding that the President deems it too extravagant, we must beg that the subject be referred to the Senate, for its sense on the question, the President having often told us that he was disposed to treat us with liberal justice, and that he would go as far as the Senate would allow him in regard to money matters.

We therefore trust he will adopt this course. Being extremely desirous that this unhappy controversy might be speedily adjusted, and deeply sensible of our dependent condition, and confiding in the liberal justice of the United States Government, we are prepared, so far as we are concerned, to abide the award of the sense of the American Senate upon our proposition, and to recommend the same for the final determination of our nation.

We have the honor to be, sir,
Very respectfully,
Your ob't, humble servts.
JOHN ROSS,
R. TAYLOR,
DAN'L McCOY,
SAM'L GUNTER,
WM. RODGERS,

To the Hon. LEWIS CASS,
Secretary at War.

The Secretary at War (Gov. Cass) answered the letter I have just read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
March 6, 1835.

GENTLEMEN: In your letter of the 28th ultimo, you stated your readiness to accept for yourselves, and to recommend to the Cherokee people to accept, such sum for their claims east of the Mississippi river as the Senate of the United States might deem just. The Senate have, by a resolution, stated, as their opinion, that "a sum not exceedidg five millions of dollars should be paid to the Cherokee Indians for all their lands and possessions east of the Mississippi river."

The President wishes now, as he has always done heretofore, to treat with you in a spirt of candor as well as liberality. He has, therefore, directed me to communicate to you at once, the resolution of the Senate, and to state his willingness to enter into a negotiation with you for the cession of all your claims east of the Mississipp, upon condition that the whole amount of the consideration to be given shall not exceed the above mentioned sum. This you were before informed should be done, and the pledge will be redeemed with fidelity.

I am now ready to receive your propositions concerning the various stipulations to be imbodied in a treaty for the protection of private rights, and for such arrangements as may be necessary for the removal and and re-establishment of your people.

Very, &c.
LEWIS CASS.

Messrs. JOHN ROSS,
R. TAYLOR,
DAN'L McCOY,
SAM'L GUNTER,
WM. RODGERS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a proposition, on behalf of Ross and his party, so far as they were concerned, to abide the award of the American Senate in relation to the value of the Cherokee country; the President directly acceded to that proposition, and communicated the matter in dispute to the Senate, and referred the value of the land entirely to that enlightened body. They took the subject under consideration, and decided and declared, by resolution, as their opinion, that a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars should be paid to the Cherokee Indians for all their lands and possessions east of the Mississippi river. Ross and his party further agreed and undertook to recommend to their nation to make a treaty for such sum as the Senate's award should fix and designate. Here is a fair contract, (dictated by Ross himself,) founded on a high and heaping price. Now, how has this promise been performed? How has this contract been executed? The President, through his Secretary, immediately notified Ross and his party that he was ready to negotiate the treaty for the aggregate sum of five millions of dollars, to be in full for the entire cession; but the application of the money would be such as the chiefs desire, a just regard being had to individual rights. John Ross, learning that five millions, and not twenty millions of dollars, had been fixed and awarded, as the consideration of bargain and sale, suggested many excuses, and pretended that the expenses and costs of removal, subsistence, and so forth, were to be added, over and above the five millions; and that he must return directly to the Cherokee nation, to arrange and adjust all the details and specifications, and take the sense of the Indians, before he proceeded to consummate the treaty. He left this city, and went home; not to recommend, but to oppose, the treaty, on the basis and value pronounced by the Senate; and he has opposed it from that time to this day, and used and exerted all his power and influence to defeat it. He procured a great meeting in council among the Indians, at Red Clay, and prevailed upon them (both the Ridge party and the Ross party) to co-operate and unite in rejecting the treaty he had solemnly promised to recommend for their adoption. He then had eighteen commissioners nominated and appointed, (nine from each party,) invested "with full power from the Cherokee people, in general council assembled, to make such treaty as may appear to them best calculated to insure the present peace and future prosperity of that country." Here was absolute power conferred and vested in both parties to sell the Cherokee lands and execute a treaty. The President sent commissioners into the Cherokee country to conclude and consummate the treaty, according to the Senate's award. The rival chiefs soon terminated their amicable relations and harmonious action, and were again torn asunder, and stood in hostile opposition to each other. You will hold in remembrance, when Ross was in Washington he pretended he could not negotiate the terms and details of the treaty there, because he wanted all specifications settled and arranged in the nation, for the satisfaction of the Indians; and when the commissioners went into the Indian nation, and announced the object of their mission, then he endeavored to evade and give the go-by to the whole subject, by informing the commissioners he could not negotiate and make a treaty there, in the Indian nation, but he would go back to Washington and consummate the whole business. Thus you perceive Indian diplomacy bears the likeness and similitude of Reynard, who, when closely pursued, in his doublings and windings, strives hard to take the back track, and return to the place where the chase began. The Ridge party, who were sincerely desirous to sell and remove, saw and knew this double dealing and talking with a forked tongue must ultimately sacrifice the great body of the Cherokee people, and they refused to accompany Ross and his party to Washington; and they resolved to make a treaty on the best terms they could with the United States commissioners, then in the nation for that purpose. In this unhappy internal division and distraction of councils and chiefs, John Ross and his delegation came off to Washington, while Ridge and his party (who were rendered by the nation coequal with the Ross party in all powers to sell) remained in their country, and concluded the treaty of New Echota, (or, in English, the City of Refuge,) on the 29th day of December, 1835, on the basis of five millions of dollars, as awarded by the Senate, and six hundred thousand dollars more, to be given and paid for removal and subsistence west of the Mississippi river. The six hundred thousand dollar provision was conditional, and dependent on the subsequent approbation of the Senate. This treaty was signed generally by the Ridge party, and by William Rodgers, one of the Ross delegates, who agreed to abide the award of the Senate; and he faithfully redeemed that pledge. The treaty of New Echota was sent by the President to the Senate, who knew the whole history of this matter from beginning to end, and they approved and ratified it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have shown you that Ridge and his party were equally authorized by the tribe with Ross to make a treaty; and they did actually execute one, for six hundred thousand dollars more than the Senate (as referees) said the country was worth; and still Ross refused to sign it. Here you perceive this treaty was indeed signed by one party, (the Ridge party,) and it was solemnly agreed, in writing, to be signed by the other party, (the Ross party.) When the Senate of the United States advised and consented to the ratification of this treaty, they acted upon the well-known and long-established principles of a court of equity, so far as John Ross and his party were concerned: "Those who ask equi y must first do equ ty." "The court will consider that done which ought to have been done." That Ross and his de egates, having expressly given their assent by previous submission and award, were bound in conscience to abide by and execute the treaty. A chancellor, upon these facts, adduced and attested in a court of equity, would have directed and decreed a specific performance of the original agreement, and compelled Ross to execute the contract according to the Senate's award.

The advocates and apologists of John Ross charge fraud in the execution of this treaty. Speculation, declamation, and denunciation, have each exhausted their vocabulary of hard words and harsh names, to stamp and brand this whole transaction with iniquity and infamy; but hard words are not strong argument. Now, gentlemen, where is the bad faith? Where is the foul fraud? There is none on the part of the United States. Can John Ross, the complainant, who seems to excite and enlist the tender sympathies of so many honorable members of Congress, say as much, and say it truly? No, sir; no. His word is not equal to his bond: his written promise is not equivalent to a treaty; and yet he imputes fraud to others: to the President and Senate of the United States. For doing what? For acceding to his own proposition. He is estopped by his own act to make his allegation. He is condemned out of his own mouth, and that condemnation is written and recorded by his hand and pen. He is like an eagle, shot by an arrow feathered from his own wing. This wily chieftain must not be permitted to play the game of fast and loose at his pleasure. Heads, he wins; tails, we lose. Twenty millions, he's fast; five millions, and he aint there.

Mr. Chairman, this treaty is fair and valid, and was made according to the long-established usage of treating with Indian chiefs. The amount of money (five millions six hundred thousand dollars) paid for the lands, possessions, and removal, is a very high and heaping price; and I do believe it is more than the country is actually worth. It was liberally bestowed and awarded by the Senate, supposing at the time it would make abundant satisfaction for the land and all injuries committed. This treaty not only rests upon a large and very liberal pecuniary consideration, but is founded on a most humane and benevolent policy and philanthropy. The history and experience of every State in this Union abundantly prove that the white man and the red man cannot dwell together in peace, tranquillity, and equality. The Cherokee Indians are now surrounded by a dense white population. Their hunting ground is abandoned. Their game is gone. They cannot convert the tomahawk into the ploughshare, nor the scalping-knife into the pruning-hook. Their home is in the wilderness; their delight is in the chase. Civilization and refinement paralyzes and destroys all their faculties and energies. Some wild animals never can be rendered tame. You cannot change the order of nature. You might as well expect the red man to change the color of his skin as his habits and pursuits. The Indian on the white frontier is a degraded, desponding, and forlorn creature. He learns the vices, not the virtues, of civilized society. He is cheated by speculators, swindlers, and Shylocks. He is often left only with his blanket, his bow, and his arrow. The buffalo, the bear, the deer, and other noble game, which constitute the chief food of nature's noblemen in their aboriginal condition, have all fled from the sound of the woodman's axe, toward the Rocky Mountains. Why, then, not advise and assist the children of the wilderness to remove to a new wild country, suited to their wants and conditions of life? And there let them remain, in the full enjoyment and contentment of their own hunting grounds and game, unmolested by the curiosity of Yankees, and undisturbed by the cupidity of speculators. Yes, sir, I would build up on the Western frontier a Chinese wall, by Congressional enactments, between the white and red man, that the Indians might forever live there in security and peace.

The policy of the United States in removing and locating all the Indians west of the Mississippi river is a wise and humane, and life-preserving policy. It had its origin with the lofty statesmen and enlightened philanthropists of by-gone days, and was intended to save and rescue the Indian tribes from extermination and annihilation. In the thick forests and flowery prairies of the Western wilds their hearts will leap for joy in the manly exercises of the hunter's life. There they will roam over nature's gardens and pure streams, contented and happy in the pursuits of their own chosen pleasures, unannoyed by the frauds of the frontier, and uncorrupted by the vices of the pioneer. It has been said in this debate, by way of censuring the Government for its policy: If the Indians are removed and congregated on the Western frontier, they will unite and wage war upon the United States, and devastate and depopulate the States of Arkansas and Missouri. Is this view of the case founded in fancy or in fact? Is it not a fancy sketch, which exists only in a diseased state of the imagination? How can fifteen or sixteen different tribes, scattered in the wilderness from Texas to Canada, and speaking different languages, having different habits, customs, and interests, unite and co-operate in one common war against the white people? It is certainly not within the range of probabilities; and it requires some effort and stretch of imagination to bring it in the neighborhood of possibilities. We might as well expect all the nations of Europe to unite and declare war upon us. The Indians will have wars with each other; and they may, and occasionally will, have wars with us; but, in the nature of nations and individuals, there can be no concerted and united action of the various tribes to make hostile movements upon the white people.

Mr. Chairman, the message of the President of the United States, and the accompanying communication of his Secretary at War, just received by this House, and proposing in effect to give the Cherokee Indians two years longer for removal, meets my reprobation and decided condemnation. It is indiscreet, unwise, and ill-timed; it is a giving way in the very hour and trial of danger. What, sir, after the President and his Secretary have ordered and sent General Scott and six or seven thousand troops into the Cherokee country, to preserve the peace and remove the Indians; after the militia are all gone, and most enormous expenses incurred, and every thing ready for removal; then (on the very day before this treaty is to be executed) comes this unfortunate and most unwelcome message, proposing and pledging himself to use and exert his influence to give two years longer for removal. If we have any Cherokee war, it will be justly attributable to this ill-timed and timid message of the President, and to the indiscreet speeches of members on this floor, in their blind devotion to John Ross and his party, while they are forgetful of the rights and true interests of the great body of the Cherokee Indians.

Mr. Chairman, the plain and patriotic people whom I have the honor to represent, entertain no fears from the Cherokees; but they do dread and deprecate the necessity of killing the Indians. They hope most sincerely that the wise counsels of humane legislators, under the dispensation of a merciful Providence, will avert this melancholy catastrophe and painful duty. But, sir, if the Indians once shed the white man's blood, and commence hostilities, then the die is cast, and the scene is changed; then the eagle-eyed and lion-hearted men of the mountains in North Carolina will snatch their rifles from the rack over the mansion door, and go forth in defence of their homes and hearths, their wives and children, and exterminate the revengeful savage Indian, and leave not one behind to tell the tale of wo. Sir, this is a critical juncture among the Cherokees; the flash of one rifle may set that whole frontier in a blaze. This momentous crisis and unfortunate situation of the great mass of the Cherokee people, who have been deluded and deserted by some of their chiefs in this their day of affliction and distress, entitles them to the kind feelings and practical philanthropy of every one whose generous heart throbs for peace on earth and good will toward all mankind. Those who oppose this treaty, and induce the Indians to believe they can remain where they are, know not the mischief and murder they may cause to be committed. The opposition to this measure, though dictated by good intentions, is predicated upon irrelevant evidence and mistaken views of fact; upon a total absence and want of a familiar and practical acquaintance with Indians customs and character. Those who feed upon the day-dreams of fancy, and delight to spin cobweb theories into the most attenuated abstractions, may make a show of charity, sympathy, and humanity, but they never will administer to the real comfort and true happiness of the human race.

Sir, I truly and anxiously desire that the officers and agents, whom the Government have selected and intrusted to perform this delicate and difficult task of removing the Cherokee Indians, may do their duty in mildness and mercy, and prevent the land recently acquired by treaty from being crimsoned with crime and drenched with blood.

SPEECH OF MR. DUNCAN, OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, July 7, 1838—On the bill making appropriations for harbors, and in reply to the speech of Mr. BOND of Ohio.

Mr. DUNCAN addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am happy to have this opportunity to make some remarks in relation to the financial policy adopted, and so far pursued, by this and the late Administration. The bill now under consideration has been amended in the Senate, by striking out the appropriation of twenty thousand dollars for the improvement of the Cumberland river within the limits of Kentucky and Tennessee.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] says that this amendment was made in a certain quarter (meaning the Senate) for a certain purpose, (I suppose to punish the people of Kentucky for not being more Democratic,) and to affect a certain individual, [Mr. CLAY.] This may all be, if we are prepared to suppose that grave Senators could so far forget their high stations as to make such paltry considerations an object of action in the discharge of their high functions and sacred duties. But I think we may find another reason for this judicious and laudable amendment—a reason that has its foundation in patriotism and economy. The howl of extravagant profligacy and bankruptcy has never been out of our ears since the commencement of the session until this time, and it will continue with the session. Yes, sir, that howl has cost the people more money than would redeem the Treasury notes now in circulation, which constitutes our present national debt. I say it was a regard for economy, and a desire to confine the appropriations within the probable estimates for the year, that indueed the Senate to make the amendment in question.

Sir, what base and sickening inconsistency do we witness here every day: a charge constantly kept up that the Government is bankrupt, and the best prospects of the country ruined, by a profligate Administration; when it is a well known fact, and the journals show it, that every measure of extravagance and profligacy is brought forward, sustained, and carried through to a law, by those who are opposed to the Administration, and who are constantly denouncing it for its profligacy.

It seems, from the profligate and reckless course of the Opposition in worthless and extravagant expenditures, that bankruptcy of the Government is one of the means by which this Administration is to be brought into disrepute with the people, and finally overthrown. Whenever there is an attempt made at reform, it is denounced as demagogueical. Whenever there is an attempt made at economy and prudence in public expenditures, the whole pack of Oppositionists who may have the most remote local interest, raise the howl that this attempt at economy is made for party purposes—to affect a certain State—to affect certain individuals—and to effect certain purposes. Yes, sir, although economy dwells on the lips of a certain party, extravagance has its home in their hearts. For the truth of this assertion, I refer you to the examination of the journals of the last six or eight years; where on all appropriations made that savor of extravagance, there will be found a large majority of the names of those opposed to this and the last Administration in favor of such measures, and the names of a large majority of the members friendly to those Administrations will be found to be recorded against them.

Sir, I hold up the journals which contain the evidences of what I say. I only ask investigation. Among the vast number of unwarrantable appropriations, which I have not time to notice specially, I ask your attention to one, only distinguished from the rest by the size of the sum. It is the appropriation made in the session of 1835 and 1836, for liquidating the debt due from the District of Columbia to Holland, and for carrying out certain improvements for which that loan was made. This entire appropriation amounted, I think, to one and a half millions. But let us inquire for what purposes this money was applied. It was applied first to the construction of a canal through the suburbs of your city, (Washington,) which needs a canal about as much as a cart wants a third wheel. The south side of the south wing of this capitol faces the whole line of that canal. It is in view of every one who looks out of one of the south windows. I have been looking out for seven months, and I have yet to see the first boat disturb the stillness of its water. One is at a loss to know which to be most astonished at, the wickedness that conceived such unpardonable folly, or the sterility of the soil through which the canal is excavated, or the poverty and sterility of the country for whose benefit it is made. This canal is of Whig origin. The next extravagant and worthless appropriation of this money is for the construction of a turnpike road, made on the bank of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. This road was made at great expense, and runs the extent of the District. The next is the turnpike road running parallel with the former. I am unable to draw the distinction between the folly involved in the construction of each of those roads. The existence of the one completely supersedes the necessity of the other, and both of but little use. The hill road seems to have been made to display the power of the Federal Government to prostrate hills and fill up hollows. I occasionally ride out in the evening for exercise. My rides have, some six or seven times, been on these roads. I generally go out the bottom road and return the hill read. I have once seen a shackling wagon, drawn by two mules and a jack, (Demerara team,) so poor that one might hang his hat on their hip bones. This establishment was driven by a negro half naked, lame in one leg and blind of one eye. This, sir, is a specimen of the use made of what is called the bottom turnpike road; but I have never seen the first living creature on the hill road except the horse I rode. So much for for the roads—useless roads—I mean those that have come under my observation, which have been made by the people's money, and, I undertake to say, in gross violation of their rights, if not in violation of the Constitution.

But, sir, the most profligate and extravagant appropriation is yet to be presented. It is the appropriation for the Georgetown and Alexandria Canal and Aqueduct. This canal is now under way. Is located on the bank of the Potomac—a canal, deep, still, and wide, (being tide water.) Why, sir, what will your people say when they learn that half a million of their money has been appropriated for the construction of a canal on the bank of the Potomac—a canal constructed by the Almighty, as far superior to your pitiful effort as the majestic steamboat that rides upon its bosom is superior to the contemptible packet that floats upon your canal? But, sir, for whose benefit has this vast appropriation been made? For the benefit of the city of Alexandria. It is almost incredible with those who have seen Alexandria within the last three or four years, that such an appropriation should be made for her—a city that seems to have the anger of God and the hand of ruin upon it—now desolation itself, and without the most remote prospect of ever surviving. The almost total abstraction of trade from her port, the barrenness and poverty of the soil that surrounds her, must ever prevent her from being revived. Nothing can save her from final prostration and ruin. In half a century from this time, there will hardly be a standing monument of art for the tooth of time to operate upon; and yet it was for the benefit of these tottering remains of a city that this vast and expensive work has been undertaken, and to finish it must take much of the sacred proceeds of toil and sweat of those who will never see or witness the practical result of such consummate folly and wicked extravagance. Sir, you may draw upon the industry of the people for, and recover, a sufficient amount to complete this work; but there never will be commercial motion enough on it to prevent the stagnation of its water. The noble canal which the Almighty has made, (the Potomac,) and of which yours is but a contemptible imitation, will for ever bear the produce destined for other places, (no toll being to be paid on it, but, like other Divine gifts, free.) Your canal will be the generator and birth-place of reptiles, and the abode of frogs. It will be a putrid, green pool of pestilence; and its exhalations will spread disease and death over your country. These, sir, are specimens of the appropriations that have emptied your Treasury, and been part of the means that have made it necessary for you to use your credit in the form of Treasury notes, to keep the wheels of Government in motion; and I repeat it, that these profligate appropriations are made at the instance, and carried into ruinous practice by the votes of the very party who are constantly denouncing this and the late Administration for their extravagance and profligacy.

Sir, my object in discussing this question is not only for the purpose of sustaining the amendment in question, and to sustain the principles and policy that induced it, but also to answer and refute many of the propositions and assertions contained in a small pamphlet, which I hold in my hand, purporting to be a speech delivered by my colleague, [Mr. BOND, from Ohio,] on a resolution offered some time since by the gentleman from Virginia, on the subject of the public printing.

In order to give his remarks upon that resolution some force with the Democratic party, my colleague says that the gentleman who offered it acts generally with the Administration party. I deny that assertion. I deny that the gentleman from Virginia, [Colonel HOPKINS,] has acted generally with the Administration party; and I say so without any disrespect to the gentleman, for he has a right to act with whatever party he pleases, and no one has a right to question his motives. But fair play is a jewel; and my colleague must represent things as they are, not as he would desire to have them, for political effect. Sir, this is a little pamphlet, but it contains more Federal poison in a small way, than any thing I ever saw of the kind. It is a little pamphlet, and its whole contents remind me of minnow-catching. I live near a river called the Little Miami; and into it there empties a creek called Sycamore. I fish in the river, and my boy catches minnows in the creek for bait. It is this last operation that the contents of this little pamphlet remind me of. It is a system of a small kind of fault-finding; and yet I am told that there is not a foul stream of Federalism in the Union, on which it does not float. Every corrupt, bought-up Federal press in these United States, I am told, has given it an insertion in its columns; and the mails have groaned under the weight of its multiplied numbers, by the franking privilege, ever since it made its appearance.

Sir, seeing, on one occasion, a great number of Federal members engaged busily in franking documents, my curiosity induced me to walk round among them to inquire what documents they were franking for distribution. I asked one: Mr. BOND's speech; another: Mr. BOND's speech; another: Mr. BOND's speech; another: Mr. BOND's speech; and so on. This led me to a perusal of my colleague's speech, and the vast circulation which was given to it, for political effect, induced me to collect some statistics by which I might neutralize any poisonous effects his speech might have on the political atmosphere. Those statistics I have procured, and have them in my hand, and will ask that they may constitute a part of my speech, which I design to write out more fully than time will now permit to deliver.

But to the speech. My colleague complains that, within the last nine years, there has been an increase of public officers and of public expenditures, which he charges as a fault of the party in power. It is their fault, too, I suppose, that within the same time, two new States have been added to our Union, and several millions of people to our population. If public officers have been increased, so has public business, and in a much greater ratio. As a matter of course, an increase of expenditures must follow. If this be an evil, it can only be cured by stopping the extension of our settlements, and the increase of our population. There is a large increase of clerks in the New York custom-house; but the business there has been more than doubled. There has been a large increase of clerks in the Land Office; but the business of that office has increased ten fold. It was physically impossible that the President could sign the increased number of land patents, and yet it is made an offence to create another officer for that purpose. There has been some increase of clerks in the War Department; but the business in that Department has been more than doubled. The number of postmasters has been doubled, and so has the number of post offices, for the convenience of the people.

Would our new-light Bank Federal reformers have six or seven thousand post offices discontinued, to avoid an increase of Executive officers? Do the people want any such reform? Would they shut up the land offices, because to keep them open requires an increase of officers? Would they deny patents to purchasers of land, because it takes a few additional clerks to make them out? Shall the business of all the Departments remain undone, because it requires more clerks to do it as it increases with the growth of our counrry? These would be reforms worthy of Federal Bank reformers! Let the business of the people's Government remain undone, and the banks will govern for the people.

There are few offices, if any, in the country, in which the public business has not increased faster than the clerks and the expenditure. As our country increases, the public officers and public expenditures must and will increase. It is unavoidable, as every man knows. It is as stupid as wicked to complain of the party in power on account of this increase, for no party can prevent it and do its duty to the country. The only inquiry should be, whether there are too many clerks to do the public business; whether any of them spend in idleness the time for which the people pay. If so, they should be lopped off. But no such thing is alleged. It is not asserted that the clerks who have been added have not enough to do, or that the public business could possibly be done without them.

These new-light Federal-Bank-Reformers propose no measures to retrench, because they know that no retrenchment can be made, but seek only to fill the country with false impressions, for the sake of producing political results favorable to the Federal-Bank cause. This game of base and foul lying, to get into power, is as old as Absalom, the son of David, and older too. My colleague undertakes to arraign certain members of the Administration for having, in some instances, received payment for extra services. But does he pretend that any one of them has received such compensation in violation of law? not at all. He knows that the principles upon which those allowances were made have been repeatedly adjudicated upon and sanctioned by the Supreme Court, the highest judicial tribunal in the country. The allowances, therefore, were all lawful. Is the principle wrong? If gentlemen think so, why do they not bring forth a proposition making all such allowances unlawful? If they were really in favor of a reform, or change in this respect, should we not see them proving it by acts, rather than by words? They have a majority in this House, and have had during this seven months' session, and yet they have made no attempt at reform of any kind.

Perhaps my colleague may have thought the prospect discouraging; but he ought not to have stopped on that account, he ought rather to have followed the example of the gallant Colonel Miller, who, when he was ordered on a perilous service on the Niagara frontier during the war of 1812, did not say it was impracticable, but said "I'll try, sir," to the commanding general. He did try, and he succeeded. The achievment not only rendered essential service at that crisis, but honored his country's arms, and elevated his own fame. I hope my colleague will not be dismayed, because the undertaking of reform of the abuses of which he complains is perilous. If he wilt try he may succeed, and if he does he will render essential service to his country, and crown himself with lawrels as unfading as those of Colonel Miller. But, sir, the fact that they content themselves with mere clamor, without attempting to do any thing to bring about reform, is conclusive that they do not believe there is any thing wrong in the principle, and have only one object in view, that is to put others out office that they may get in. How they used their power over the public money while in office, and how they may be expected to use it again, I will attempt to show before I am done.

But my colleague brings a general charge against the party in power, who, by their representatives in part (Colonel BENTON, Mr. CAMBRELENG, and others) had promised something like reform (should they get into power) in abuses which they said existed, and which they set out in a report on that subject, and which my colleague has presented in a garbled manner to the public attention, through his speech. Does my colleague not know that many of the abuses in that report complained of, grew out of the manner in which the powers that then existed got into office, and the corrupt manner by which they held the administration of the Government? The Government fountain being corrupt, all the streams that flowed from it conveyed abuse and violation wherever they reached; and that by a reformation of the Administration, most of the abuses that flowed from it were dried up; which, in a great degree, superseded the necessity of further reform. Some abuses still remained; they were reformed in part, as I will show you before I am done. Some remain unreformed, and always will, as they do in all Governments, and are of a nature like the cholera, incurable. Yes, sir, the people have made that general reformation, by pulling down an Administration that had its origin in a corrupt bargain, and existed in violation of the spirit of the Constitution, and the sacred right of the elective franchise.

Here, sir, permit me to name some of the objections my colleague presents to the public against this Administration. Some of the practices which he denounces as corrupt, and still existing, notwithstanding the reform the people were promised; and permit me to compare these practices, that he is pleased to denounce as corrupt, with those of a imilar character, but a thousand times more aggravating, as practiced by the administration of Messrs. Clay and Adams, which is urged upon us as worthy of example, and entitled to the confidence of the American people, and soon to be revived.

My colleague complains that the aggregate expenses of the Government far exceeds the expenses of the administration of the dynasty which he wishes revived.

That there is an additional number of clerks in all the Departments, and consequently an unnecessary expense incurred to the Government. Such is the character of his charges against each of the departments of the Government.

And now, sir, I proceed to answer the gentleman on some of these charges, and, I trust, I shall be not only able to prove many of these destitute of foundation in truth, but that the gentleman has withheld many important truths in relation to reforms and abuses, which it is due to this Administration that the people should know.

Sir, there is very little difference in the moral offence of withholding the truth, where it may be due to reputation and character that it should be told, and telling that which is wilfully false. The gentleman constantly (indirectly) holds up to view the coalition administration (Adams and Clay) as a mirror, in which is to be seen a pure Administration. I think, sir, we will find some corruptions charged to this and the last Administrations, which will be found to have been practiced with impunity in that. One of the great violations of economy and extravagant expenditures of the administration of General Jackson was sending Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Randolph severally, as Ministers to Russia, with a salary of $9000 per annum, and an outfit of $9000; that each of them staid but a year and a day, and then returned. Now, sir, let us see if we can offset this "useless" expenditure of General Jackson's administration by one of a similar character in the administration of Messrs. Adams and Clay. During the immaculate dynasty which my colleague desires to have renewed, no less than three ministers were sent to England, viz: King, Barbour, and Gallatin, with an annual salary of $9000, and an outfit of $9000. This made 27,000 in outfit, besides the annual salary, which amounted to the same. Also, the son of Rufus King, who was left Secretary of Legation, was left by his father as Charge d'Affairs, who received an outfit of $4,500, although (being there) he had not to fit out at all.

Then the account for money expended for keeping up our legation in England during that short reign of corruption and bargain, which only lasted four years, was—

Outfit for R. King - - -	$9,000
" for A. Gallatin - - -	9,000
" for J. Barbour - - -	9,000
" for Mr. King's son; who never was fitted out - - -	4,500
Salary for do - - -	4,500
" " Ministers - - -	27,000
	$63,000

Yes, sir, $63,000 was spent during that Administration, to procure the discharge of the diplomatic duties of one single individual. I think this will offset the Russia diplomatic story. My colleague had better have kept that story in the dark, as his reform is a kind of one-sided reform. My colleague says that the State Department sent Mr. Early to Bogota with despatches, and that he never delivered them, but received his pay. Well, sir, this was a hard case, and, taken in the abstract, smacks of fraud and improvidence. But what is the whole story? Mr. Early was sent to Bogota with despatches: when on the way, and within two days of St. Thomas, the vessel in which he had taken passage caught fire. There was a cargo of powder on board. The crew and passengers, amounting to nineteen in all, were instantly, to save their lives, compelled to take to the boats, two in number. They had left the vessel but half an hour when she blew up; and with her went the despatches. After the lapse of seventy-four hours without water or food, the famished crew reached the island of Hayti, from whence they got home as well as they could. I believe Mr. Early was paid the same as though he had delivered the despatches. Perhaps this was wrong; but I can tell you something worse under the coalition administration.

Mr. Clay (Secretary of State) sent Mr. Pleasants to Buenos Ayres with despatches. It is said that he found the crew rather unpleasant, (he being a pleasant man,) being principally mechanics and work-ies, and not the white fingered gentry. He put the despatches in the possession of the captain, and he wheeled about and put for England, where he amused himself in high life a time, and returned; for which Mr. Clay paid him nineteen hundred and forty dollars. So I think this will offset the charge of paying Mr. Early.

So far, I think my colleague has been unfortunate in his charges, inasmuch as they have the effect to call to recollection charges against the dynasty he wishes to reinstate, much more aggravating and pernicious. This, so far, seems to me to be a blunder on his part; but the worst have to come yet. I think his speech will be unfortunate for his party and his purposes. Another most important blunder has been committed by my colleague in his "few comments on the professions and practice of Mr. Amos Kendall, late Fourth Auditor, now Postmaster General." He quotes from certain letters of that gentleman, published soon after he came into office, showing some of the abuses he found in office, committed by my colleague's political friends, and showing, also, that he had or would reform them, and affects to show that he had not done so. One of these extracts is as follows, viz: "The interest of the country demands that this office shall be filled with men of business, and not with babbling politicians." Can any man say with truth that this principle was not carried out? I assert, sir, and challenge contradiction, that the Fourth Auditor's Office, while Mr. Kendall was in it, was "filled with men of business," and not "with babbling politicians." Mr. Kendall himself was "a man of business," and neither he nor his clerks ever neglected their public duties to babble politics with any one. When he went into that office, what did he find to be its condition under the dynasty which my colleague is laboring to restore? Was it all purity, all honesty, all industry? No, sir: it was all rottenness, all idleness. His predecessor was one of the favorites of the Clay party; and Mr. Kendall soon discovered that he had been guilty of the grossest and most direct frauds on the Treasury, of which he was found guilty by an unwilling court, and more unwilling jury, after a tremendous party struggle to secure him from punishment. What thanks did Mr. Kendall get from my colleague and his party for exposing these frauds, and bringing them to merited punishment? Why, sir, he was abused through the party presses as a conspirator and persecutor, and while the prosecution of the culprit was in progress, was night after night insulted and hooted at under his window. Yes, sir, this was the mode the gentleman's party undertook to prevent the exposure and punishment of their corruptions. This was the reward they, then, bestowed on integrity and fearlessness in office; and the same game has been kept up since, down to the speech of my colleague. Now, I ask, was it no reform to remove a peculator upon the Treasury? My colleague does not seem to think so. Why? Is it because he belonged to his party?

Well, Mr. Kendall filled the Fourth Auditor's Office "with men of business," and what was the consequence? Much of its business was one, two, and three years in arrears, and in about a twelve month, it was brought completely up. Did he obtain or ask any additional force? No, sir. After the business was brought up, he suffered two clerkships to remain vacant for a long time, and one until he left the office, because, having "men of business" about him, he did not need the whole force which the law allowed. Moreover, under the Clay administration, which my colleague would restore, the contingent appropropriation for the Fourth Auditor's Office was $1,500 a year; but Mr. Kendall reduced it to $1,000, and one year asked for no appropriation at all, having enough surplus of former appropriations on hand to meet his wants. Thus the expenditures of the office were largely reduced by him, while its business was greatly improved. What credit do my colleague and his friends give him for it? They have poured on him, from beginning to end, a torrent of unceasing abuse. On every new exposure of a defaulter or a rogue, through his instrumentality, their abuse has been redoubled, clearly showing that an honest and fearless public officer is their highest antipathy.

While complaining that the party in power have not made the promised reforms, my colleague gives incontestible evidence of his sincerity by sneering at those which were made. He even finds grounds of attack upon Mr. Kendall for sending to the post office, to be charged with postage, the letters and pamphlets fraudulently enclosed to the Fourth Auditor to evade the post office laws, and for discontinuing sundry newspapers, because he could derive no assistance from them "in settling the accounts of the United States Navy." Yes, sir, in the reforms actually made by Mr. Kendall, as well as in those not made, the bank attorneys, immaculate and consistent men! find ground of attack!!

When Mr. Kendall went into the Fourth Auditor's office, the legal postage on private letters received under cover to the Fourth Auditor, was about a dollar a day, or at the rate of $365 a year, and on the supposition that as great a number had gone out under his predecessor's frank, the fraud on the post office revenue, through that single office, under the CLAY-ADAMS administration, was over $700 a year! Mr. Kendall put an entire stop to this abuse, and what thanks does he get from the Bank stipendiaries? They hate and abuse him the worse for it. But, says my colleague, he franked some prospectuses of the Globe. Well, if he chose to send them to his friends, had he not a lawful right to do so? Did he violate any law, or do so much of it as to constitute an abuse? That is not pretended, nor can it be with truth. But because he put a stop to violations of the law, and then exercised his privilege in conformity with law, the Bank attorneys find an inconsistency in it! I can tell my colleague, upon undoubted authority, that Mr. Kendall's course in that respect is not changed; that he uniformly sends to the post office letters for others enclosed to him, to be charged with postage, and sometimes pays it himself; that he covers no letters with his frank, not strictly his own; no, not even those of his wife and children. What praise does he get from the Bank attorneys for this scrupulous obedience to the law? The highest praise —their unceasing abuse.

My colleague finds a vast inconsistency in Mr. Kendall's discontinuing newspapers as Fourth Auditor, because they gave him no assistance "in settling the accounts of the United States Navy," and paying for a number of them as Postmaster General! Is this effort to show inconsistency a whit short of contemptible? The papers were not of use to him in performing his public duty as Fourth Auditor, and therefore he did not take them; they are of use to him in performing his duty as Postmaster General, and therefore he does not discontinue them. Is there any inconsistency in this? None but a Bank attorney can make it out. While Mr. Kendall was Fourth Auditor, he paid all his newspaper subscriptions out of his own pocket, because they were exclusively for his private use; but, as Postmaster General, it is essential that he should have not only the general but the local intelligence from every quarter of the country, and the only wonder is that he pays so little for it.

It is natural, sir, for the Bank attorneys to find fault with the part acted by Mr. Kendall in the removal of the deposites. Their client was destroyed by that measure, and the source of many a good fee dried up. But here, again, Mr. Kendall is followed by misrepresentation. "He got ten dollars a day," it is said, "for doing this injury to the public"—meaning the Bank. Now, sir, I pronounce this statement entirely without foundation. Mr. Kendall, under an appointment from the Secretary of the Treasury, visited the cities of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Boston, to negotiate with the banks, and spent some days in each city. He had necessarily to see much company at the hotels where he stopped, and those who have had occasion to take private parlors, and have private tables, at the public houses in those cities, where they necessarily see, and treat civilly, many gentlemen calling on them, know that the actual expense, including travelling, can scarcely average less than ten dollars a day. Mr. Kendall paid all these expenses out of his own pocket, and received from the Treasury barely enough to make himself whole. This is the whole of this mighty affair, and the sum received, all told, was $316 11. How rich this man must have made himself!

My colleague follows Mr. Kendall into the Post Office Department, and makes another mistake at the first jump. "The printed list of clerks in his Department," says he, "exhibits his father-in-law and two nephews, with salaries of $1,000, $1,200, and $1,400," &c. Mr. Kendall has not, and never had, two nephews among the clerks of his Department. But what if he had two nephews in his Department? Have they not as good a right to be there as any body else, if they are honest and competent to the duties assigned them? If there be places of peculiar trust, is it wrong that the head of a Department should fill them with men whose integrity he best knows, although they may be his nephews or his brother? When abuses and frauds, instead of the most honest and honorable discharge of their public duties, are perpetrated by his relations, it will be time enough to censure their appointment.

Nothing will satisfy these Bank attorneys. Major Barry is abused for not keeping every thing right in the Post Office Department, and Mr. Kendall is abused for putting every thing right. The committees of Congress, majority and minority, complained of Major Barry for making extravagant allowances to Stockton and Stokes, and now Mr. Kendall is abused for not being willing to pay them allowances a thousand times more extravagant. One of my worthy colleagues [Mr. WHITTLESEY] I believe wrote some twenty-five pages in a book, 30,000 copies of which were printed by order of the House, to prove that Major Barry had allowed those contractors some $100,000 more than they were entitled to by law, and yet voted for an act under color of which they have been allowed $161,000 more under the same pretences, and has stood quietly by and seen Mr. Kendall compelled to pay it by judicial usurpation, if not something worse. I should like to ask my honorable colleague [Mr. WHITTLESEY] a question or two. Did he not thoroughly understand this case, having investigated and written a long report about it? When the bill for the relief of Stockton and Stokes was before the House, did he not offer a long string of provisos, which were adopted? Were not these provisos so carefully framed as not to touch one of the claims in controversy, and be, in fact, perfectly nugatory? If so, what was the object? If he did not think Stockton and Stokes entitled to as much as they got from Major Barry by $100,000, why did he vote for a bill to give them more? And when he found that an enormous sum more was awarded them, why did he not propose to repeal the act, instead of standing by and seeing Mr. Kendall compelled to pay it?

This case will illustrate the sincerity and honesty of the Bank attorneys. For political effect, they abused Major Barry for making allowances, then voted for a bill authorizing allowances much more extravagant; and because Mr. Kendall refused to pay still further allowances, which he did not believe authorized even by that act, they abuse him for withholding from Stockton and Stokes their just dues! All this shows that they care not a fig what use is made of the public money, and that their only object in finding fault is, to impair the confidence of the people in the Administration. They see $161,000 wasted on Stockton and Stokes with indifference, if not with joy, and complain that $316 was allowed Mr. Kendall, to pay his expenses when upon public service.

Sir, I have taken some pains to ascertain on what principles the Post Office Department is administered by this much-abused man. I understand that he went into it with a declaration that he should try the experiment of administering it in strict conformity to moral principles, and the laws of the land; and, if convinced of its impracticability, would hold it no longer. It was the fashion for officers and clerks in the Department to receive presents from contractors; and, when travelling, to ride free in their coaches. Believing that, to say the least of it, these practices tended to corruption, he forbade the reception of all or any such favors from contractors under penalty of dismission, and prescribed the same rules for himself. All presents from contractors he has declined; and on every occasion has refused to travel free in their stages, steamboats, and cars. Free tickets have been sent him from some of the great lines, which he has uniformly returned.

As before remarked, this man does not cover with his frank even the letters of his wife and children, but pays the postage out of his own pocket; nor does he take stationery from the Department for his own use, much less for that of his family, believing that the public stationery is not his property, and that he has no right to use it but for public purposes. Of this, I have the most conclusive testimony, not coming from himself. When I was informed of this fact, although I was bound to believe it myself, I did not know that others would believe that Mr. Kendall's honesty was so scrupulous. I therefore addressed the following note to his stationer, of which this is a copy, and received the annexed answer:

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C. July 1, 1838.

DEAR SIR: Will you be so good as to inform me where the Hon. A. Kendall, Postmaster General, procures stationery for the Post Office Department? If from you, will you have the kindness to inform me from whom he procures his private stationery, such as he uses for his private purposes, and for the use of his family? If from you, will you next inform me whether both are paid out of the public contingent fund, or is the latter paid for out of his private means? These inquiries are not made from any sinister motives, nor are their answers intended for any unfavorable prejudice to Mr. Kendall or any other person.

Your early attention to this request will much oblige your friend. A. DUNCAN.

JOHN T. SULLIVAN, esq.

WASHINGTON CITY, July 1, 1838.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your note of this morning, I would remark, that I "supply stationery for the Post Office Department," which is charged to that Department, and paid for "out of the public contingent fund." Those articles are procured by the messenger, and are entered in a pass-book kept by him.

I have also furnished paper and other articles of stationery for Mr. Kendall's private use. These have been ordered by his servant, or by members of his family; sent to his private residence, and charged, in every instance, to his individual account.

I remain, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
JOHN T. SULLIVAN.

Hon. A. DUNCAN.

I know that most men think Mr. Kendall overscrupulous, and too precise on these points; but to all such suggestions he replies, that it is impossible for a man to err on that side, and that he will go out of office as conscious of rectitude as he came in.

And has this man done nothing for the public that he should thus be pursued with never-ending abuse? Has he not been efficient and faithful in every public trust? Could the duties of Fourth Auditor be better discharged than they were by him? Did he not bring the Post Office Department out of deep embarrassment as by magic? Has he not almost doubled its business and usefulness? Has he not, with great skill, sustained its credit under circumstances which shook that of all the banks in the country, and of most business men? In fine, could that Department be managed with more efficiency or better success?

Sir, it is for his virtues, his talents, and his success, that the bank stipendiaries hate him. They know he will not corrupt, and cannot be corrupted. He was efficient in putting down the Bank of the United States; and he desires to see the Government independent of institutions which, experience proves, have not discretion enough to manage their own affairs, and, of course, not enough to be trusted with the use or custody of the public money. These are his real offences. It is feared that his integrity, his efficiency, and his success will give weight to his opinions and his judgment; and every pretext is seized on to assail him. He has sent a few prospectuses of a newspaper to a few friends; he has expressed his opinions in certain letters and toasts; he takes a few newspapers to see what complaints there are of the mails, and what suggestions of improvement; and he received three hundred and sixteen dollars for his expenses in negotiating with the State banks! Are these his only crimes? No, sir. It is made an offence in him to have said that he could sustain the credit of his department without the help of Congress! The Treasury Department is abused because it wanted help, and the Post Office Department because it did not; as if to put it out of the power of Mr. Kendall to to sustain the credit of his department, we have been throwing extra allowances upon him, and endeavoring to force upon him in the present depressed condition of the revenue, near 500 new mail routes to be put in operation. And I have seen men exult here, under the impression that they would thus embarrass him, that they had "got him up a tree at last." It has even been said that he was already embarrassed; but this is so far from the truth, that the most credulous do not believe it. Their "wish is father to the thought." The Committee on the Post Office Expenditures, contains a majority of Opposition men. If they find the Department embarrassed, why do they not show the fact? Do you think, sir, the matter would not be examined into, and reported if there was the slightest faith in the assertion? If it were so, we should soon know it, and the exultation of certain patriotic gentlemen on this floor, would know no bounds. But, sir, scrutiny is invited, and malignant aspersion defied. Instead of having treed their game, gentlemen will find themselves still "barking up the wrong tree."

I cannot help giving some very conclusive evidences of the sincerity of the bank attorneys, in their attack upon the Administration in money matters.

Mr. Kendall is abused for having received $316 to refund his expenses, after performing a journey on public business. Now let us see what the bank men did while in power.

Mr. Southard was Secretary of the Navy in 1826, 7, 8. He is now, I understand, one of the pillars of the party; a man whom they specially delight to honor. He had a chief clerk, named Hay; he was positively forbidden by law to advance the public money to any body but disbursing officers of the navy, and persons employed in the naval service, on distant stations; yet, though thus positively forbidden, Mr. Southard advanced to his chief clerk $800 of the public money, in November 1826, and sent him to New Orleans to look after the accounts of a former navy agent. He did nothing there whatsoever, but get $100 more from the navy agent; and without any bills rendered, Mr. Southard allowed him $800 for his expenses, when he was allowing only $200 to officers of the navy for the expenses of the same journey. Would you believe it, sir, after hearing my colleague's speech? This man was receiving his $2,000 salary as chief clerk during the whole period of his absence. In what case has any member of the present Administration so grossly and directly violated the law?

This Mr. Southard, as Secretary of the Navy, was also Commissioner of the Navy Pension Fund, which was vested in stocks. On the 1st of July 1828, these stocks were paid off to the amount of $281,384 72, and on the 1st of January, 1829, to the amount of $243,880 17 more. These were not reinvested until February 17th, 1829, by which means more than $9,000 of interest was lost. Who was using the money in the mean time, is what I do not know. Mr. Hay having written a letter or two on the subject, and perhaps conferred with the cashier of the branch bank in this city, made out an account, charging half per cent. commission for reinvesting these stocks, and $150,000 more which had been reinvested in 1825. Mr. Hay was still Mr. Southard's chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 per year; he was cut off by law from receiving any extra compensation; the service rendered was properly a part of his regular duty, and did not probably occupy him two hours; and yet Mr. Southard allowed him this monstrous charge of $3,376 32, and he pocketed the money. Thus was this charity fund for the support of the crippled officers and seamen, and their families plundered; yes; sir, plundered, by loss of interest through neglect, and cash actually paid Hay, in violation of law, of about THIRTEEN THOUSAND DOLLARS; and yet the men who want to restore the dynasty who did this, mouth at us about corruption and abuses which now exist only in their own corrupt hearts. Has any thing like this been done by the present Administration? No, sir, it has put an end to the allowances of commissions in all such cases.

Let us look a little further at the pure dynasty whom the reign of banks is to restore.

Upon Mr. Southard's recommendation Mr. Adams, in 1828, I believe, appointed one Andrew Armstrong, navy agent at Lima, in Peru. This is believed to be the only instance on record, in which a foreign navy agent was nominated to the Senate, that class of officers having been considered special agents, not expressly provided for in the law. Mr. Southard then advanced to Armstrong $10,000 out of the Treasury. What this was for, nobody out of the secret could divine; for exchange at Lima is always in favor of the United States, and it seemed ridiculous to send money to a country where money grows. But a reason has been discovered. No sooner was the money got, than $2,000 of it was lent to Mr. Southard's chief clerk for two years, without interest, and was never repaid by him! Whether this was the true reason for a departure from all usage in this proceeding, I know not. Whether Mr. Armstrong thus bought his appointment, I know not. All I know is the fact I have stated, and every one must draw his own inferences.

What an outery is kept up, Mr. Chairman, by the Bank advocates, upon the false allegation that the Administration is seeking, by the Independent Treasury plan, to get the public money into their possession for sinister purposes? Those who are struggling to get the public money for private uses, are clamoring to the skies against those who wish it kept by sworn and bonded officers, subject to heavy penalties, for public purposes only!! Let us see what was the practice of these men when in power.

When Mr. Southard was Secretary of the Navy, he converted the public cannon and cannon-shot into money to the amount of $25,000, and had the money placed to his own credit in the Branch Bank in this city! But, sir, I will give you particulars. General Mason, who has a foundry near Georgetown, was applied to by some of the South American authorities for a quantity of cannon; but he had none on hand, or not enough to meet the order. So, to enable him to make a good speculation, Mr. Southard lent him a quantity of the public cannon and shot, and, as security for the return of new guns in their place, required him to deposite $25,000, as already stated. It was, I believe, about eighteen months before General Mason completed the deliveries to replace these cannon, and in the mean time the money remained at Mr. Southard's credit, unless he used it, as it was in his power to do. If he did not use it, the bank did, by discounting on it as a deposite.

Now I should like to know what law there was for such a transaction? I should like to know what law authorized Mr. Southard to lend the public property, and receive money into his own pocket, (for that is the amount of it,) as security for its restoration? It is in palpable violation of all law and all propriety. But did the Bank advocates ever whisper a word of censure against this illegal conduct of one of their great champions? Not a lisp, sir. All is right, because a Bank man did it! The public property or money may be lent out and used by banks and their peculiar friends with perfect impunity; and to put a stop to it is a humbug and a crime! But have the gentlemen found a case like this, in which any member of the present Administration has put $25,000 of the public money or property into his pocket for a twelvemonth? No, sir, nothing like it. If they could, we should begin to hear, and justly, too, of impeachment by this House. Yes, sir, any public officer who will commit such an outrage, ought to be instantly impeached.

The corruptions and abuses of the Clay-bank administration were manifold and glaring.

The same Secretary of the Navy, aided the Fourth Auditor in fraudulently drawing thousands from the Treasury, and afterwards attempted to screen him from punishment by withholding important facts, when sworn before a grand jury and petit jury to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

He directed the Fourth Auditor to settle a claim of Messrs. Allen and Leonard of New York, which was originally about $3,500, as stated by themselves, but had been increased by additional charges, from time to time, until it was swollen to upwards of $10,000, and, under the direction so given, upwards of $11,000 were allowed, $1,000 of which were forthwith lent to the same Fourth Auditor, and never paid!

He violated the positive laws of the land in multitudes of cases, by causing moneys to be expended for one purpose, when they were appropriated for another.

He made to Congress estimates for the service of the Navy Department which were false, and, year after year, spent, for contingencies, nine to ninety thousand dollars more than was appropriated; taking it out of other appropriations, in violation of law, and concealing the fact from Congress.

He made use of a favorite clerk in the Fourth Auditor's office, at a salary of $1,400, as special agent to make certain payments, and by commissions and a double salary, in violation of law, increased his compensation to upwards of $2,000 a year for a series of years.

But the most obnoxious case remains to be noticed. The Navy Agent at Boston had made advances on account of the Government during the last war with Great Britain, upon which he claimed interest. That claim, amounting to $7,679 64, or thereabouts, was allowed by Smith Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, in 1819, and passed to the agent's credit. The agent went out of office in 1826, and early in 1828, he made out an account for certain alleged omissions in his former accounts, going back to 1812, upon which he charged interest. This claim was submitted to Mr. Southard, who wrote thus on the voucher with his own hand, viz:

"Let him be allowed interest upon the aggregate advance of $3,899 72, in conformity with the decision made by Mr. Secretary Thompson on the former accounts.
8th March, 1828. S. L. S."

Accordingly interest was calculated on the voucher up to the time of settlement in 1819. This shows that Mr. Southard knew the interest account had been settled.

Soon afterwards, the late Navy Agent trumped up a new interest account upon his war advances, obviously unfounded and false in every particular. This new claim was submitted to Mr. Southard, who wrote a letter to the Fourth Auditor, as follows, viz:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 21, 1828.

SIR: Having examined the claims of Amos Binney, late Navy Agent at Boston, as far as the pressure of business during a session of Congress will permit, I see no reason to doubt the justice of a claim on his part for losses on Treasury notes, &c. But I do not feel at liberty to authorize the allowance of any of the items, except for interest actually paid by him which you will be pleased to settle.

"For the other claims, he will be obliged to address himself to Congress, where, I do not doubt that his application will be successful.

"I am respectfully, &c.
SAMPL L. SOUTHARD."

"T. WATKINS, Esq. Fourth Auditor."

The Auditor took up the case, and passed an account allowing upwards of THIRTY-ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS for interest, when all parties concerned, Mr. Southard, the Auditor and the claimant, KNEW that every cent of just claim for interest had been settled and paid nine years before! Yes, sir, Mr. Southard knew it. I have given an entry of his on a voucher, dated 8th of the preceding March, not three months prior to his letter to the Auditor, conclusively proving that he knew it!!

But this is not all. This allowance gave Mr. Binney no ready money. It all went as a set-off against moneys due from him to the Government, leaving him still in debt over $9,000. He could not, therefore, readily pay his corrupt instrument in this and many other gross frauds on the Government. But Mr. Southard was kind enough to help him out. Money could not be legally advanced to him out of the Treasury, because he was not a disbursing officer, having been two years out of office; but law, or want of law, was no obstacle in those glorious times, which my colleague thinks are soon to be restored. So Mr. Southard advanced to that man, who was officially reported in debt to the Government about $9,000, the comfortable additional sum of $30,000 more out of the Treasury! Yes, sir, having allowed a corrupt claim of more than $30,000, he puts the recipient of his bounty in cash by advancing him, in the face of the law, $30,000 more, to be covered by claims equally fraudulent and corrupt; and it was afterwards covered by his friend, the Fourth Auditor, and the Government brought in debt upwards of $49,000, in addition; but the accession of the no-reform Administration of General Jackson, prevented the consummation of this last outrage.

What was done with the $30,000 thus advanced in cash? I have heard what became of a part of it, but I cannot prove it. So far, I have not spoken what I believe merely, but what I can prove. In relation to the men and things of that day, I believe many things which I cannot prove. I believe some $10,000 of the $30,000 advanced by Mr. Southard, went directly to men in power, or was applied to promote their designs. A charmingly rare Administration that was, when Secretaries put the public money in their pockets, $25,000 at a lick, and distributed it gratuitously to their favorites, or investments $30,000 at a time! Can the impudent assailants of the present Administration justly charge it with crimes like these? Yet, they are zealous to thrust out the men who have put a stop to these corruptions, and restore to power those who committed them. What a Fourth Auditor got fraudulently from the Treasury, Secretaries guzzled down in wines and meats, and other luxuries at his table, or won of him in gaming. The Bank candidate for the Presidency has been grossly wronged, if he did not, in the way of brag and other games, profit more by the current frauds on the Treasury, than the men who committed them. But that was all pure and right, Mr. Speaker; to put an end to it is no reform, for which Mr. Van Buren ought to be put out, and Mr. Clay put in.

And where now is the man who committed, authorized, or winked at, all these corruptions? Do you find any account of him in my colleague's speech? Not a word, sir. There is too much of a fellow-feeling between them. Mr. Southard, who held the Navy Department, is now one of the open-mouthed foes to Executive corruption and abuse; but if report speaks true, he profits as much by bank abuses, as he could have formerly done by Government abuses. He is president of one of the gambling bank concerns of the day, a particular adjunct and favorite of the Biddle bank, at a salary of $6,000 a year! He holds a public station which gives him $8 per day, and at the same time I am told receives his thousands in fees for practising as a lawyer in the Supreme Court. He is paid as a bank president, a legislator, and a lawyer, all at the same time, and of course, is absent most of his time from his public duties, except when there is a bank question on hand. Thereis no abuse or corruption in this. To be under pay by a bank, while pretending to serve the people, is no offence in the eyes of those who would pull down this Administration. But do you think, sir, the people, when they understand the game, will be content to be governed by bank presidents from New Jersey, and bank attorneys from Ohio? The banks pay better than the people. It is but a small part of $6,000 which a member of Congress gets from the people; but the banks can afford to pay thumping salaries and fees, especially to those who are honest enough to represent them in Congress instead of their constituents. One Henry Clay, who is looked to as the restorer of the old order of things, is known to have received in fees, from the Bank of the United States, upwards of $17,000, and probably $20,000 more from the branches. What a pure Government we shall have, when the President, heads of Departments, and a majority of Congress, shall be presidents, directors, stockholders, debtors, and attorneys of banks! Should not the farmers, mechanics, and all other honest men in the country, be required to lend a hand in putting down the present Administration, that they may bring about so glorious a reform?

To bring suspicion on innocent men, s one of the arts used by villains to escape detectioin. Our bank orators and stipendiaries practice upon this principle. Corrupt themselves to the very core, they are eternally bawling corruption against the Administration, hoping to gain credence by their impudence and their perseverance. The very men who have practised all sorts of abuse and corruptions at the expense of the people while in power, and are sold body and soul to banks, great and small, are now spending their money to disseminate far and wide a certain speech, knowing it to be charged with false and libellous imputations from beginning to end. To add the honors of office, and the emoluments of Government corruption, to those of bank corruption which they now enjoy, without regard to honor, justice, decency, or truth, is the great end and aim of all this false clamor and mischievous industry.

Let the people not be deceived. Great reform was notoriously accomplished by Gen. Jackson's administration in expelling from power the direct, profligate, and felonious plunderers of the Treasury. Yet it is said there has been no reform! and the people are appealed to to restore the old order of things. Yes, to restore Southard to the Navy Department, and perchance Watkins to the Fourth Auditor's Office, and Clay, the head man of the whole corrupt gang, not to the State Department, but to the Presidency de jure, as he once was President de facto. And poor old Gen. Harrison having, with one White, been used by them until they feel strong, is to be laid on the shelf, and yield all honors to Monsieur Brag, the corruptest of the corrupt. Whether honest men of any party can be so deceived as to relish such reform, remains to be seen.

My colleague has made an attack on the War Department, and because there is an increase of clerks and expenditures consequent upon the increase of business and unavoidable duties to more than double of what they were in the times of the economical administration of Messrs. Adams and Clay, and has attempted to impress the public mind that extravagance and profligacy mark this Department with the rest, and that reform promised has been neglected in relation to this Department.

To ascertain the facts, I called upon Mr. Poinsett, the Secretary of War, and presented him a copy of my colleague's speech, with a request that he would furnish me answers to the allegations and charges contained in said speech. In conformity with my request, he has been kind enough to furnish me with the following statements. They are full and complete so far as they go, and will be satisfactory to all who hear or see them. Comment is unnecessary. Time and space have not permitted a further investigation into this and other Departments; but I have little doubt that the result, on further investigation, would be the same. I before stated that abuses do exist, always have existed, and always will exist, in this and in the administration of all other Governments. It is impossible that this vast political federal fabric can be conducted without some abuses so long as frailty and depravity exist and form a part of the very nature of men, by whom it is governed. But here follows the statement from the War Department:

PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 5, 1838.

SIR: In compliance with your instructions to examine Mr. Bond's speech, as published in the National Intelligencer of the 4th and 5th of May last, and report how his statements agree with the facts as they are known to exist in this office, I have the honor to submit the following statement:

Mr. Bond says, "in 1828, the Paymaster General employed three clerks, whose united compensation was $3,900."

"In 1838 the salary of the same number of clerks is $4,290, besides the messenger's salary."

The estimates submitted to Congress for those years, show that the sums asked for the clerks and messenger in the office of the Paymaster General, were as follows:

In 1828.—"Clerks in the office of the Paymaster General		$3,900
Do. "Messenger		700
			$4,600
In 1838.—"Clerks and messenger in the office of the Paymaster General			6,100
Difference between the two years			$1,500

Accounted for as follows:

The clerks and messenger in the office of the Paymaster General are appointed under the act of the 20th April, 1818, which provides for, viz:

1 chief clerk, at a salary of	$1,700		$1,700
1 clerk "	1,400		1,400
2 clerks "	1,150 each		2,300
3 clerks "	1,000 each		3,000
1 clerk "	800		800
1 messenger "	700		700
			$9,900

The business of the office has not required at all times so many clerks, and they have been reduced accordingly. In 1828, but three were employed, and not all of these at the highest salaries. The numerous volunteers and militia, called into service to suppress Indian hostilities, increased the business so much as to make it indispensably necessary to re-employ one of the five additional clerks to which the office is entitled, and, in order to retain the services of competent persons, to allow to those employed the highest salaries provided by law. This makes the difference in the estimates for the two years.

It is still competent for the Secretary of War, under the act of the 20th of April, 1818, to appoint for this office three additional clerks, at $1,000 each per annum, and one at $800 per annum.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
N. TOWSON, P. M. G.

To the Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War.

Comparative statement of the number of persons employed in the Quartermaster General's office, in the years 1828 and 1838.

In 1828—3 officers; 2 clerks; 2 sergeants, acting as clerks; 2 sergeants, acting as messengers; total, 9.

In 1838—2 officers; 6 clerks; 1 messenger; total, 9.

NOTE.—It will be seen that there is no increase in the number of persons employed in the Quartermaster General's office, since 1828. The only change is in the substitution of clerks for officers and sergeants then employed. During the last two years, the duties of the office have been increased fourfold.

T. CROSS, Act'g Q. G.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington city, July 5, 1838.

SURGEON GENERAL'S OFFICE, July 3, 1838.

SIR: In obedience to your instructions, I have examined the speech of Mr. Bond of Ohio, so far as it relates to this office, and have the honor to report, that the regular salary of the clerk employed in this office is the same as was received by him in 1823, viz: $1,150 per annum, to which 10 per cent. was added, during the last year, by an act of Congress, making $1,265 per annum, and not $1,266, as stated in the speech referred to; this addition of 10 per cent. continues to the adjournment of the present session of Congress.

From the organization of this office a sergeant from the army was employed to perform the duties of messenger, until 1836, when, by an act approved on the 4th of July of that year, provision was made for a messenger in lieu of the sergeant, whose salary is $500 per annum, and to which 20 per cent. was added by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1837, referred to when stating the salary of the clerk, so that the actual difference consists in paying the messenger by specific appropriation, instead of his being paid from the army appropriation, as was the case when a sergeant was employed.

I have the honor to be,
Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN KING,
Acting Surgeon General.

Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War, Washington.

OFFICE OF THE COM. GEN. OF SUB.
Washington, July 3, 1838.

SIR: In compliance with your request of 2d inst. the speech of Mr. Bond of the 4th and 5th May ult. has, as far as regards this office been examined, and I have the honor to report, that in that speech as published in the "National Intelligencer," it is asserted, that

In 1828, the Subsistence Department employed four clerks, whose joint compensation was $2,950; and

In 1838, the Subsistence Department employs four clerks, whose joint compensation is $5,880.

In 1823, the number of clerks permanently employed in the Subsistence Department was three, and their compensation was, thus:

2 clerks per act, 26th May, 1824	$2,150 00
1 clerk per act, 2d March, 1827	800 00
	$2,950 00
1 clerk temporarily employed by permission of the Secretary of War at $25 per month	300 00
Making	$3,250 00

At that period, an orderly sergeant was employed as a messenger, who received his compensation from the "pay of the Army."

By the 1st section of the act of 9th May, 1836, the employment of non-commissioned officers in any of the offices of the Department of War was prohibited; and it became necessary to ask compensation for a messenger to be paid out of the appropriation for the civil list.

In 1838, the compensation of clerks and messengers in the Subsistence Office is,

1 principal clerk per act, 3d March, 1835	$1,600 00
1 clerk	1,200 00
1 do	1,000 00
	$3,800 00
And the messenger paid by appropriation	500 00
Aggregate	$4,300 00

By act 3d March, 1837, Congress added ten per centum upon $2,800, of the above salaries making	$280 00
And upon $1,500, including the messenger, twenty per cent.	300 00
Making	$580 00
Which added to the above	4,300 00
Makes	$4,880 00

being $1,000 less paid to clerks permanently employed, than stated by Mr. Bond; but when the resolution of Congress of 1st February, 1836, passed, "authorizing the President to furnish rations to certain inhabitants in Florida;" the Secretary of War directed that a special account should be kept in this office of the issues under that resolution; the permanent force in the office being insufficient for that purpose, in addition to their other duties, it became necessary to employ a clerk to attend especially to that business, whose annual compensation was fixed at $1,000, which added to the other items, constitutes the amount as stated in the speech.

When the department was rendered permanent by act of 3d March, 1835, the then Secretary of War thought that the salaries of the clerks in this office, should approximate as nearly as practicable, those of clerks employed in the civil bureaus, as he was particularly aware, that the salaries previously paid, were inadequate to the services rendered, and the responsibility attached to the situations; but in every instance where compensation to clerks or messenger in this office has been paid, it has been done invariably under acts passed by Congress itself, except in the two instances above mentioned.

Very respectfully,
Your most obedient servant,
GEO. GIBSON, C. G. S.

Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War.

INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

ASSERTION No. 1—The business of Indian Affairs was discharged by some one or two of the seventeen clerks employed in the War Department.

FACT—In 1828, four clerks were engaged in the transaction of this business—Mr. McKenney, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Kurtz and Mr. Miller. The Secretary then conducted a much larger portion of the correspondence, and supervised the details far more extensively than now.

ASSERTION No. 2—In 1828, there was one Superintendent of Indian Affairs, who was paid $1,500 per annum.

FACT—In 1828, there was one Superintendent, eo nomine, at $1,500, and three Governors of Territories, acting as Superintendents, one at $1,500 and two at $750. These allowances were made by Mr. Calhoun in 1821, 1822 and 1823; to the Governor of Michigan in 1821; (see Mr. C's answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 15th, 1832, State papers, 1st session 17th Congress, vol. 6th, Doc. 60;) to the Governor of Arkansas in 1822; and to the Governor of Florida in 1823; (see extract herewith of letter to Governor Duval of October 25, 1823;) aggregate compensation $4,500.

Extract of a letter from the SECRETARY OF WAR to his Excellency WILLIAM P. DUVALL, dated 25th October, 1823.

"Your letter of the 2d ult. was duly received.

"Upon a review of all the circumstances, the following principle has been adopted for the settlement of your claim to compensation as superintendent of Indian affairs in Florida, to wit:

"For the time past when there was no Indian agent for Florida, an allowance will be made to you, as superintendent, at the rate of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, which is the rate of compensation allowed to the Indian agent now authorized by law

"Since the appointment of an Indian agent for the Territory, in virtue of the authority above mentioned, and for the future, an allowance will be made to you at the rate of seven hundred and fifty dollars per annum, which is intended to cover the expense for clerk hire, office rent, and all others necessarily incurred by you in your intercourse with the Indians, that being the same amount as is now allowed to the Governor of the Arkansas Territory, and is considered a fair compensation for all expenses incurred by him of a similar nature."

ASSERTION No. 3—In 1838, we find four Superintendents of Indian Affairs, with salaries of $1,500 each.

FACT—In 1838, there is one Superintendent at $1,500, and one Governor (of Wisconsin) acting as such, whose compensation as Governor and Superintendent is fixed, by law, at $2,500. Adopting the principle of division established this session, in regard to the Governor of Iowa, and his pay as Superintendent will be $1,000; aggregate $2,500.

The other two acting Superintendents are Indian Agents, and receive only the pay of agents, as fixed by the law of 1834. This is stated in a note in the Blue Book, page 91, to which Mr. B. evidently had referred.

ASSERTION No. 4—In 1828, there were twenty-one Indian Agents, (three at $1,800, six at $1,500, one at $1,400, five at $1,300, six at $1,200, see State papers, 2d session 20th Congress, 3d vol. Doc. 117, page 7,) and twenty-eight sub agents. In 1838, ten Indian Agents at $1,500, and fourteen sub-agents at $750.

FACT—In 1838, there are but eight Indian Agents, exclusive of the two acting as Superintendents, and whom Mr. B. has counted as such.

In 1828, the appropriations for the Superintendents and Indian Agents was $31,000—In 1838 it is $16,500.

In 1828 the appropriation for sub-agents was $15,100—In 1838 it is $13,000.

In 1838 the number of interpreters at agencies is eight less than in 1828. The average pay of an interpreter in 1828 was $300 per annum, (see Blue Book for that year,) making the aggregate compensation of the thirty-nine employed in that year $15,600.—Appropriation in 1838, $9,300.

ASSERTION No. 5—In 1838 we hear of a commissioner whose salary is $3,000, and 12 clerks and two messengers, whose joint compensation is $19,400.

FACT.—In 1828, Governor Cass and General Clark, at the invitation of the Secretary of War, prepared a report, containing, among other things, "a code of regulations for the government of the (Indian) Department, and for the general administration of its affairs." This was in the form of a bill. The first section provided for the appointment of a commissioner at $3,000; the second prescribed his duties; the third related to the number of clerks; the fourth gave him the franking privilege, and the fifth authorized the employment of a messenger. These five sections are stated to "contain substantially the provisions of a bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs" in the House of Representatives, at the first session of the same Congress."—(See State Papers 2d session of the 20th Congress, Vol. 3d, Doc. 117, p. 4.) This report was submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War, "with a respectful but earnest recommendation."

The number of clerks now employed in the Indian office is 12. The number in 1828 was 4. In 1830 1 was added; in 1831 another; and in 1832 a messenger. In the latter year, the business of emigration was committed to the Commissary General, who employed 5, and a messenger. In 1836, 2 were authorized by law to be employed on the business of Indian reservations. The increase was occasioned in 1830 and 1831, by the passage of the act of May 28th, 1830, providing for an exchange of lands, and the treaty of September 27th, 1830, with the Choctaws, according to the stipulations of which, their removal was immediately commenced. The provisions in the same treaty, in that with the Creeks of March 24, 1832, and with the Chickasaws in 1832 and 1834, granting reserves to individuals and heads of families, to the number of about 10,000, and which were the first provisions of the kind to any extent, authorized in the judgment of Congress the employment of the other two in 1836. The whole number was 13.

The business of emigration has been transferred to the Indian Office; the number of clerks is 12, and the number of messengers is 2.

Thus far for the Indian Department in the two years specified, independent of treaty stipulations. The expense of superintendents, agents, sub-agents, and interpreters, in 1828, was $61,970; in 1838, it is $38,800; less in 1838, $23,170. This is exclusive of the compensation of the acting superintendents, which, as has been shown, is $2,000 less than in 1828; making the entire difference in favor of 1838, $25,170.†

We now come to the composition of the Indian Department, under and by virtue of treaty stipulations.

Mr. Bond enumerates 6 superintendents of emigration, 15 conducting and enrolling agents, 2 valuing agents, 8 collecting agents, 2 issuing agents, 16 assistant agents, 15 physicians, 11 clerks, 14 interpreters, 2 conductors of exploring parties.

REMARK.—These are all engaged in the business of emigration. As no agents of either of these classes are stated to have been employed in 1828, or prior thereto, the impression will naturally be that none were employed.

FACT.—In the treaty with the Creeks of January 24, 1826, were stipulations for the valuation of their improvements; for their removal and subsistence; valuing, collecting, enrolling, conducting, and issuing agents were employed. The number of each class, and the pay of each, cannot be ascertained without reference to the Auditor's Office, and a long examination; the fact of their employment is proved by the correspondence in the Indian Office. Some appointments of the same kind were also made under the treaty with the Cherokees of May 6, 1828.

REMARK.—The treaty with the Choctaws of September 27, 1830, was the first under which emigration took place extensively; and it was not until the following year that it commenced with much vigor under that with the Cherokees of 1828; and it was in 1831 that, for the first time, regulations were prescribed which gave form and system to the business of removal. These provided for the employment of the different classes of agents above enumerated, and fixed their compensation. These were not only approved by the President, but, slightly revised, have been appended to the reports from the Indian Office for the last year.

For the reasonableness of them, consider the number of Indians to be removed, and the stipulations to be fulfilled. Since the beginning of 1828, sixty-four treaties have been made with Indians. Of these, thirty-four provided for the removal of the Indians, the valuation of their improvements, stock, &c. and their subsistence for twelve months at their new homes. Living in different sections of the country, different sets of agents were necessarily employed, the number in each case being graduated with regard to the number of Indians, and the amount of service to be rendered. For the removal of the larger tribes, a general superintendent was essential as the only means of preserving harmony and subordination among the other agents, and among the Indians, and of ensuring unity of action. All responsibility was devolved upon him. To him was committed the selection, in the first instance, of all the other persons to be employed, and also the power to suspend them from duty; and upon his requisitions alone were the disbursing officers, military and civil, to make payments. For this responsibility, and his various and numerous services, $2000 will not be considered too large a compensation. The six named by Mr. Bond as in the service in 1838, are General Smith, superintending the removal of the Cherokees, numbering 18,000; Maj. Upshur, the removal of the Chickasaws, 5,500; Colonel Pepper, the removal of the Pottawatomies, Ottowas, and Chippewas, 6,700; Colonel Sands, discontinued, and duty transferred to Pepper. There are, therefore, three at $2,000, neither of whom will be in service, probably, at the close of the present year, as all these Indians will be removed. There is one other at five dollars a day, collecting straggling Choctaws in Mississippi, whose employment is temporary, and the sixth, who received the same pay, has been discharged.

Of the fifteen enrolling and conducting agents, five are employed among the Pottawatomies, Ottowas, and Chippewas, five among the Chickasaws, and five among the Cherokees, whose services will terminate before those of the superintendents. The enrolment must exhibit the name of each head of a family, and the number in each family, to be ascertained by personal inquiries through the nation, and it is required to regulate the issues of rations on the route, and payments and subsistence after their arrival west. The conductor has charge of the movement of a party, directs the issues of provisions, the transportation of the sick, and of the baggage, &c. and is held accountable for the delivery of the party to the agent of the Government west of the Mississippi. The interpreters are as necessary in the emigration as at the agencies; their compensation is higher, to cover the expenses of travelling. The employment of physicians is required by humanity, and the experience with the earlier emigrants would not justify the Government in refusing to employ them, merely to avoid the expense. Four of the physicians enumerated by Mr. Bond are provided for in treaties; two in that with the Winnebagoes, of September, 1832, and two in that with the Ottowas and Chippewas, of March 28, 1836: in both the pay is fixed. Conductors of exploring parties are also employed under treaty stipulations.

Mr. BOND says: "We find thirty-three commissioners and special agents."

REMARK. Of the thirty-three, twelve were employed under resolutions or laws of Congress, directing negotiations, or the examination of claims; six to execute treaty articles, and one conducted an exploring party, for which the appropriation was made at the suggestion of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Senate. Of the remaining fourteen, ten were employed by the express requirement of laws or treaties, two to execute treaty articles, one to conciliate the wild tribes of the prairies, and bring deputations of them to Washington, and the last is the district attorney in Florida, charged with temporary duty, having in view the removal of the Apalachicolas. Of the thirty-three, there is but one not authorized and required by resolution, law, or treaty, and that one has been employed to preserve the peace of the Western frontier. Since the 30th of September, 1837, the date of the report from which Mr. B. quotes, 19 of the 33 have been discontinued. The pay of commissioners was, as far back as 1801, eight dollars per day, from the time they left home, until they returned, and all necessary expenses were reimbursed, (see instructions from General Dearborn to Messrs. Davie, Wilkinson and Hawkins, American State Papers, Indian Affairs, vol. 1, page 650.)

* So, then, it appears that this Indian Department, with its Commissioner at $3,000, clerks, and messengers, was first proposed by a Whig committee, under a Whig administration, in the very year 1828, when the business was not more than one-third of what it is 1838.

† There is also another consideration. The appropriations for the Indian Department proper, in 1828, were under four heads—pay of superintendents and agents, pay of sub-agents, presents, and contingencies. The amount under the latter was $95,000, which was applied at the discretion of the Department, and out of it were paid smiths, farmers, interpreters, and any body the Department might choose to employ. In 1838 the appropriations are specific, based on laws and treaties, and the estimates for which are minute and full.

Mr. BOND presents an array of fifty-three blacksmiths, twenty farmers, eighteen teachers, five millers, one surveyor, and five miscellaneous agents. It is enough to say with regard to these, that with the exception of one in the last class, who is a messenger in the office of the Acting Superintendent at Detroit, performing duty also as a clerk, at $30 per month, (not a very extravagant allowance,) they are all employed in the fulfilment of treaty stipulations, and that when the treaty does not fix their compensation, it is regulated by the 9th section of the act of June 30th, 1834, organizing the Department of Indian Affairs. Every one conversant with Indian relations, knows that, in every negotiation, the Indians wish provision made for smiths, farmers, and teachers, &c. and the Government has always assented, because such measures will conduce to their civilization. The amount set apart for these purposes, forms a part of the consideration paid for the land ceded by the Indians. If these persons were not employed, so much more money must have been paid to the Indians. But in this case, too, Mr. Bond leaves it to be inferred, that such persons were not in the service in 1828. But from a very hasty examination of the reports from two of the superintendencies, St. Louis and Michigan, it appears that there then were thirty blacksmiths, twenty-two laborers, nine farmers, two teachers, three physicians, and four special agents. And it is probable that most of the treaties under which they were employed, are still in force, and of course these appointments make a part of those enumerated by Mr. Bond.

But, says Mr. B. even this is not all, The Commissioner of Indian Affairs says the list in the Blue Book is not accurate or complete. He leaves room to add or alter. And why did he not quote the reason assigned by the Commissioner?

"It being required that the names of all the persons employed on the 30th September should be given, it is impossible to procure the returns in season for printing the Register. Besides this, many of the agents neglect to make returns, and in other cases it is impracticable, from a variety of causes to obtain the requisite information. It is believed to be complete and accurate, so far as this office has the means of making it so." Knowing well the provisions in the treaties, the Commissioner could not help seeing at once that the returns did not embrace all the persons in the service. Taking only the treaties made since 1828, (sixty-four in number,) he knew that they provided for forty principal smiths, while the list shows only twenty-eight; the residue of the fifty-three named by Mr. B. being assistants; and so with the other classes of persons.

"Here, indeed," exclaims Mr. B. "is a display of patronage." Truly it is a great thing to have the appointment of a smith or a farmer for Indians on the frontier, and hardly within reach of a white settlement. But how has it happened that so much "patronage" rests with the Executive? Not by any act, primarily, of his own. It is Congress that directs a treaty to be made, ratifies it, and makes appropriations to carry it into effect. If the Executive, in consequence, possesses power, it has been knowingly and deliberately given by Congress.

It has been shown that the expenses of superintendents, agents, and interpreters, is twenty-five thousand dollars less now than in 1828. And more than that. In Doc. 474, House of Representatives, First session, Twenty-third Congress, page 146, may be found an "organization of the Indian Department," proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, the expense of which is a fraction more than the present. This report was prepared by Mr. Everett of Vermont, who deservedly acquired much credit by it, and the country was congratulated on the reform and retrenchment introduced by the laws then passed, and which were based upon it.

The sum of the matter is this. There have been sixty-four treaties made with Indians since 1828. The States have been slowly and gradually relieved of their Indian population. The tribes have been settled beyond the Mississippi and Missouri, so that intercourse with them is necessarily more expensive than ever. New features have been introduced into treaties. The Indians have not been talked with merely to get their lands, been offered for it only trifling and temporary aid, and left in the neighborhood they were found in. They have had assigned to them a fertile and healthy country, and have been liberally supplied with ploughs, hoes, and axes, for the men, and looms for the women; with mechanics to teach and work for them, and farmers to break up land and plant it for them, and teach them to do likewise. They have ceded to the United States 18,250,000 acres, for which the Government has stipulated to give them in land money, &c. $72,560,056; and it is expected that all this should have been done at no increase of expenditure over that in 1828.

My colleague has recourse to the official statements of the amount received by the Globe office, during the last and present Administrations, as proof of the extravagance of the Republicans, and ground of suspicion against the honesty of the editor. He gives the sum total of the amount paid for printing for Congress and the Departments, in the Globe office, hunting through the terms of two Presidents, at $220,000. I take it for granted, having no opportunity for the examination of the multitude of items of which it is made up, that this sum may have been disbursed through the Globe office for printing and paper, and other materials necessary to this species of work, so absolutely indispensable in the proper discharge of the business of Congress and the Departments. My colleague will allow that printing must be done for the Government. It is looked upon as the glory of our free Government, that all its acts are exhibited in print, and full information afforded to an enlightened community of every thing done by its public agents. This is the medium through which the fuctionaries and representatives of a people overspreading a continent, are held to an accountability, stricter than that which the people of the ancient Republics could command in a district of country, not greater than one of our large counties. The only questions brought up by my colleague's display of the public printing done by the Globe establishment are, has it been done well? Has it been done cheaply? Has it been done honestly? By bringing together the labors of a great establishment from its foundation to the present moment, my colleague [Mr. B.] would insinuate an accusation of exorbitant charges against the Government on the part of Messrs. Blair and Rives. My colleague showed his caution in thus accusing by inuendo. He was perfectly aware of the unimpeachable honesty of the proprietors of the Globe office, and did not dare to make a single specification against them. But a member from Tennessee, [Mr. CROCKETT,] in pursuing the game of the Opposition in a private letter, charged that three or four hundred thousand dollars of the public money had been paid to the Globe office for printing the speeches of Messrs. BENTON and CALHOUN in defence of the Administration. His colleague, [Mr. CARTER,] perceiving that this exceeded by some hundreds of thousands all the public money that passed through the Globe office in payment for work done and materials purchased for all the Departments and Congress, came to the rescue of his friend [Mr. CROCKETT] by declaring that a tariff had been laid on the pay of the clerks to make up the sum paid for publication. The moment that these charges appeared, the Editor of the Globe, through his paper, challenged an investigation by a committee of Congress. The members of Congress who made them were told it was their duty to bring the delinquent they denounced to justice. My colleague and his accomplice advisers shrunk from meeting the man they had charged, before a committee of our own body. Mr. Blair then appealed to this House, by petition, to refer the matter to a committee, and have a full scrutiny of all his accounts with the public. The special committee was ordered by this House, and then commenced the effort of the Opposition to defeat, by indirection, the inquiry, which they knew would disgrace the persons they had put forward to stigmatize the Administration and the official paper by their accusations. Only six weeks of the session remained, and the Opposition knew how difficult it would be, when all the business of the session was huddled into this narrow space, to take up a postponed question, especially in regard to a petition which could only come up, by the rule, on the Monday of every alternate week. An hour, therefore, after the inquiry had been ordered by a special committee, a Conservative [Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia] moved a reconsideration. This hung up the decision two weeks, and was, I am afraid, intended for that purpose. When the subject was again taken up, every artifice was resorted to for the purpose of defeating inquiry. It was first proposed to refer it to a standing committee, composed of one of the accusers [Mr. CROCKETT] and others, making a majority of Opposition members who had shown themselves afraid of the investigation. If the case had been referred to the accusers as judges, would not the whole inquiry have been smothered, or a report as foul and erroneous as the original charges returned by those making them? The accusers [BOND, CROCKETT, and CARTER] exerted themselves in this attempt, but it was voted down by the House. An effort to lay the subject on the table, an so get rid of it, was tried by the same party in vain. At last, after the committee was appointed, and had the instructions of the House to inquire into the whole subject of the public printing, when it came forward and asked the ordinary power of sending for persons and papers to obtain evidence of the facts it was required to report, the Opposition opposed this, and moved to discharge the committee altogether from the duty assigned.

This failed, and the committee met and organized for the examination. It opened its sittings almost every morning at 8 o'clock, but not one of the accusing members came forward to make good their charges. At last the committee addressed a note to Mr. CROCKETT, inviting him to support by evidence, the allegations made by him in the House and his private letters. Mr. CROCKETT replied, if the investigation was to be confined to the prayer of the petition, to a scrutiny embracing only the accounts of the Globe office with the public Departments and Congress, he would have nothing to with it; but if the committee would go out of the instructions of the House, and inquire into the private accounts of the editor of the Globe, he would examine witnesses! How the committee treated this evasion, I am not informed; probably with silent contempt. But I am authorized by Mr. Blair to say that he is willing to submit his private accounts and his private life to the closest scrutiny. The bold assailants in this House skulking thus from the summons, the committee had no alternative but to seek out testimony on the allegations made before the representative body, by interrogating those who, from the nature of the charges, must know their truth or falsehood.

Mr. CROCKETT's charge, made by him in writing, verified by his signature, and secretly circulated, was couched in these words:

"Hundreds of thousands of Mr. Benton's and Mr. Calhoun's speeches, as I am informed, have been printed gratuitously, and circulated by 'the party' throughout the land.

"My own opinion is, honestly, that they are paid for out of the public Treasury, and I believe it could be proven to the satisfaction of every unprejudiced mind; at any rate I should like to know how Dear Blair, the printer of the Globe, can afford to print so many thousand speeches' for nothing, and find himself? No man can believe it who is not as blind with party prejudice as a snake in dog-days. The cost at the ordinary rate cannot, I think, be less than from 3 to $400,000."

As explained by his colleague (Mr. CARTER) in the presence of the House and of Mr. CROCKETT, and afterwards published by Mr. CARTER in the National Intelligencer, it stood thus:

"Sir, my colleague did not intend to say that the money was taken directly from the Treasury, and applied to these purposes, but he intended to say, and does say, that the public money is indirectly appropriated, and applied to this specific use. Sir, are there no grounds for this opinion? If the salaried officers of the Government are paid extravagantly, and those salaries made sufficiently high to give the officer a reasonable compensation for his services, after contributing several hundred dollars for party purposes—to pay for these partisan speeches and extra Globes, if you please, which is said to be coerced from them by this party regulation and discipline—I would ask, in the name of common sense, if this is not virtually defraying these expenses out of the public Treasury, to all intents and purposes? Sir, it is virtually the same thing, just as much so as if the editor of the Globe was directed by the Government to cause to be printed ten thousand copies of that paper every week, and circulated to non-subscribers, and to draw his money directly from the Treasury. The effect is the same; the Government pays the money in either case, and, in either point of view, improperly. Sir, were not the salaries of these officers increased ten or twenty per cent. just before the last Presidential election, upon the recommendation and vote of the party that reigned and ruled in this House so triumphantly—increased just as much as is said to be the tax laid and collected off those officers for party operations?"

This imputation on the Government and the Editor of the Globe thrown out in secret letters at first, and afterwards promulgated on the floor of this House, for the purpose of giving it the stamp of a Congressional impeachment; and which, as I have shown, they attempted to keep pending and unrefuted by an inquiry, until after the elections, was put down by a cloud of witnesses. The committee addressed a note to all the Departments, in pursuing the inquiry as to the facts put in issue by Messrs. CROCKETT and CARTER:

It was responded to by all the Departments; every one proving that no change in the ordinary price of printing had been made favorable to the Globe office; but on the contrary, the Department of State, Treasury and Post Office, point to particular instances of considerable reductions. The clerks of all the Departments have, in a body, given written testimony, signed by their names, establishing, in the most explicit manner, the utter want of foundation in truth for the assertion of the members from Tennessee, [Messrs. CROCKETT and CARTER,] that a tariff had been imposed on them to pay for publications at the Globe office. I select the shortest replies as a sample of the whole:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
July 7, 1838.

SIR: I herewith transmit the answers of myself and clerks, and that of the clerks of the Navy Commissioners' office, to the queries propounded in your letter of the 3d instant.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J. K. PAULDING.

Hon. Jas. J. McKAY,
Chairman Select Committee House of Representatives.

Personally appeared before me, Robert Getty, one of the Justices of the Peace for said District, James K. Paulding, Secretary of the Navy of the United States, and, being duly sworn, saith:

1. That he does not know of any instance in which the Editors of the "Globe" have been allowed for printing for the Navy Department a compensation greater than that usually paid to other printers for printing, similar to that required to be done by those Editors.

2. That he does not know any instance since he has been at the Head of the Navy Department, in which printing, not properly chargeable to the United States, according to law or the usages of his predecessor, has been ordered and paid for out of the public fund, either to the Editors of the Globe or any other printers; and that he does not know of any of the officers of the Navy Department being tariffed or required to raise funds to pay for public documents or speeches to be published at the office of the Globe or elsewhere.

3. That no change as to the mode or prices in the execution of the printing done for the Navy Department has been introduced since he has been at its head, differing from that customary under his predecessors; and further saith not.

J. K. PAULDING.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, June 7, 1838.

The undersigned, clerks in the Navy Department, respectfully state, in answer to an inquiry contained in a letter of the 3d instant, addressed to the Secretary of the Navy by the Hon. James J. McKay, chairman of the select committee of the House of Representatives, to which was referred so much of the memorial of F. P. Blair as invites a scrutiny into all his accounts for printing for Congress and the public offices, that they have not "been tariffed or required to raise funds to pay for public documents and speeches to be published at the office of the Globe, or elsewhere."

A declaration like the above was sworn to and snbscribed by the clerks in the Navy Commissioners' office, before Chas. W. Goldsborough, J. P. and sent to the committee.

There are 444 clerks in all the Departments. Of these a large majority are in opposition to the Administration, and to the press which supports it; and yet, with perfect unanimity, they bear unhesitating testimony to the utter groundlessness of the charge made by the members from Tennessee, [Messrs. CROCKETT and CARTER.] It appears there was not the slightest circumstance to countenance it—not a pretence to found it on. It was made on this high authority, was to do mischief to the Administration in the approaching elections, under the hope that inquiry might be baffled during the remnant of the session, or that the committee would not be able to examine the whole subject submitted to it; and that as it could not report in full, the evidence would not come out in time to correct what I might call fabrication, until it had done its work for the party. To defeat this iniquitous scheme, I felt myself called on to seek from the same quarter the same evidence which the committee has obtained, and I use it to put in a proper light before the country those who would abuse their high station to destroy the reputations of innocent men for party objects.

It appears from the official and verified statements of the Departments, that no increase of price on any jobs executed for them by the Globe office, has in any instance taken place; on the contrary, that great reductions have been made on several; and on inquiry, I learn that the printers and others who appeared before the committee, who measured the work, and made the requisite calculations to ascertain whether it had been well done by the Globe office, and charged for according to law, proved, as far as they progressed, that all was right.

To enable the public to judge of the excess of profits, which my colleague, [Mr. BOND,] by his aggregate of $220,000, would make the impression had been made by the Globe office, I have obtained from Mr. Rives, who has the entire management of the establishment, the following statement:

"The prices which Congress pays for its printing were fixed by three disinterested practical printers in 1819, residing in different sections of the Union. Two weeks after the Globe office commenced printing for Congress, (the 11th December, 1835,) the wages of journeymen printers were raised by the Typographical Society of this city, 10 per cent. on former prices. That rate has continued ever since; but the price paid by Congress has remained unaltered."

The Globe office and materials cost $40,000; the wear and tear of materials is about $5,000 a year; the interest on $40,000 is $2,400; the hands in the Globe office have been paid in six years $140,000; the paper used in printing for the Departments and Congress, cost $68,000."

It will be seen, therefore, from the foregoing statement, that the actual expenditure of the Globe office, in connection with the public work, is $268,000; a sum greatly exceeding the amount received from the Treasury. Yet a reasonable profit has been made upon the public work, because an establishment adequate to its performance in the intervals of public employment, and in association with it, is enabled, by publishing newspapers, speeches for members of Congress, jobs for private ndividuals, and advertisements, to add largely to ts income.

I now turn to the public printing executed at the ewspaper offices of the Opposition in this city. One would suppose from the outcry that they, at least, had been proscribed, as they pretend the office-holding partisans of Federalism have been, and were almost starving for patronage, while the Globe was rioting in an enormous monopoly. My colleague—who has been almost petrified with horror at the extravagance of the Administrations which (with the command of the Departments and majorities in Congress) have, in a course of six years, allowed the only press in this city advocating the Republican policy to derive a reasonable profit on work and materials furnished to the amount of $220,000—does not think worth while to mention the trifling amount which has passed through the mills of the Intelligencer and Telegraph during the same six years, and when both were devoted to the cause of the Opposition. Every body in Washington knows (it is of record) that the National Intellenger, office, house and lot, types, presses, profits due and to become due, are deeded to the Bank of the United States for facilities granted it at various times, amounting to between ninety and one hundred thousand dollars. This is prima facie proof that it has been starved at the Treasury during the six years that the Globe has rolled in such abundance. I have looked to the record, and find that the editors of the National Intelligencer have drawn the following sums from the Treasury during the six years of long abstinence that the Globe interfered with its income:

Gales and Seaton received during the six years beginning the 1st October, 1831, and ending the 30th September, 1837 - -	$432,348 18
Duff Green received - -	363,293 94
Together,	$795,642 12
For the extra session, in the name of Allen, up to this time (7th July) Gales and Seaton have received for printing to the House - -	$120,000 00
In addition to this, is an appropriation of $49,000, which has just passed, for the purchase of Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates, (volumes made up from the pages of the Intelligencer) and other books which they have printed and kept on hand for distribution, at the expense of the public, among the members. Of this sum, a few job printers in this city will come in for five or six thousand dollars. Gales and Seaton's part will be at least - - - -	43,000 00
For work ordered at this session and not yet paid for, there will be added to the receipts of Gales and Seaton (in the nane of Allen) at least -	15,000 00
The sum total already voted by the present House to its printers, is -	178,000 00
If the next session of three months may be calculated upon as the ratio, (and as there is always more work done in the same space of time in the short session than the long one,) it is a fair calculation that one-third of the printing expenditure already incurred by the House, may be set down for the coming short session—that is -	59,000 00

The following results are shown by the comparison:

1st. The editors of the Intelligencer will have received for the printing for one branch, during the 25th Congress, and for old books distributed among the members, seventeen thousand dollars more than the whole amount which my colleague [Mr. BOND] has drawn together for work done by the Globe establishment for all the Departments, and for Congress, during six years.

2d. It shows that the two leading Opposition presses in this city have received about one million dollars, commencing with the period which my colleague [Mr. BOND] has fixed upon as beginning the condemned career of the Globe establishment.

And yet my colleague sees nothing extraordinary in the enormous expenditure on the National Intelligencer, but is shocked at the pampered condition of the Globe.

But if the difference of amounts received by the two establishments is amazing, the mode in which the Intelligencer's receipts have been so swollen is not less astonishing.

Neither branch of Congress has ever been solicited by the proprietors of the Globe to print books for distribution among the members; nor have any such publications been voted to be done by the Globe office. Only two works, I understand, have passed through its press—the Diplomatic Correspondence of the United States from 1783 to 1789, and the Commercial Regulations. The former was printed for less than it had been done for previously; and the latter, which had not been printed before, was printed and bound at less than Congressional prices.

The enormous sums which have swelled the bloated receipts of the Intelligencer, are made up of books to fill the private libraries of members of Congress, being the republication of old State papers and Registers of Debates, containing the speeches of the members themselves. This system of seducing members of Congress, by their private interests and personal vanity, to vote the wagon loads of volumes annually distributed from the Intelligencer office, began before I came here. The old members having obtained their share, the new comers do not refuse what has been previously printed for them: and the old members, as matter of course, vote it, because, if they did not, it would be an acknowledgment that they had taken money from the Treasury to make perquisites in books for themselves to which they were not entitled; and so this abuse is handed down from Congress to Congress by the rump of the old members, who are obliged to give to the new members the douceur of books which they had previously shared among themselves. I voted for this resolution. I regret that I done so. I did not understand at the time its full bearing, and the amount it involved; and I now say, that the portion of the books which falls to me, is the property of the Government, and at its service, whenever it may be found advantageous to surrender them. The Senate have again and again voted down this appropriation; but the majority in the House then tack it on some indispensable appropriation bill, and compel the Senate to vote it, and the President to sign it, or else lose the means of supporting some regular establishment of the Government, and be compelled to throw the business of the country into confusion, or leave it undone. The forty odd thousand dollars appropriated to the Intelligencer's book contribution, was rejected by the Senate at the present session, as heretofore; but it was afterwards coupled by the House with the bill "to provide for the support of the Military Academy of the United States for the year 1838, and for other purposes," and so forced upon the Senate and President. It is in this way, when the Federalists have a majority in either branch of Congress, that they compel a Democratic Administration to submit to the appropriation of unnecessary millions, with which, by log-rolling, they load the bills indispensable to the support of Government. Their corrupt appropriations to subserve private, local, and personal interests, are always tacked to a bill which must be passed, or the Government be stopped.

But another mode is adopted by the Federal party having the majority in either House, to swell the expenses against the wishes of the Administration, and then charge the extravagance to it. For example, at the present session, the House printed more than one hundred thousand dollars in documents, many of them not worth the paper (now made waste paper,) on which they are printed. Of this sort is a volume of one hundred and thirty-eight pages, consisting entirely of the cancelled drafts of the Treasury which my colleague [Mr. BOND] called for, and had printed. He could have had no motive in calling for this but to make a fat job of rule and figure work for Gales and Seaton. It is just as valuable a work as so many cancelled checks drawn on a bank. In the beginning of the session, Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, a Conservative, called for the correspondence of the Treasury with the banks. The House was informed that there were not clerks in the Department sufficient to prepare it during the term of the members. It would have made a fat job of at least $50,000, on which the gentleman's friend, Mr. Allen, would have had a per centage, and Gales and Seaton their profits. Another call was made by him for all the documents in regard to the defaulters to the Treasury; and this would have been to copy and print the papers of the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury out and out. This would, besides the expense of copying, cost at least $50,000 more for printing. It was found there were not clerks enough to make the copies, and Mr. GARLAND moved a resolution to authorize new appointments for this purpose, but it failed. This shows what the Conservatives and Whigs would have done, by way of bringing grist to Gales and Seaton's press, to afford vast profits to them, and increase the per centage of Allen. What they have done appears, from the gross sum of a hundred and twenty thousand dollars for the extra and present session of the House printing, with an arrear of fifteen thousand dollars yet to be received for it, with forty-three thousand dollars for books; and at least fifty-nine thousand dollars to be realized, at the same rate, for the approaching session, showing an aggregate of TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SEVEN THOUSAND DOLLARS for one branch of Congress for one Congressional term; whereas Messrs. Blair and Rives have received, during the six years by colleague [Mr. BOND] has scanned their printing, only one hundred and six thousand dollars for Congress printing and materials, and one hundred and fourteen thousand from all the Departments, for the same time.

But the most scandalous part of this history of the printing of the House is yet to be told. Although Gales and Seaton receive all this money for printing, they were not elected its printers. Allen was elected to perform this confidential trust, although he had only about 21 or 22 votes in a House of 242 members. Does it not look as though after three days' balloting a corrupt bargain was made, under which it was arranged that Allen was to become nominally the printer to the House, but Gales and Seaton were to do the work and receive the pay? After the caucus was held which consummated the infamous agreement, (if such was the case,) by which it was stipulated that Gales and Seaton's friends would go over to Allen and unite with the Conservatives in his election, suspicions were excited by the announcement of this determination; and several of the honest Conservatives, whose votes were necessary to the success of Allen, interrogated him as to the supposed intention of transferring the printing to Gales and Seaton. He denied positively that there existed such an engagement, and pledged himself to execute the printing in his own office, declaring that he was making provision for that purpose. That he made the pledge, and forfeited it, is established by the statement of a member on this floor, [Mr. SNYDER, of Illinois.] Their votes were, in effect, sold to Gales and Seaton, although they protested, in advance, against being made accessory to such a shameful and corrupt transaction.

Mr Chairman, a high public trust, personal in its character, has been farmed out in violation of all principle and decency, to individuals to whom it is known a majority of this body, as well as their constituents, were unwilling to confide it; and Allen, in violation of another Republican principle, holds a sinecure. Will any one hereafter say, that this House is to be trusted to elect the Chief Magistrate of this country, when it is found, that in electing a printer, pecuniary considerations, the bases of bargaining between parties, have controlled the result.

Another natural consequence of this bargaining, has been discovered before the committee appointed to investigate the subject. This committee being appointed at the heel of the session, has not yet had time to make full investigation, and report; but I feel at liberty to use the information which I have derived from a witness, sworn before it. A first-rate practical printer, called on by that committee to measure the work and calculate the price which it was lawful to charge for it, and compare it with that which Gales and Seaton, in the name of Allen, as printer to this House, had received for it, found that the first document printed for this House at this session, by Gales and Seaton, was fraudulently printed; and hat by diminishing the page, and using types different from those authorized by law, they had made an illicit profit, amounting to between thirteen and fourteen hundred dollars. He examined another document, and found a like fraud committed; and an unlawful profit of between 3 and $400 obtained by it. This was but a beginning. The committee had not time to prosecute the inquiry further at this session; and asked leave to continue it at the next, which was granted. I have a statement of these facts, in writing, from the witness, as sworn to by him before the committee. He is a first-rate printer, well acquainted with Congressiona work, and of unimpeachable character. I have little doubt from this commencement that it will be found in the end, that Gales and Seaton have made as much out of their frauds, as will pay Allen the per centage he required as compensation for the deception practised upon those Conservatives whom he betrayed; and to make good to those who acted with him his promise, to convert the consideration he received into the means of supporting the press established in this city for their common benefit. All the legitimate profits upon the public work will thus, probably, be cleared to the Intelligencer, and the aliment of the Madisonian will be derived from the frauds committed by his Whig accomplices on the Treasury. How characteristic this of the two printing concerns, and the two parties which entered into the vile coalition that gave birth to the bastard Madisonian? Is it not notoriously fed on offal of the foul peculations of the Intelligencer? And this is an earnest of what the Federal party will do for the little Spartan band of Conservatives, who shall have joined their standard, in the event of success. They will, no doubt, give them a share of the plunder, but not an atom of the power, of the Government.

Will not the American people ask, for whose interests the honor of the great representative body of this country has been compromised, and its hall made a market place, in which the votes of members, and a high public trust, have become a subject of mercenary barter between the leaders of two parties assuming to be actuated by lofty political principles? When understood, their principles are like the man for whom they have sacrificed the noble character of the country. He is an Englishman, a perfect prostitute in politics—notoriously the stipendiary of the Bank of the United States—and the ready instrument of every faction, which, in alliance with that institution, would contribute to the overthrow of our Republican institutions. He is an alien, too, in all his fellings. He was found the willing organ of Gorostiza in vindicating the cruel and perfidious conduct of Mexico towards our citizens, and its insults to our Government. He took the part of France, when she shamefully withheld the indemnity she was pledged by treaty to pay, and endeavored to throw the blame on our Government, and raise a party for France, in case we were driven to war in defence of our rights. He has encouraged the resistance of the Indians to the policy of the Government, and stimulated the feeling which led to the butchery of so many gallant men, the exhaustion of the public Treasury, and the ruin of the Indians, whose cause he pretended to espouse. It is on this dishonest fraudulent Englishman, that more than a million of the public money has been lavished from first to last. And yet my colleague, [Mr. BOND,] and the party with which he is associated, think him poorly compensated.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have said, perhaps more than once, that there are existing abuses; and for reasons which I have given, abuses will exist. But if "those who administer this Government were as pure as the angels that minister in Heaven," there would be lean, lank, hungry, unprincipled hyenas to howl around this Capitol, with appetites prepared not only to devour the reputation of those who live to administer the Gavernment, but the grave itself would be insufficient to secure the dead from their blighting and withering howl.

My colleague has finished his speech with a case from the Old Testament Scriptures, illustrative, as he supposes, of the corrupting influence of power upon the Democratic party; the total want of analogy between which, in some of its strongest points, may be easily perceived; for while Hazael came to the throne by the murder of his master, that is, through blood and crime, the present and past Administrations came into power, not by crime and blood, but by the suffrages of a free and indepenpent people; and by the same operation which brought these Administrations into power, was a corrupt and usurped Administration politically throttled, and its corrupt workers of iniquity thrown into the mud. But, sir, to the Scriptural case. I shall close my remarks by a reference to a case from the same high authority. Sir, the course of the party at present out of power—but earnestly desiring, and sparing no pains, labor, or expense, to get into power—reminds me, and may remind the country forcibly, of the case of the unfortunate Absalom. I refer not to his contriving the death of Amnon, nor his forming a conspiracy with Ahithophel against the administration of the government, but to his ambition, and the means he used with the people to carry his designs.

Being suffered to return from his banishment into the neighborhood of the throne he plied his political wiles with the unsuspecting people, alledging that justice was not done them, promising if he was put into office, that things should be made better. Thus speaking, and forming a party against the Government, we are told that Absalom rose up early, and stood beside the way of the gate, and if any man had a controversy, and came to the king for judgment, then Absalom said "The matters are good and right, but there is no man deputed of the king to hear thee. O! that I were made judge in the land, that every man which hath a suit or cause might come unto me, and I would do him justice." And it was so that when any man came nigh to him to do him obeisance, he put forth his hand, and took him and kissed him. So Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel. He sent spies throughout the land (political missionaries) to all the tribes of Israel, and under pretence of piety towards God, he left Jerusalem for Hebron, where he was to set up his authority. But ere his mad ambition obtained its consummation, the beast which he rode forsook its rider, and Absalom fell by the hand of trusty Joab, who made his grave in a pit.

Absalom went out to war upon a mule—a mongrel beast, half horse, half ass. What kind of a mongrel hobby is the present Opposition mounted on? Bank, Anti-bank—Tariff, Anti-tariff—Masonic, and Anti masonic, &c. &c. They have no opinion in common, except it is hostility to the people's best interests, and a contempt for their understanding, or, in other words, a decided hatred to the simple institutions of Democracy. But when the people shall rise in their strength, this modern mule shall forsake its riders, and leave them to the fate of Absalom.

With all the ambition and chicanery of Absalom, backed by the cunning of his counsellor, Ahitophel, the Federal party never can again succeed in getting into power. They have been driven into political banishment, from which they never will be permitted to return.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

SPEECH OF MR. DAWSON, OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, May 31, 1838—On the bill making appropriation for the suppression and prevention of Indian hostilities, for the year 1838, and to carry into execution the treaty made with the Cherokee Indians in 1835; and to provide for their removal, and in vindication of the policy of Georgia, &c.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I am sure that the committee will cheerfully indulge me with a hearing on the bill now before us. The extraordinary latitude taken in the discussion, the unkind if not illiberal imputations, yea, the unprovoked and provoking attacks repeatedly made upon the authorities of Georgia, in reference to the policy of that State towards the Indians within her jurisdiction, not only justify, but demand it of me. Sir, I deeply regret the temper and character of this discussion; it has given me no pleasure to hear such representations of the legislation of the State of Georgia. I heard with surprise the extravagant and enthusiastic eulogies pronounced on the Indians in contrast with the whites. Such unnecessary and highly wrought comparisons and contrasts can only result from a total ignorance of the subject, or from a prurient disposition to be esteemed the bold assailants of the supposed oppressors, and the vindicators of the oppressed; a propensity which must have many charms, from the influence it seems to exert over some gentlemen. These things would render it inexcusable in me to remain silent. The attacks thus made on my constituents, a just sense of the injury, and of the resentment due to such ruthless violations of the respect due to the feelings of others, by such groundless and uncourteous allegations, would make me a recreant to my duty, and a traitor to my constituents, if I were to remain silent. Honor, feeling, justice and humanity have been spoken of as being disregarded, in the relations between the white and the red man in Georgia, by those who do not understand those relations, and, consequently, deserve severe reprehension for their slanderous denunciations. Independent of these urgent considerations, it is due to the position I occupy, as a representative of the State of Georgia, and to those who particularly sent me here, that I should present the views I entertain on the subject. I will show that Georgia, in her legislation, has uniformly observed a cautious and just regard for the interest of the Indians; controlled them by the principles of humanity and justice; and that, whatever kindness and liberality (compatible with the rights of the State) would dictate, has been done.

To comprehend fully the rights of Georgia to all the territory, and the jurisdiction over it, within her chartered limits, and to present her vindication fairly, it will be necessary to examine into the rights belonging to the States separately, before the formation of the Federal Constitution. I shall then show what has been our State policy, and that this policy has not been in violation of, or incompatible with, a just, a wise, and a liberal humanity. In this I shall confine myself chiefly to recorded facts, so that, if my constitutional positions be wrong, or the policy of the State be cruel or oppressive, both can be easily controverted.

The first position which I shall assume, and which I deem necessary to a full understanding of the right of jurisdiction of the States over the whole extent of their chartered limits, is, that at the time of the formation of the Constitution of this confederacy, the States were severally sovereign and independent. Each State being sovereign, was so, not only over persons residing within their respective limits, but necessarily over the territory. And what territory? Why, all that comprehended within the charter which granted them political existence, as separate and distinct colonies under the crown of Great Britain. Within those chartered limits, the State holding the sovereignty held the jurisdiction.

The convention which formed the compact of this confederacy, bestowed on the Federal Government the exercise of a portion of their sovereign powers. To do this, the States must have previously possessed it entire; or how else could they delegate it? The right to bestow, implies clearly the pre-existing right to hold; and the act of receiving, is of itself a recognition of the power of the grantor.

Before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the sovereign power must have been held by the States respectively; for the powers exercised by this Government are all derived from the States. The States, then, having delegated a part, retained all the powers not thus delegated to the General Government, or prohibited by the compact to them.

The States, being then in possession of these powers, after the adoption of the Constitution, had the original right, under the retained sovereign powers, and also under the Constitution of the United States, to exercise all power not thus delegated. Georgia then, as well as the other States, had sovereignty and jurisdiction within her limits, over both persons and territory; and the undoubted right to use that jurisdiction, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution: hence, it is clear that the State of Georgia, like all other States or nations, has jurisdiction over all persons, white, red or black, within her boundaries, and can exercise that jurisdiction by extending her civil and criminal laws over the entire population without distinction of color. There is nothing in the Constitution or the law of nations exempting Indians.

But again: under the Constitution of the United States, Indians residing within a State are subject to taxation at the will of the State; and after taxation, they become, in part, the basis of representation. I refer to the following clause of that instrument:

> Article I. Section 2 Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included in this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.

The power of taxation is one of the highest and most important of sovereign attributes; and here, in the Constitution, this power is expressly recognised: does it not, then, necessarily follow, that the power of taxation carries with it, not as an incident merely, but absolutely, the authority to create a tax, and to regulate the assessment, and the other incidents necessary to the execution of the power? If this be so, (and it is clear,) that Indians can be taxed by a State, under whose jurisdiction must they be? Let any constitutional lawyer, whose opinions are opposed to these views, and who thinks proper to enter into this debate, come to the argument fairly, and with candor—not as a partisan, or an enthusiast—and I am persuaded, his investigations will force him to admit that this power belongs to the States respectively. To my mind, sir, it is beyond controversy.

Then, by the Constitution of the United States, independent of the original right of sovereignty, inherent and reserved to the States, under that instrument, the States respectively have the right of jurisdiction over the Indians within their limits. This position involves the whole question of the Cherokee controversy, so far as the State of Georgia is particularly involved; and I shall listen (at the proper time) with great pleasure to any gentleman who shall be pleased to controvert this position. But, sir, I apprehend none will desire to meet the question thus presented, but will prefer to indulge in the expressions of the sympathies of the heart, and not in the convictions of the understanding.

Under this right of jurisdiction, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the sympathies and morbid sensibilities exhibited by gentlemen in this debate, every old State in this Union has, long since, exercised this very power, and extended their laws over the Indians residing within their limits: but, sir, none of the tender feelings and yearning sympathies are, in these days, indulged by our political enthusiasts and religious fanatics at home. It is one of those characteristic of those under the influence of this malignant philanthropy, to disregard their own actings and doings, and the conduct of those immediately around them; and their distempered humanity and mistaken sympathy are sent abroad in search of their objects.

In days that have have passed away, we were taught that charity should begin at home. It is not so now; it begins anywhere else than at home. Hence it is that our people, in certain sections, are found intermeddling with the affairs of others; shedding tears over the condition of those whom they have never seen, and whose comforts and pleasures far exceed those of three-fourths of the world. I trust I shall be pardoned for this digression. If there be a State among the old thirteen which has not extended her jurisdiction over the Indians, I ask any member from that State to rise in his place, and state the fact. Who will do it? Not one, sir.

The history of the States has recorded it; many of them did so before the adoption of their own constitutions; yes, sir, before the formation of the articles of the confederacy. To prevent a Stat from the exercise of this jurisdiction, and its enforcement; you must show the inhibition in the Constitution of the United States. I ask gentlemen to point out, in that instrument, the clause which prohibits a State from exercising this power. It cannot be shown. I assume, then, this position: that the Indian tribes within the chartered limits of a State, are not sovereign and independent. Sir, no member on this floor, who regards his reputation as a statesman, would venture the opinion that Indian tribes within a State, and especially within one of the old thirteen, are not subject to the laws of that State, by virtue of their sovereignty. Once admit that position, and our ideas of discovery and conquest, and all their consequences, fall.

The legislation of the States has closed the argument; and it is an important historical truth, which these enthusiasts and fanatics ought to recollect, that the Indians within the old thirteen States, and the lands in their occupancy, have, for years, been regulated by the laws of the States in which they reside, and not by treaties; and, sir, notwithstanding all that we have heard to the contrary Georgia!—yes, sir, Georgia! was not only among the last, but the very last of the old thirteen, to take on herself the regulation of the Indians by law; and yet Georgia has been censured, abused, and slandered, for doing that which her sister States had done, and long persevered in, before she even contemplated it.

I will be excused, I trust, for adverting to a few historical facts in reference to this point, not for the purpose of censure or reproach, but to show others that Georgia was far more tardy than themselves in establishing this principle of jurisdiction.

Massachusetts herself, at an early period, and whilst she was a colony, extended her laws over every tribe of Indians within her borders: nay, more, she limited their rights of occupancy to so many acres of land; appointed guardians for them; among other prohibitions, made it penal for an Indian to become intoxicated, and, if found so, he was liable to stripes. Many seemingly rigorous and oppressive laws were enacted by that State, to regulate and control those Indian tribes. The fanatic of the present day would weep over the misdeeds of those who have gone before us, and ask of Heaven to look in mercy on them! What weakness! what ridiculous sanctity! Sir, I have a deep and sincere regard for our Puritan forefathers; they have, for centuries, been the theme of eulogy and eloquence; but the restless, intermeddling, morbid philanthropist of this generation, denounces them as demons. It is the part of wisdom and of duty to regard our ancestors with respect, and to have a sacred regard for their character and their virtues. Every age and section of the world must be controlled and governed by the existing causes and circumstances which surround them; and he is a useless and troublesome fool, who disturbs society by his hypocritical whinings and cantings over the transgressions, as he supposes, of his progenitors, or the actings doings and of his contemporaries, because they value common sense, and totally disregard his sickly and wicked intermeddling with the affairs of others, and his absurd attempts to change the destiny of the world. I have no doubt Massachusetts acted towards the Indians according to the necessities of the times, the character, the feelings, and relations existing between them; yet, under these laws, and the influence of civilization, though designed for a different effect by the good people of that State, their Indian tribes have yielded to their destiny, and have been swept away from the face of the earth.

Virginia, one of whose representatives [Mr. WISE] has spoken with so much zeal on this subject, and who has travelled out of his way to comment severely on the legislation of Georgia, has long since extended her jurisdiction over the Indians; limited their rights of occupancy to fifty acres; and yet her representative seems to have forgotten it. His remarks shall receive my attention before I conclude.

New York, too—is it necessary for me to show an intelligent body what has been her legislation? Her statutes are known: she has extended and exercised her jurisdiction over the Indians in the fullest manner; and yet, from that State, Georgia has been denounced and rebuked. Sir, I assert it, and history will sustain me, that the Indians within the limits of Georgia have been treated, by that State, with as much liberality, justice, and humanity, as those of any other State. I will be excused for adverting briefly to the history of the past; I am necessarily driven into it from the course pursued towards the State which I represent; I shall, therefore, review a few of the statements made, and bring into contrast the conduct of Georgia with that of other States, as well in their course of policy as their moral justice towards the aborigines; for I claim to be the representative of a people whose moral character and reputation will not be subjected to reproach by a comparison with that of any other people.

Sir, as a Georgian, one who loves his State, and knows well the character of her people, I can but feel indignant at the unfounded charges which have been so profusely lavished upon her. What has she done to authorize these groundless, injurious, and calumnious charges? Has she pursued a policy different from other States? Where are those mighty tribes which were once seen on every hill and in every valley, roaming in the forest, and pursuing the game on every mountain top in the State of Massachusetts? Yes, sir, tell me where are the Passamaquodies, the Penobscots, and numerous other tribes? Swept away, gone, extinct; and how? Look to the statute books of Massachusetts, the history of her legislation, and the history of her people. There you can find the causes. Those who are weeping over the oppressions of the Cherokees, and asking Congress to abrogate the treaty, may find food for their sympathy; scenes over which to shed their tears; outrages and violence which may strike them with horror. But still, there were reasons in the then existing state of things to palliate, if not to justify all this. The friend of Christianity and civilization cannot sorrow for the change. It is true that a mighty change has taken place. The forest has disappeared; beautiful fields now gladden the eye; the wigwam and the savage are gone; the church and the Anglo-Saxon occupy their places. Civilization, with all its arts, beauties, pleasures, comforts, and glory, has spread its irresistible and predestinated power over the home of the red man; and under its influence he has dwindled away, without much change in his moral condition. It was his destiny. Let those who so anxiously feel for the Cherokees, and whose petitions have loaded your desk, remember the days when even the Puritans were driven by savage cruelties to the commission of deeds which the heart shudders at. That may admonish them of the indelicacy of speaking unkindly of other States or other people. Comparisons are unpleasant. It is not my object to disparage others, but to vindicate my native State. Let me advise the benevolent intermeddlers in the affairs of the South, and especially in the business of Georgia, to attend to their own affairs, and I am sure they can find employment for all their charity, benevolence, and sympathy. It is not with feelings of shame and reproach, but with pride and exultation, that I look back upon the long forbearance, the generous kindness, and the enlightened humanity, of my native State, in her intercourse with the Indians; and I hesitate not to say, that whenever a demand shall be really made, not for crocodile tears, but for real sympathy and friendship, nowhere on this broad continent will such demand be more promptly and liberally met than in the State of Georgia.

Will the gentlemen from Rhode Island, whose constituents have petitioned this body to rescue the Cherokees from the cupidity and avarice of Georgia, and to interpose and stay her oppressions towards that tribe, permit me to say that it is exceedingly strange that such censures should be inflicted upon a State by those who, certainly, are ignorant of many of the facts? These unwelcome allegations are too grave to let pass unnoticed; a proper spirit would dictate to those petitioners the moral atrocity of arraigning the character of a whole people, without a knowledge of the facts which would justify such uncharitableness.

Is there no reason why Rhode Island should exhibit a modest diffidence on this subject? Let her remember the destiny of that warlike and noble tribe, the Narragansetts, which once proudly traversed the hills and plains around that beautiful and capacious bay, between points Seconet and Judith; whose canoes alone, for centuries, floated on its otherwise undisturbed waters; a tribe which was the terror of the whites. Tell me not of the cruelties and oppressions of the Cherokees—of the patriotism of their white chiefs. Go and read the tale of your own Indian wars; the fate of noble Miantonimo, a chief of the Narragansett tribe; the treachery which produced his death; and inquire who abetted his destruction: then tell me whether there is more of effrontery or decency in forgetting these things, and making a crusade into Georgia in search of objects over which you may sympathize. The religious fanatic is more an object of pity than hatred; but the political agitator, who thus acts for mere party purpose or for individual notoriety, deserves the execrations of mankind. I censure not the people, under the protection of whose humanity and christian philanthropy this distinguished tribe have disappeared, like the cloud of the morning, before the sun; that same kindness, under the same circumstances, would again produce the same result. To preserve the race from extermination, you must plant them beyond the influence of the white man.

Look at Connecticut; yes, sir, that land of "steady habits," the theatre of many pleasing associations to me; she, too, has made sympathizing remonstrances against the Cherokee treaty, alleging fraud in the Government, and demanding of Congress to stay Georgia in her course and in her Indian policy, and to prevent the perpetration of further outrages on the Indians. The representatives of that State, I trust, will not consider me unkind in asking, "Where is the last of the Mohegans?" the early friends of the white man: the bones of their ancestors—the burial-grounds of their chiefs—where are they? Fertilizing the fields of the town of Norwich—where once was to be seen the grave of Uncas, the sachem, the honored friend and confiding ally of New England in her early days. To history I commit their memory. Already has "the last of the Mohegans," been commemorated in story. The annals of no State in this Union are more strongly marked with acts of harshness, oppression, and cruelty towards the Indians than that of Connecticut. Perhaps many palliatives for these apparent barbarities are to be found in the ferocious charater of the savage, and their unrelenting antipathies to our race. My object is not to charge the early settlers of that section with cruelty and inhumanity, but only to remind their descendants, their kinsmen of this day, who obtrusively and unkindly speak of the State of Georgia in terms of reproach, that the Cherokees have much cause for thankfulness that their residence has been in Georgia, and not in "the land of steady habits."

Mr. Chairman, were you not surprised when you heard the voice of New York? Why, her boldness amazed me. She cried aloud and spared not—Georgia. I speak of the petitions forwarded to this House, and now on the Clerk's desk; they speak of oppression, cruelty, and fraud. Let me turn the glass to her, and ask her to see herself as others see her, and to examine herself before she complains of the improprieties of others. Does she not perceive the great difference between precept and example? It must not be considered illiberal in me to inquire after the Senecas, one of the confederated tribes of the Six Nations. Will the representative from Buffalo tell me in what part of this Union that powerful confederacy now exists? What has been the destiny of that distinguished chief Red Jacket? whose honor and honesty were untouched and unsullied—now mouldering in his grave, and nothing left of the tribe but his portrait, now hanging in your Indian gallery. It would be useless to trace the destiny of the Tuscaroras, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, &c. a few remain as miserable monuments of the numerous tribes which, at one period, were the lords of the Empire State. Their hunting-grounds are now decorated with splendid cities, beautiful towns, plentiful fields, a dense, thriving, and intelligent population. Go and visit the western part of that State—the inheritance of these tribes: will philanthropy sicken and weep over the change, or mourn at the prosperity of our race? Who will sigh when he beholds the magnificent churches, temples of the true God, erected on soil once the heritage of a race that knew not christianity? The race has dwindled, but few remain—they are gone—"the places that knew them once shall know them no more forever." Who occupies their lands? and how was that occupancy obtained—by treaty or contract? If so, to whom was the consideration paid? Not to the Indians, for they are poor and dependent. And yet gentlemen from that State speak of the South, and especially Georgia, as being illiberal and inhuman; and insinuate, in lofty tones, that we are violators of justice and humanity. Is this kind? is it right? It is one of the devices of the world to conceal our own improprieties by diverting the attention to others; but it is the part of wisdom, and one of the obligations of duty, to strive at least to know one's self. An observance of this precept would have shielded Georgia from the attacks or censures of New York. Let her remember the moral of the "glass house."

I have, from a disposition to economise the time of the committee, passed, without comment, the legislation of several of the Eastern States, connected with their Indian relations. Many were fortunate and successful (from the rigor of their enactments, and not, I presume, from their extreme humanity and indulgence to the Indians) in being relieved at an early period from such troublesome neighbors. I shall, for the same reason, omit all the Middle States, not one of which, at this day, has even the remnant of a tribe remaining. Such has been the influence which their philanthropy and humane legislation have had, that the numerous tribes which once existed among them have vanished, disappeared, and are now forgotten: a beautiful commentary on the benevolence of those States, and the practical operation of their humane protection!

I will, Mr. Chairman, however, refer for a moment respectfully to the State of Pennsylvania; otherwise, one of her representatives from Philadelphia, and the numerous petitioners whose petitions he has laid before this committee, might consider me wanting in respect, if I were to pass unnoticed the Keystone State. I shall not be wanting in civility. Sir, that State, in 1681, was granted to William Penn by Charles the Second; it was rapidly settled with Friends and Quakers—certainly a peaceful and quiet people, deeply imbued with philanthropy, benevolence, and Christian forbearance, but still they were vastly perplexed, disturbed, and harrassed by numerous tribes of Indians, although their great leader established a friendly intercourse with the tribes, which lasted for seventy years. Will the gentleman from Philadelphia whose feelings during this debate have been wrought into madness, tell me where are those numerous tribes with whom that long and friendly intercouse was maintained? Will the peaceful and humane of Pennsylvania answer me? Have peace, brotherly love, Christian kindness, and benevolence, utterly exterminated them? One fact is certain: not a remnant, not a solitary man of the forest, remains within the limits of that State, to tell of the renown of his tribe, their deeds of war, or to point to the depositories of their chiefs and their warriors—none to speak, with the eloquence of nature, of their destiny and the cruelty of being forced from their homes and the graves of their ancestors. What has produced this state of things? The influence of that peaceful intercourse and the indulgent legislation of that State? As charity should begin at home, I can but regret that the good people of Pennsylvania would not confine themselves to a careful examination of their own relations and conduct to the Indian race; and, whilst they are pouring out their sympathies with such freedom over the Cherokees, they should be reminded that, if they had been generous in the use of it at home, so much would not have been on hand to supply foreign markets, when neither religion nor justice requires it. Charity is a domestic article, useful at home, and should never be exported except under extraordinary circumstances. It is deeply humiliating to observe the character of man, the tendencies of his nature. A better man than William Penn scarcely ever lived; his whole life was marked by strong virtues, and was influenced by strong common sense; he always chose the lesser evil; he had more than the suavity of the present day; none of its false philanthropy—he lived for his day. Rum he knew to be the bane of the savage; he, therefore, denied it to them: land he knew to be the object of his people; he, therefore, obtained it for them: for have it they must—to obtain it peaceably was desirable. To succeed, he found rum an irresistible instrument, filled with arguments strong and overwhelming; he, therefore, it is said, permitted it to be given to the chiefs on treaty-making days. It was better thus to control the ignorance of the savage by that means, than to have resorted to physical force. Abstract and metaphysical morality, perhaps, may deny the position; it is not my business to vindicate it.

There are many incidents in the history of this delightful region which will serve to amuse, whilst they may convince, those who have been so free in their attacks on others, of the dangers of investigation to themselves. Under the treaties made at an early day, in Pennsylvania, lands were measured by the step: our friends, it is said, in the most peaceful manner, always engaged for that service a long-legged man, who could step far; sometimes lines were to be prescribed by a day's walk; and it is worthy of remark, that among the ancestors of our steady and circumspect friends a man was found who went his ninety-five miles in a day, to the utter amazement of the Indians! Was this a fraud? The county of Chester, adjoining the city of Philadelphia, and one of the most fertile counties in the State, was obtained for a keg of Jamestown tobacco. This incident belongs to history; I do not allude to it for the purpose of impugning the honesty of that day—not at all; it was in perfect accordance with the policy of the times. In imitation of such contracts and transactions have grown all our treaties with the Indians; we have used them as means to do that which would otherwise have been done by power. The Cherokee treaty, which has been so violently abused, has more to recommend and sustain it than any treaty which I have examined. I speak of the consideration to be paid; the persons who are to receive it; the support they are to obtain; and the vast and lasting benefits the Indians are to secure by it. Rum had no instrumentality in procuring it; nor is tobacco any part of the consideration. Let no man cry fraud, and abuse our people for their intercourse with the Indians. It is needless to attempt concealment on the subject—the General Government and the State Governments have treated the Indians as children; seduced them by presents, by kindness, and by such means as would procure the object with the least difficulty, and without violence. Who believes that, if the aborigines of this country had stubbornly and pertinaciously refused to treat or sell the lands to our race, we would not have taken them? I repeat, that our policy has been, under the cover of treaties and contracts, to do that which would have been, and might rightfully have been done, without them. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has actually shed tears in speaking of the Cherokees, not to cry any more for them, and to take consolation, for they are protected by the laws of the States, are secure in their property, and have more wealth than the same number of people in any portion of the Union. And, let me ask him, when he again feels either in a weeping mood, or indignant at the injustice committed against the Indians, and deals in abuse and denunciation, to commence at home, then travel South, and I assure him, when he reaches Georgia, his stock, unless a very large one, will be all exhausted.

Sir, I will notice the fate of the Indians in one other State only, and that purely for the gratification of the gentleman from that State (Mr. WISE) who has entered into this race with his "bridle off," and whose leaps and charges shall not be forgotten. Look to the history of the Old Dominion, and see what were the three greatest calamities she had to contend with when she was young and modest, and had no sons capable of "castigating a State." That informs us that the colonists of Virginia encountered many difficulties, among the most prominent of which were sickness, famine, and wars with the Indians. Now, sir, I trust sickness has been greatly mitigated in its terrors, from the increase of intelligence; famine, by the success of agriculture, and the absence of the Indians, is banished. But that third difficulty—what has become of those Indians? the terror of "young Virginia?" Gone! Will the gentleman say where? These mighty tribes, reduced to a wretched and forlorn condition, dwindled down to some forty or fifty in number, under the influence of your laws; and the few now remaining, in continuation of the custom established by the tribes in their better days, annually pay their respects to the Governor of Virginia, and present him with ducks and fish, more in commemoration of their existence than as a tribute to the power which has innocently caused the desolation of their race. Sir, long may this poor remnant live; and perhaps I may yet see the day when the gentleman from Virginia, "ex officio," may be the beneficiary and recipient of these ducks and fish—the offering of friendship to the power that smote them, by that last of the warlike tribes, once the scourge of Virginia. Yet the laws of that State controlling those people were marked by humanity, and an absence of all cruelty—a liberal spirit breathing throughout. But still these nations seem no less to vanish. It seems to be the doom of this race to pass away and be forgotten; the efforts of civilization cannot arrest it. The subject is one on which the philanthropist and philosopher may speculate, over which christian benevolence may weep, and bid us acknowledge, from every valley we pass, and every lofty mountain we ascend, the power, the wisdom, and the mystery of the ways of Providence.

Thus, sir, I have rapidly and very slightly sketched the policy of several of the States of this Union, and the consequences of that policy in its influence over the aborigines of this country; and this brings me to that of Georgia, and the course she has pursued—a course, too, be it remembered, made necessary, at least, by attempting to carry out the policy of this Government. The policy of that State shall be defended, and her character vindicated from the aspersion cast upon it. With this object I shall proceed, and shall do so briefly, as a compensation for that attention and patience which have been so kindly extended to me.

At the adoption of the Federal Constitution, (have gentlemen forgotten it?) Georgia comprehended all the territory which now constitutes three large States of this confederacy, and held the proprietary control thereof to the year 1802. To that period the now States of Alabama and Mississippi belonged to Georgia, and were within the limits of her charter; and the commission, under the kingdom of Great Britain, to James Wright, bearing date "on the 20th of January, 1764, constituting and appointing him to be captain-general and governor-in-chief in and over the colony of Georgia; bounded on the north by the most northern stream of a river, there commonly called Savannah, as far as the head of said river; and from thence westward as far as our territories extend; on the east, by the seacoast, from the said river Savannah, to the most southern stream of a certain other river, called St. Mary's, including all islands within twenty leagues of the coast, lying between the said rivers Savannah and St. Mary's, as far as the head thereof; and from thence westward, as far as our territories extend, by the north boundary line of our provinces of East and West Florida;" and, also, according to the boundaries set forth in the Constitution of the State of Georgia. She, however, for wise and patriotic purposes, by the compact of 1802, ceded to the United States the whole of the territory within the limits of Alabama and Mississippi, as will be seen by the first article of said compact, which is in these words:

"The State of Georgia cedes to the United States all the right, title, and claim, which said State has to jurisdiction and soil of the lands situated within the boundaries of the United States, south of the State of Tennessee, and west of a line beginning on the western bank of the Chattahoochie river, where the same crosses the boundary line between the United States and Spain; running thence up the said river Chattahoochie, and along the western bank thereof, to the great bend thereof, next above the place where a certain creek or river, called 'Uchee' (being the first considerable stream on the western side above the Cussetas and Coweta towns) empties into the said Chattahoochie river; thence a direct line to Nickaguck, on the Tennessee river; thence crossing the said last mentioned river; and thence running up the said Tennessee river, and along the western bank thereof, to the southern boundary line of the State of Tennessee," &c.

In consideration of which, the United States was to perform certain things, as will be seen by reference to the articles of cession and agreement; and, especially, "that the United States shall, at their own expense, extinguish, for the use of Georgia, as early as the same can be peaceably obtained, on reasonable terms, the Indian title," &c. to all the lands in their occupancy within the limits of Georgia. Did this compact change any of the constitutional powers of the State, and her right of jurisdiction over the territory not ceded to the United States, but retained? Certainly not. She yielded nothing within her retained limits; her title to, and authority over, those limits, were full and complete.

But, should any doubt exist on this position, the articles of cession will remove it. The 2d article is in these words: "The United States accept the cession above mentioned, and on the conditions therein expressed; and they cede to the State of Georgia whatever claim, right, or title they may have to the jurisdiction or soil of any lands," &c. being within the State. The United States (as a previous part of my argument, I trust, has shown) had no jurisdiction within any of the States; and the only powers that she can exercise within a State are delegated by the Constitution, and not by virtue of any inherent sovereign power; but still, if it were otherwise, the 2d article has determined that power, so far as it could be determined by a compact.

Independent of the articles of cession, Georgia has the same jurisdiction, and the same power over her territory, and the Indians thereon, which other States possess; with the additional force of the solemn recognition, that by the compact of 1802 the United States ceded to Georgia "whatever claim, right, or title to the jurisdiction," &c. she had within the State of Georgia. If she held not the jurisdiction before, she does now.

The intents and objects of the compact of 1802 were particularly to relieve Georgia from the payment of any consideration which might be necessary to satisfy the Indians for their mere right of occupancy, although, strictly, they are tenants at will. The State, at any time, had the power to extinguish the Indian right by contract, or in any other form her judgment and sense of justice might dictate. Her power over the Indian was as unlimited as over the white citizen. If the State cannot exercise that power, what political power can be exercised according to the forms of our Government?

When the compact was confirmed, which was in April, 1802, two tribes of Indians, warlike and numerous, were within the State of Georgia—the Creeks and Cherokees. They were in the occupancy of nearly one half of the whole State, and of the most fertile and desirable lands. The United States was bound to remove them: she had given her obligation to do so; she had pledged her faith to do it. Justice and equity required a punctual fulfilment of the engagement. What has been the history of this transaction? Many years were suffered to pass without much effort to discharge this obligation—at least no strong manifestation of a sincere desire to do it. In 1808 an opportunity was presented to the General Government to fulfil the convention with Georgia, to the extent of the Cherokee possessions. She did not embrace it, for causes which were not then satisfactory to the State.

Since the articles of cession, and whilst the strongest legal and moral obligations were constantly pressing the United States to the discharge of her stipulations with Georgia, she has obtained, by Indian treaties, millions on millions of acres of land. State after State has been organized and admitted into the Union—the population of several of them now far exceeds that of Georgia. Yea, sir—and I almost blush for the faithlessness of this Government when I mention it—she has obtained, by treaty, from the Indians, every acre of land in the now States of Alabama and Mississippi; the very lands ceded by Georgia to the United States, in consideration that she should extinguish the occupant right in that State.

These States, the daughters of Georgia, though not so extensive in territory as their mother, have outstripped her in production; and an Indian does not own, within either State, an acre of land, except as reservee. An obligor who should thus act towards his obligee would be pronounced faithless and unjust. A debtor who would thus disregard the rights of his creditor would forfeit his character as an honest man. Yet Georgia has been thus treated for more than thirty years; and now she is accused of rashness, intemperate zeal, and excessive importunity, in pressing the fulfilment of the compact.

Why did not this Government, instead of obtaining immense bodies of land in the West, honestly discharge her obligations to Georgia? Why did she not extinguish the occupant right in Georgia, instead of Alabama and Mississippi? The answer is obvious—the lands in Georgia, if obtained, went to that State; the other belonged to the General Government. Had the interest been reversed, the Indians within Georgia would long since have be n peaceably removed.

This is not mere assertion: I will demonstrate it In 1817, a treaty was negotiated by Andrew Jackson, (late President,) Joseph McMinn, (formerly Governor of Tennessee,) and General David Meriwether, as commissioners on the part of the United States; and the chiefs, headmen, and warriors of the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi, and the deputies of those on the Arkansas river. This treaty was most fairly obtained, without the least imputation of fraud from any quarter, and was unanimously ratified by the Senate of the United States; by which Georgia would have acquired nearly all the lands in the occupancy of the Cherokee tribe within her territorial limits, and the obligations of the United States would have been fulfilled.

Mr. Chairman, the treatment of my State in relation to this very treaty, was so extraordinary, unjust, and unfaithful, that I feel constrained to ask a few moments' indulgence, in presenting the facts to this body, that the State I represent shall be vindicated, and the public mind disabused of the misapprehensions so extensively prevailing. Let me read to the committee the preamble to the treaty of 1817, and I ask particular attention to it: (6 vol. Laws of the United States, p. 702.)

Whereas, in the autumn of the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, a deputation from the upper and lower Cherokee towns, duly authorized by their nation, went on to the city of Washington—the first named to declare to the President of the United States their anxious desire to engage in the pursuits of agriculture and civilized life in the country they then occupied, and to make known to the President of the United States the impracticability of inducing the nation at large to do this, and to request the establishment of a division line between the upper and lower towns, so as to include all the waters of the Hiwassee river to the upper town; that by thus contracting their society within narrow limits, they proposed to begin the establishment of fixed laws and a regular Government; the deputies from the lower towns to make known their desire to continue the hunter life, and also the scarcity of game where they then lived, and under those circumstances their wish to remove across the Mississippi river on some vacant lands of the United States: And whereas, the President of the United States, after maturely considering the petitions of both parties, on the 9th day of January, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and nine, including other subjects, answered those petitions as follows:

"The United States my children, are the friends of both parties, and, as far as can be reasonably asked, they are willing to satisfy the wishes of both. Those who remain, may be assured of our patronage, our aid and good neighborhood. Those who wish to remove, are permitted to send an exploring party to reconnoitre the country on the waters of the Arkansas and White rivers, and the higher up the better, as they will be the longer unapproached by our settlements, which will begin at the mouths of those rivers. The regular districts of the Government of St. Louis are already laid off to the St. Francis.

"When this party shall have found a tract of country suiting the emigrants, and not claimed by other Indians, we will arrange with them and you the exchange of that for a just portion of the country they leave, and to a part of which, proportioned to their numbers, they have a right. Every aid towards their removal, and what will be necessary for them there, will then be freely administered to them; and when established in their new settlements, we shall still consider them as our children, give them the benefit of exchanging their peltries for what they will want at our factories, and always hold them firmly by the hand:"

And whereas the Cherokees, relying on the promises of the President of the United States, as above recited, did explore the country on the west side of the Mississippi, and made choice of the country on the Arkansas and White rivers, and settled themselves down upon the United States lands, to which no other tribe of Indians have any just claim, and have duly notified the President of the United States thereof, and of their anxious desire for the full and complete ratification of his promise, and to that end, as notified by the President of the United States, have sent on their agents with full powers to execute a treaty, relinquishing to the United States all the right, title, and interest to all lands of right to them belonging, as part of the Cherokee nation, which they have left, and which they are about to leave, proportioned to their numbers, including, with those now on the Arkansas, those who are about to remove thither, and to a portion of which they have an equal right, agreeably to their numbers.

The "lower towns," who thus made known their desire, in the year 1808, to continue the hunter-life, and also the scarcity of game where they then lived, and their wish, under those circumstances, to remove across the Mississippi river, on some vacant land of the United States, were chiefly that portion of the Cherokee tribe who were in the occupancy of the lands which the United States were to obtain for Georgia. Notwithstanding this disposition of the Indians to surrender their lands as early as 1808, the United States did not embrace it, but, on the contrary, abandoned her duty, and made no effort to obtain the land until this treaty of 1817, which extinguished the occupant right of the Cherokee Indians to nearly all the lands contemplated by the compact of 1802. Georgia now thought her just rights were secured; and that soon her forests would become fields, and her population increase. Notwithstanding these just expectations, this treaty of 1817, against which no allegation had been made of fraud or injustice, unless it was considered a fraud in the United States to comply with her contract, and to have done an act of justice to Georgia, was, by articles of convention made between John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, being specially authorized therefor by the President of the United States, and the chiefs and headmen of the Cherokee nation of Indians, duly authorized and empowered by said nation, at the city of Washington, on the 27th February, 1819, readjusted, and, so far as the interest of Georgia was involved, measurably abrogated, and, on its very face, virtually declared that the United States did not intend to comply with the articles which she was solemnly pledged to fulfil. Sir, let me read to the committee the preamble of this treaty:

Whereas a greater part of the Cherokee nation have expressed an earnest desire to remain on this side of the Mississippi, and being desirous, in order to commence those measures which they deem necessary to the civilization and preservation of their nation, that the treaty between the United States and them, signed the eighth of July, eighteen hundred and seventeen, might, without further delay, or the trouble or expense of taking the census, as stipulated in the said treaty, be finally adjusted, have offered to cede to the United States a tract of country at least as extensive as that which they probably are entitled to under its provisions, the contracting parties have agreed to and conclude the following articles.

Thus, by this treaty, arrangements are made, and measures adopted, by which the Indians were to remain east of the Mississippi, within the limits of Georgia; and the treaty of 1817 to be set aside, in violation of the vested rights of Georgia under that treaty, and with a reckless disregard of the obligations of the compact. By this treaty of 1819, the Cherokee nation ceded to the United States all of their lands lying north and east of the following lines, viz:

Beginning on the Tennessee river, at the point where the Cherokee boundary with Madison county, in the Alabama Territory, joins the same; thence, along the main channel of said river, to the mouth of the Hiwassee; thence, along its main channel, to the first hill which closes in on said river, about two miles above Hiwassee old town; thence, along the ridge which divides the waters of the Hiwassee and Little Tellico, to the Tennessee river, at Talassee; thence, along the main channel, to the junction of the Cowee and Nanteyalee; thence, along the ridge in the fork of said river, to the top of the blue ridge; thence, along the blue ridge, to the Unicoy turnpike road; thence, by a straight line, to the nearest main source of the Chestatee; thence, along its main channel, to the Chattahoochie; and thence, to the Creek boundary.

I am thus particular, Mr. Chairman, to show the treatment Georgia has received; to present to the people of the Union the injustice she has suffered, the patience she has exhibited, the christian forbearance which has marked her submission amidst the embarrassing difficulties and disappointments which this Government caused by its neglect of solemn engagements. Remember, in 1817 our rights were partially regarded, and our territory obtained. In 1819 our rights divested, our prospects blighted; the Indians, instead of being removed, were arranging for permanently remaining, and this Government approving these arrangements; and if Georgia utters a complaint, files a protest, or uses that "ultimato ratio" of some politicians, remonstrance, she is charged with violence, cruelty, and hatred to the Indians. Such conduct is insulting to the feelings of every Georgian, disreputable to the General Government. We have paid millions for the mere obligation to extinguish the Indian titles. Look at the sales of public lands in the States of Alabama and Mississippi. You have received the proceeds; and how have you compensated Georgia for all this? Have you discharged your obligations? have you acted in good faith? No, sir; to vindicate yourself as a Goverament, and as an obligor, you have slandered your creditor; when she has requested payment, you speak of her importunities. Sir, the whole conduct of this Government towards Georgia, on this transaction, has been faithless and dilatory. Why has it been so? Mere avarice; a desire to obtain for herself—to procure millions, for her own use, by neglect of her obligations to us.

To add to all this, in making this treaty of 1819 and others, you violate the compact, by placing it out of the power of the Government to discharge it; you guaranty in fee simple six hundred and forty acres to each head of an Indian family who reside within the ceded territory, who choose to become citizens of the United States, &c. Is this extinguishing the Indian occupant rights for the use of Georgia? No, sir, for the use of the Indian—he or she is to have the absolute fee, and the consequent right of individual alienation or sale to whom he or she pleases. And yet, we are told, Georgia is too clamorous.

Mr. Chairman, I ask of gentlemen who have so frequently expressed themselves unkindly, if they are not convinced of the injustice of their censure? In 1808, the Cherokees in Georgia were anxious for a treaty; the Government, perhaps, was too much involved in foreign difficulties and embargoes to attend to such matters: we did not protest at that time—no, sir, not even remonstrate. Georgia saw the position of the nation, and patriotically awaited a more favorable condition of the country; she indulged her debtor. War, in the mean time, was declared, and all its evils, and perils, and sacrifices freely encountered, and by no State more freely than by Georgia. Peace was restored; unusual prosperity sprung up; the Government was basking in a glorious sunshine; and Georgia, who had contributed her share in the struggle, and severely earned her proportion of the fame, asked once more, in 1816, that the compact of 1802 should be executed. Her request was responded to, and she saw, as she supposed, an end of this exciting controversy. But, unfortunately, she was mistaken; soon she heard of local jealousies—Carolina and Georgia feeling; the great men to which the war had given birth began to aspire; individual jealously commenced taking root; "trifles light as air" soon increased the flame into a blaze: the end of all this has been an injury to the entire South. We then heard of the duty the Government owed to itself to prepare for the payment of the public debt incurred by the war; it was a patriotic object, and a praiseworthy suggestion, and should have been done, but not at the expense of the faith of the General Government to Georgia. To disencumber the Government of her debt, taxes had been increased by the tariff of 1816; lands were obtained for the purpose of sale, so that the proceeds might go into the treasury of the Union. The treaty of 1817 obtained lands for Georgia, for which the General Government had to expend, not receive; hence the modifications of the treaty of 1817 by the one made at Washington city, 1819, by which Georgia lost her rights, and the rich and fertile lands of Tennessee and Alabama were obtained, sold, and the proceeds applied, in payment of the public and other debts of this Government. To all this, in 1819, Georgia remonstrated and submitted—injustice increasing, as it always does, by submission to it. The spirit of the State, under the auspices of the fearless, able, and honest Troup, threw her a step beyond this glorious remedy of remonstrance—upon the self-protecting and conservative remedy of State interposition—call it by what name you please—none better than nullification.

Since the year 1819, we have been continually told that no treaty could be obtained on peaceable and reasonable terms. And why, sir? Because the treaty of that year indicated to the Indians a willingness on the part of the Government that their location should be permanent; that the compact should not be enforced: but, above all, a new influence and a moral power had arisen amongst the Cherokees, which began then, and has ever since governed that tribe; white men, many of them foreigners, who had taken Indian wives, were numerous, and by their alliances soon had great influence. Their children grew up, many half-breeds, one-fourth and eighth Indians, were well educated; parents, who through their intelligence and cunning had become rich, and were able to educate their children. This class grew into a complete aristocracy; having all the wealth, the intelligence, and energy, impelled by the great ruling motives of human action, avarice and ambition, soon took the entire control of the tribe. No people on earth exhibited distinctions in society more completely aristocratic. Finally, these mixed men became the mind of the tribe—completely despotic. The annuities due the people by this Government, and the whole of their finances, soon became an object of systematic and legalized plunder. To give this system a patriotic coloring, a Republican form of Government must be instituted. In 1828 these white men, half-breeds, &c. actually formed a written Constitution, very much in spirit like the Constitutions of the States. They had legislative, executive, and judicial departments. The members of council, their chief executive, and their various circuits, judges, clerks, sheriffs, &c. were filled—with whom, sir? Your Rosses, Gunters, Taylors, Hickses, Martins, Fields, Bushyheads, &c.; men of sense and cunning, who received salaries just in proportion to the annuities and other receipts. There were but few of your Sleeping Rabbits, Going Snakes, and Standing Turkeys, whole bloods, who held office or received salaries. No, sir, such know nothing of the frauds in Governmental appropriations, and the other arts of the white man. They know nothing of the annuities or of their disposition; like all other full-blooded Indians, they are ignorant.

This Government went into operation as independent and sovereign, exercising civil and criminal jurisdiction.

The question here presented is important, and involves directly and vitally the doctrine of State rights. Had Georgia the right to extend her jurisdiction over the Cherokees, and abolish this independent and sovereign Government of theirs? Most clearly; "for, by the Revolution, the duties as well as the powers of Government devolved on the people of the State. It is admitted that among the latter were comprehended the transcendent powers of Parliament, as well as those of the Executive Department."—4 Wheaton, 451, case of Dartmouth College vs. Woodward. In the case of Buckner vs. Findley, 2 Peters, 591, the same principle, it is decided, applies to the States; "for though they form a confederated Government, yet the several States retain their individual sovereignties, and, with respect to their municipal regulations, are to each other foreign." "These powers of Government [in the language of Judge Baldwin] which thus devolved on Georgia by the Revolution, over her whole territory, are unimpaired by any surrender of her territorial jurisdiction, by the old confederation, or the new Constitution, as there was in both an express saving, as well as by the tenth article of the amendments.

"But if any passed to the United States by either, they were retroceded by the convention of 1802. Her jurisdiction over the territory in question is as supreme as that of Congress over what the nation has acquired by cession from the States or treaties with foreign powers, combining the rights of the State and General Government. Within her boundaries there can be no other nation, community, or sovereign power, which this department can judicially recognise as a foreign state, capable of demanding or claiming our interposition, so as to enable them to exercise a jurisdiction incompatible with a sovereignty in Georgia, which has been recognised by the Constitution and every department of this Government acting under it." "Indian sovereignty cannot be roused from its long slumber, and awakened into action by our fiat. I find no acknowledgment of it by the legislative or executive power." The right of the State being established, it then becomes a question of expediency, depending entirely on the legislative will of Georgia, whether the Cherokee Government should be abolished, and the laws of the State extended over the Indians.

Georgia delayed the exercise of this power; she felt unwilling to do any act which might change the habits of the Indians, or limit them in their pursuits; she determined to forbear as long as the Cherokee people were capable of self-government, according to their habits and customs. Many years ago the authorities of Georgia saw the approaching difficulties—the evils that were accumulating. That country, notwithstanding your intercourse laws, became the home of white men; foreigners from every part of Europe, stragglers from all parts of the Union, gathered there. They saw a good prospect for influence and speculation. These men became connected with the Indians. The father of John Ross was a Scotchman by birth, married a Cherokee, settled himself among them, enjoyed all the rights of the tribe, accumulated property within the limits of Georgia, without discharging a single duty to the State as a citizen, and denying all allegiance and obedience to her, as many others did. The consequence was, large families of half-breeds grew up intelligent and well-educated men. Such men as Ross, Vann, Martin, Gunter, Rogers, and hundreds of others, may be considered, from their complexion, white men, not Indians. They claim to be Indians, with the intelligence and color of white men. This class of the Cherokee people have become very wealthy—and how? By the advantages which education and intelligence give over ignorance, combined with the advantage of living without taxation of any kind. The proceeds of labor, the annuities, and the means generally of the tribe, found their way into the pockets of these men. These white men, who owed no allegiance and paid no taxes to the United States or Georgia, discharged not a single civil duty, fought no battles, and were in fact exempt from all legal responsibility, on the soil which of right belonged to the State. They had become "squatters" on the best lands, and had large plantations, with large numbers of slaves and full-blooded Indians cultivating them, because they had married Indians, half-blooded, with a fourth or an eighth; and their children's children, almost purely white, continuing the same schemes. These are the "Cherokees" who have interfered to prevent the removal of the "Indians," who have been anxious (when these half-breeds and whites did not oppose) since the year 1808, to go west of the Mississippi. These men—Indians in nothing but the name, not so in color or in character—would not willingly treat with the United States unless they derived all the advantages, as they now have all the power; and for the last twenty five years, whenever a treaty has been effected, it has been through the influence of these men, who made the treaty, so that they might be profited by it. These are facts known to every Georgian and Tennessean near the Indian territory; hence it is that any treaty giving all the heads of Indian families equal benefits and proportions of the money paid, will be opposed by such men as have ruled that unfortunate people for many years. If the five millions had been given to "the Government" of the nation, which is John Ross and his friends, instead of the common Indians, &c. there would have been been but little dissatisfaction.

It has been urged that it was not only beyond the constitutional authority, but inexpedient, for the State to extend her civil and criminal jurisdiction over the Cherokees, and thereby abolish their organization. This is an extraordinary mistake for gentlemen of intelligence to make, when it is notorious that the old States of the Union, and nearly every new State, has done the same; and for violations of the laws thus extended, Indians have been hung, confined in the penitentiaries, and punished otherwise by many of the States of this Union. But still it is nevertheless wrong, in the opinion of certain gentlemen, for Georgia to do so.

This independent Indian Government, exercising all the powers and franchises of an independent sovereignty, enacted laws which a sovereign power alone had a right to enforce; all this, too, in the midst of a State—one of the States of the Union which aided in the formation of this General Government, and whose sole and complete sovereignty, within her chartered limits, was undoubted and unquestionable. Sir, I ask what State has submitted, or would submit, to such assumptions of power and jurisdiction over her territory? None, sir.

But this is not all; our citizens were murdered within this Cherokee jurisdiction—the traveller, innocent and unsuspected, waylaid and assassinated—robbed of his property—insulted and assaulted by Indians and white men, claiming to be citizens of the sovereign State of Cherokee; and the only redress that could be invoked, was from a pretended independent sovereignty, independent of Georgia, but within her limits. At the time this new State was formed, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] was President of the United States. In his message to Congress in 1828, whilst speaking of our Indian relations, and especially of their pretensions to sovereignty within the States, he says: "We have unexpectedly found them (the Indians) claiming to be independent of ours, and rivals of sovereignty within the territories of the members of this Union. This state of things requires that a remedy should be provided—a remedy, which, while it may secure to the members of our confederation their rights of sovereignty and soil," &c.

Yes, sir, these are the views of Mr. Adams on this subject. He says "this state of things requires a remedy. What political power could apply the remedy? Who had the right of abolishing this Cherokee independent sovereignty within the limits of Georgia? Why, the State of Georgia, which alone had the right of sovereignty and supreme jurisdiction, and which was coextensive with her chartered limits; and she did so.

Mr. Chairman, there were other causes demanding of Georgia this extension of her laws—additional circumstances which urged the adoption of that measure. She was cut off, by the territory in the occupancy of the Cherokees, entirely from Tennessee, and parts of the States of North Carolina and Alabama; so that between Tennessee and Georgia, there was a distance through the Indian settlements of about one hundred and twenty-five miles. The mother, whose residence was in Georgia, who desired to visit her daughter, who resided in Tennessee, could not enjoy that happiness, in consequence of apprehensions of being outraged in her feelings, if not endangered in her person, in passing through the Indian territory, by the Indians or the profligate whites who had taken refuge there. Facilities for intercourse between the States were not permitted; no roads of any kind could be constructed; no bridges erected; no work of any kind carried on by the State to facilitate commercial or other intercourse. Georgia, thus deprived of the direct trade from the West, droves of horses, mules, and hogs, going to Georgia for sale, were compelled to travel a great distance out of a direct route, to avoid the Indian country, and procure grain for their stock; and the same causes impeded the transportation of merchandise from our Atlantic cities. All this operated severely on the Georgians, who purchased from the western tradesman his stock, for the consumer had to pay the increased expenses of the circuitous route to market; all this because the Cherokees claimed the unrestricted right to the country. But, in addition, the gold mines were discovered in that section of Georgia,

What was the consequence? Why, sir, from every section of the United States, and from all parts of Europe too, people began to gather there; a more heterogeneous population were never congregated any where; almost every nation and every tongue were seen and heard; they were subject to no law that could be executed under the circumstances then existing; hence outrages were constantly committed there, in violation both of the laws of God and man. The country not being organized, that region was overrun with dissolute foreigners and others, who had taken possession of the gold region without the semblance of authority, and outraged all the rights of the State. These intruders tore up the land in search of gold, to an alarming extent, and exercised all the rights of absolute owners, so far as the use of the soil was involved, committed every trespass, and were frequently on the eve of civil commotion among themselves. The laws of Georgia could not then be fully executed, because there were not citizens settled within the country to aid in their execution.

In this state of things, the General Government attempted the execution of the "intercourse law," and sent a military force into the country, under the command of a Federal officer; and, sir, what was the result? A ridiculous farce. Such were the numbers and power of these individuals, that they were not easily alarmed; they had strength enough to defy the Federal forces; but they did not desire to fight, but preferred laughing at you. Some were arrested because they had violated the intercourse law, but were discharged by habeas corpus, on the ground that the State of Georgia had jurisdiction over her territorial limits, and the General Government no authority within them. The State finally sent into the country a guard—a power neither military nor civil, but partaking of both. That, too, failed of success.

Let me ask, was a sovereign State to permit such disorganization? a State which, in all her relations, in the language of our own Troup, (whose "political character and principles are admired by his friends, and respected by his enemies,") "has evinced a sincere desire to harmonize with the Union; to maintain peace and tranquillity with the Indians, until longer forbearance would cease to be a virtue; in fact, to lend ourselves, as we have always done, heart and hand, to the support of every wise and virtuous administration of the General Government? Let it be remembered that Georgia has a deep state in the prompt decision of the present question. Of all the old States, Georgia is the only one whose political organization is incomplete; her civil polity is deranged; her military force cannot be reduced to systematic order and subordination; the extent of her actual resources cannot be counted; the great work of internal improvement is suspended; and all because Georgia is not in the possession of her vacant territory; a territory waste and profitless to the Indians; profitless to the United States; but in the possession of the rightful owner, a resource of strength, of revenue, and of union." This was the language of that statesman and patriot, George M. Troup.

Sir, until Georgia exercised her jurisdiction, and abolished this Cherokee sovereignty, she could not proceed in the great work of internal improvement. To gratify the hypocritical sanctity of designing politicians, and the mistaken zeal of religious fanaticism, or the selfish designs of John Ross, must Georgia suspend the great work of uniting by railroad the western waters with the Atlantic, and thereby opening a great highway for western productions and western trade direct to our seaports of the South?

To remedy all these evils, and secure peace and subordination, what could the State do? Just what she has done, sir, and nothing else—extend her laws over the country; exercise her criminal and civil jurisdiction; and this she did in 1829, but to go into operation in June, 1830; which law was necessary to the protection of the Indians, the soil in their occupancy, and the character and rights of the State.

But it has been said that Georgia extended not only her laws over the country, but also took possession of the soil. Yes, sir, she did, reserving the occupancy of the Indians to a very ample extent, greater than any other State; and I invite a comparison. If others have been kind, we have been kinder; if they were liberal, we have been more so.

How could the civil authority of the State be enforced, unless the country was organized into counties, and officers residing in them to carry out and execute those laws? It was the only course, better than a military government, to preserve the peace of the country. Hence the formation of counties; their organization and settlement by a population, intelligent, obedient to the law, men of character and respectability. I submit to the country the legislation of Georgia, and ask an honest comparison with the legislation of any other State. Georgia has truly subserved the cause of humanity and justice in thesteps she has taken to protect herself, the Indians, and her citizens.

I have often had cause of excitement, if not of resentment on this subject. I feel it due to the State I represent, and to myself, in all sincerity and truth, and in a spirit very different from vain boasting, to say to such gentlemen as have determined to go against this bill, and the appropriations in it intended to carry into execution the Cherokee treaty, and to sustain a military force in the Cherokee country, to prevent hostilities, and to protect the lives of our citizens, that if they are now unwilling to do so, and are not satisfied that Georgia has been justified in her course, and that you intend to maintain Ross and his party against the treaty, and leave that State to protect herself, say so. And if this be your object, for one, I will say, withdraw your Federal troops, recall your legions, declare that this Government will not fulfil the compact of 1802, notwithstanding her long deferred obligations. Let these things be done, and my life on it, sir, Georgia will carry out the treaty, and assert all her rights under the compact of 1802. Then, sir, let the gentleman from Virginia come, at the head of an army, "to castigate the State;" I promise him that he will be met the first footprint that he makes on the soil of Georgia; and I shall be greatly mistaken if he does not find it much easier and more pleasant to talk here in these walls of castigating a State, than to do it. Georgia has not asked you to throw your protection around her; she has asked you to carry out your treaty, honestly to fulfil your compact, to remove the Indians, to send a force to do it, and prevent them from committing depredations on our citizens. That State understands her rights, and can protect her citizens. But she desires to rid herself of the Indians in her borders without the shedding of blood. In parting with these neighbors she desires to do it in peace; and if she does not, it will be the fault of this Government. But gentlemen on this floor, who reside more than a thousand miles off, and many of whom can scarcely tell how their neighbors five miles from them manage their domestics or children, boldly and unhesitatingly pronounce judgment on the people of Georgia, and claim to direct their legislation and their conduct, and to judge of the propriety of their measures. This is not a question to be used for party purposes; the rights of Georgia and the lives of her people are not to be weighed by electioneering balances; such considerations deserve and will receive the contempt of every honest man. All the tendencies of this discussion, as conducted by gentlemen in opposition to these appropriations, are to inflame the Indians; and if Ross and his associates who are now in the gallery, were not sensible men, war and bloodshed would be the inevitable consequence. It is well that the common Indian, whose nature is revengeful, has not heard this debate; nothing could be better calculated to inflame him. It is a subject that, if discussed, should be done with calmness, and with a view to the peace and safety of our citizens and the Indians.

But what were those laws which Georgia extended over the Indians? They were the same which operated upon her own citizens; for crime, the punishment the same for the same offence; in their contracts they are cautiously protected—wisely so.

To close this review, I invite gentlemen east or west, north or south, of Georgia, to point to a single case where an Indian has been subjected to cruelty or an arbitrary punishment. On the contrary, they have been protected, protected by the law, and by a kind and generous people, and none are more so than the citizens of the Cherokee counties. Some of the present generation may condemn, but the time will come when the policy and conduct of Georgia and her people will be appreciated by all; and whenever that time arrives, I do not doubt that the unanimous opinion of all unprejudiced minds will be, that in the necessary exercise of her constitutional powers, the policy of the State has been characterized by a forbearing kindness and enlightened humanity towards a powerless remnant of an unfortunate race.

Mr. Chairman, I will now turn my attention for a short time to some of the gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. I take no pleasure, sir, in the discussion of matters having little or no connection with the subject under consideration, nor should I now do so, but from an imperious sense of duty. In answer to some remarks I made a few days since, on the President's message and the propositions from the War Department, in relation to the Cherokee treaty, much has been said during this debate.

When that message was communicated and read to us I spoke freely. I knew that it would be productive of no good, but, in all probability, would lead to bloodshed—at least to confusion and delay in the execution or the treaty. And I told the House if the Government undertook to postpone the citizens of Georgia in taking possession of their lands, that a conflict between the State Government and the General Government would inevitably ensue; for I knew the Governor of Georgia would execute the laws of that State at every hazard, and that the interposition was unexpected to me, and would be so to the people of Georgia, whose Governor had been notified that the treaty should be executed. I also stated that the friends of humanity—the real, not the canting hypocrites—had labored day after day to induce John Ross and his Cherokee delegation to return to his people, and advise them to remove peaceably; that it was his duty to do so; and I told him myself, that every misfortune that should fall on the Cherokee people, unless he did return, would be justly chargeable to him, for at a word he could remove them in peace and harmony; that by so doing he would subserve the cause of humanity, and prove to the world the sincerity of his regard for his people; that by such conduct he might save the lives of innocent women and children, the lives of the unlettered and ignorant among his own people, for the white Indian would avoid danger. Sir, it is due to that gallant and patriotic officer, General Scott, whose services have been required in the execution of this treaty, to say, that the night before he left this city he urged Ross to go with him to the Cherokee country—told him it was his duty to do so. I was present, and united in the advice. Ross refused, and since that period I considered the determination of Ross fixed, not to go; and that nothing further would be heard from Ross except through General Scott. Both General Scott and myself held this language to Ross, not on account of any difficulties he could interpose in the execution of the treaty, but exclusively from feelings of humanity for the poor ignorant and misguided creatures who had been misled by his counsels. Gentlemen have expressed great gratification at this sudden interposition of the President, and have congratulated the country that Mr. Van Buren would stay the execution of the Cherokee treaty; that the treaty should not be executed. This language is bold, peremptory, and dictatorial, and evidently means that this House would sustain the President in this course, and that Georgia should submit. Permit me to say, sir, to this body, Be not deceived; that State obeys the exercise of all constitutional power; she will not submit to the enforcement of that which is unconstitutional. I trust the day has passed when a sovereign State can be awed or deterred from any quarter in the maintenance of constitutional rights. Let no one act under the belief that these menaces will alarm Georgia, even if aided by a proclamation or a force bill.

Sir, it has been asked, why should Georgia insist upon the execution of this treaty? I reply, because the treaty has been made, has been ratified under the forms prescribed by the Constitution; because it is the supreme law of the land, and the State has been duly notified that the compact of 1802 had been at last fulfilled, and the Indian title extinguished for the benefit of the State, after thirty-six years' delay.

Mr. Chairman, I desire that this whole subject should be distinctly understood; for should this untimely interposition of the President produce a conflict between this Government and the State authorities, the difficulty will not be of Georgia's seeking, nor will she, in the least, be responsible for the consequences. By the legislation of Georgia, the Indian rights of occupancy were extended until the 25th day of May, 1838, by which time, under the treaty, the Indians were to be removed. The Legislature of Georgia, according to the treaty, had disposed of the lands in the occupancy of the Indians: grants had issued to the citizens, and possession by law to be taken after the 25th of May, 1838; on that day the title became complete and absolute in the grantee. The Legislature of Georgia is not in session, and if that body were, the title being absolute in fee, the whole interest vested in the grantee, under the laws of Georgia; the right to interfere with the private property of the grantees is beyond the reach of constitutional legislation; so the Legislature of Georgia could do nothing, and the Governor, I am most certain, will not convene that body. Hence it is that the State cannot interfere with the matter, and the President, or the Secretary of War, if they had known or recollected the legislation of Georgia under the treaty, would have seen the legal impracticability of the State interfering, if the rights of the citizens were to be respected, and the laws and Constitution are to be regarded.

It has been urged in this debate that Georgia should be compelled to await a new treaty. Is any effort making to abrogate the treaty of 1835? Who has declared that treaty void? No constitutional authority, I am sure. Perhaps those gentlemen who speak without reference to any particular object save a desire to keep themselves constantly in the public eye, and have been so flattered by the notoriety of their attacks, that they can presume to declare the will of the people; that they speak but to command, and command but to be obeyed; and, therefore, the treaty is void. Such gentlemen must excuse me if I disregard their vain and empty mandates.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has told us he is a State rights man, (by faith, I presume, surely not by his works) and, as such, he would resist the execution of the treaty, and that he would take up arms against Georgia to prevent her carrying out its terms. Why, Mr. Chairman, what a misfortune it is that the gentleman (a State rights man) should have been wrought into such a belligerent tempest against a State; one so warlike in his temperament ought to be more cool and deliberate. But this champion of State rights, this new light of that political faith, would "take up his arms," and, disregarding all the restraints of discretion and decorum, and with the tone, port, and bearing of the god of war, exclaims, "I would castigate the State of Georgia if she attempted to enforce any of the provisions of that treaty." Sir, I shall not suffer myself to forget where I am, but I shall also remember that I am the representative of a people who will regard such language as it deserves to be regarded; such language towards a member of this House would be unparliamentary and indecorous, and, towards a State of this Confederacy, is altogether unwarrantable and uncalled for, and wholly unjustifiable. As a representative of Georgia, I shall not compromit her dignity in hurling back any defiance to such language, but will only say that Georgia, in her sovereign character, would not deprecate so much an attempt to castigate her, by whomsoever made, as she does this incessant rant, disrespect, and insult, by gentlemen who are utterly ignorant and uninformed on the subject on which they attempt to enlighten others.

The gentleman spoke of threats uttered by one of the representatives of Georgia. At that time I was the only member who had spoken freely of the President's message, and I am sure I used neither the language of menace nor violence; nor is it my wont to do so, either in reference to States or individuals; nor do I seek the notoriety consequent upon such a course; nor shall I indulge in loud accusations and denunciations of those high in power merely for personal gratification; nor shall I ever inflict a wound on those who are not in a position to defend or justify.

But we are told the treaty was obtained by fraud. If this be true, why have no direct attempts been made to annul it, by those gentlemen making the allegation, before the proper tribunal? Sir, no treaty has ever been obtained for a fuller and more adequate consideration; on the same terms the citizens of any State in this Union would exchange their lands. One gentlemen has said the Senate never regarded it as a treaty. This is another of those bold and extraordinary assertions, suited to the tastes of some, and involves very serious charges against the Senate: it places two-thirds of that body in the same category with the Rev. Mr. Schermerhorn, whose character has been drawn on this floor in colors none of the brightest. Sir, these often repeated allegations and accusations will only serve to shake the public confidence in their authors, and will finally be a protection to misrule and corruption. The gentleman from Virginia says that the Senate ratified the treaty to save the lambs from the wolves—the Cherokees from the Georgians. How much of justice and truth there is in making such a charge, I have fully shown, by adverting to the whole course of Georgia towards the Indians within her borders. As to the decorum or propriety of such language, the tastes of that gentleman and myself are so widely different that we are not likely to agree on such matters until there is a total change in all my notions of the courtesy due to this House from one member to another, and, above all, to a sovereign State of this Union. Ferocious as the comparison of the gentleman would represent the people of Georgia, they are not yet enough so to forgive one of their representatives for paying back, in kind, such language and epithets.

Sir, I am by birth and education a Georgian. I shall not, therefore, indulge in any eulogy on her people, nor shall I permit the scorn I feel for such rude assaults to throw me beyond that line of propriety and self-respect which shall always mark the conduct of a Georgian; but, in perfect coolness and composure, I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, "words sometimes wound more than swords;" and that it would not detract from his influence or usefulness to watch over his own lamb-like disposition, and in future to reflect whether it would not be equally pleasant to avoid unnecessary violence to the feelings of others.

That gentleman has said that already he "snuffed the difficulties, the shedding of blood, in Georgia;" "that the spoilers should be spoiled." What does such language mean? Such language from members of Congress, within the hearing of the Cherokees, is incendiary, and well calculated to inflame them into hostility, under the belief that this Government will sustain them in resisting the treaty.

Sir, I have said it was Ross's duty to have returned home to his people, and have aided in their removal, as he was advised to do by the Secretary of War, General Scott, and other friends of peace, harmony, and humanity; but, said the gentleman from Virginia, "if he had, he would have been snatched up and hung, like another Tassels, on a tree, by another Georgia guard." It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to speak in obedience to the promptings of a just indignation, at such a reckless assault upon the constitutional authorities of the State, without violating the rules of the House, and the decorum of debate. When has Georgia or her people thus acted? Sir, I scorn the slanderous imputation. It is an imputation that carries with it its own antidote, and I pronounce the whole insinuation unfounded—a groundless and unjustifiable attack upon the honor and character of the people of Georgia. What, sir! John Ross not safe in Georgia! Why, sir, was he not born and reared in that State? Such allusions I reprobate and contemn. I trust the people of Georgia cannot be harmed by such outrages upon their character—a people whose past history is marked by no act of violence justifying such an imputation. That part of Georgia known as the Cherokee region, has been settled by a population equal to any portion of the Union for honesty and patriotism; inferior to no new country in intelligence and morality; and, for humanity, kindness, generosity, and hospitality, equal to any people on earth. Sir, they are pure and unsophisticated in their intercourse with the world, but bold and resolute, firm and unyielding, in maintaining their rights, and brave and quick in defence of their character; and would, no doubt, feel more inclined to resent the insult offered to themselves, in reference to Ross, than to injure him.

Mr. Chairman, I am certain you have been astonished, as well as others in this body, at the tantalizing and insulting references to Georgia. It has been said that the Cherokee Indians, if the General Government will not interfere, are willing to fight it out with the Georgians. Are these things said to excite the Indians to bloodshed, or to urge Georgia into rashness? Did the member using this language desire to insult the people of Georgia, through their representatives, or did he expect to excite me into passion and indiscretion? There are limits the mildest and most forbearing cannot permit others to pass. There are bounds to the liberties and freedom of debate, beyond which personalities necessarily follow. At that I point I hope not to arrive; but, should it come, the honor and character of my native State shall not be tarnished in my person.

Sir, not content with holding Georgia answerable for all the anticipated Cherokee difficulties, she must be charged as accessary to the Florida war. Is it not beyond endurance? Is it not amazing to hear it? Can it be from mistake? Sir, Georgia had no more to do with the causes of that war than the State of Kentucky. I repel this accusation, and demand the ground of the allegation.

Mr. HARLAN rose and said: In the remarks made by me yesterday, on the subject of the causes of the Florida war, and the State of Georgia in connection with it, I did not mean to say that Georgia had any direct agency in the causes of that war. When speaking of the policy of the late Administration for the removal of the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi river, I expressed the opinion that the Florida war was one of the fruits of that policy; that the anxiety of Georgia to have the Indian title to the lands within her boundaries extinguished, superinduced the passage of the act of 1830, providing for the removal of the Indian tribes; and that that bill was carried in this House by a majority less than the number of representatives from the State of Georgia.

Mr. DAWSON: Then, sir, there is no ground for such a change; and the apology for making it is, that the representatives of Georgia voted for the act of 1830, providing for the removal of the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi. Why, sir, upon the same principle, every State in the Union may have contributed to the Florida war. No further reply to such an argument can be expected.

Much has been said by the gentleman from Philadelphia. His excitement was too great for the subject before him; his feelings led him into the use of language which, so far as language was concerned, I considered offensive; but so far as the intent was involved, inoffensive. He worked himself into such wrath that he was driven into the exclamation, "I am mad, sir, I am mad!" Let him cool, sir; restore his temper; suffer his passion to subside; speak with deliberation, under the control of his reason, and then, sir, I will weigh his arguments, and, if necessary, reply to them. But, sir, I am much exhausted; and I would do injustice to myself and the committee to reply to the ravings of an enthusiast—one who admits that he is mad.

I am convinced, sir, that much more ought to be said by me on this subject; but I shall desist. The appropriations, to subserve the cause of humanity by preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities, and for the purpose of aiding in the execution of the Cherokee treaty, I have no doubt will be made. If I shall have vindicated my native State from unjust imputations, (as I trust I have,) it will be to me one of the most gratifying acts of my life.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

SPEECH OF MR. KEMBLE,
OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, Tuesday, June 26, 1838—On the bill from the Senate "to increase the military establishment of the United States.

Mr. KEMBLE rose, and said: After the able exposé which we have received from the chairman of the Military Committee, of the past and present state of the Army, it may appear temerity in one unaccustomed altogether to public speaking, for the first time to rise in this House; but the position which I hold on that committee, and my dissent on some points from the majority, render it necessary that I should offer an explanation of my own course.

At the reduction of the army in 1821, the frontiers of the United States were estimated at about six thousand three hundred miles. The Indian tribes were subdued and humbled, surrounded by white population, and convinced, by the failure of repeated efforts, that all attempt at resistance must prove unavailing. Since that time, the frontiers of the United States have been extended to not less than eight thousand five hundred miles, and the Mississippi is no longer an impassable barrier to the Western red man; and the Government, with motives of humanity, if not of policy, has added, and is adding to the Indian force on the Western frontier, by the transportation of the tribes within the States, until the whole force, as estimated by the Indian Department, will be not less than sixty-six thousand fighting men. To keep this force in check, the Secretary estimates an army of five thousand men, stationed in two lines of fortifications, one of six posts penetrating into the Indian country, and eight posts within the States of Arkansas and Missouri, which, with a reserve of two thousand men at Jefferson barracks, and a militia force organized and to be called out by the Governors of the States, he considers to be sufficient to maintain the peace of the frontier. For the northwestern frontier, General Scott estimates one regiment of ten companies of eighty muskets, nine hundred men; and for the seaboard and Eastern frontier, sixty companies, or five thousand four hundred men. This distribution will leave the whole Northern and Northeastern or Canadian frontiers without the protection of a single man; and it will be seen that, without protection to the Canadian frontier, the Western frontier requires seven thousand, and the Eastern military division of the country six thousand three hundred men, making, together, thirteen thousand three hundred men, while the bill reported by the committee authorizes only eleven thousand six hundred. Thus it would appear that under no distribution whatever of this military force, can the country be efficiently protected. But how is this deficiency to be met? By militia? Or, in the West and South, by mounted volunteers? The expense of this last force is estimated by the Secretary of War to be four times the cost of infantry, and by the Paymaster General at six times the cost of infantry, exclusive of the enormous waste of military stores and munitions of war inseparable from the employment of irregular troops, which the Paymaster General estimates again as six for one. But, taking the whole at ten for one, and supposing, as is universally practised, that twice as many militia and volunteers are called as would be required of regular troops, it would give us the startling fact that, in the employment of mounted volunteers, who are armed and used as infantry, and can be compared only with them, their cost to the country is not less than twenty for one of regular troops; and to this, and this alone, is to be attributed the enormous cost of the Florida war. And, sir, that the whole subject of our defences may be before you, although somewhat long, I would beg leave to read a report from the Secretary of War, made some time since to the Senate of the United States:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 5, 1838.

SIR: In bedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives, directing me to report the state of the defences of the Atlantic seaboard and Gulf of Mexico, and on the Northern and Eastern frontiers, I have the honor to transmit a report of the Chief Engineer, the details of which are withheld for the reasons assigned by him; a tabular statement made in 1831 by Inspector General Croghan, together with his letter on that subject; a tabular statement furnished by the Chief of the Ordnance office; and a printed copy of the report, on the same subject, made some time since by the Department, in answer to a call of the Senate.

From these documents it appears that the defences on the Atlantic seaboard and Gulf of Mexico are altogether inefficient; the works being unfinished, unarmed, and without garrisons, not even men enough to preserve them from dilapidation, or to protect them from plunder; and that every naval station and principal seaport on the whole maritime frontier of the United States is exposed to be attacked and destroyed by a very inferior force.

The defences on our Eastern and Northern frontiers require repair and enlargement, provided the army be so increased as to allow sufficient garrisons to be placed in them. This measure is necessary, to enable the Government to maintain peaceable relations with friendly powers, by restraining the lawless within its own borders, as well as to protect our soil from sudden and unprovoked aggression.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. JAMES K. POLK, Speaker Ho. of Reps.

INSPECTOR GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 2, 1838.

SIR: In December, 1834, I prepared a tabular statement of the armament required for the fortifications on the seaboard, which I beg leave to submit to you; not that it gives an exact exhibit of the wants of the several fortifications at this time, but as putting forth all the positive information which I possess in relation to our seaboard defences, and upon which I had your instructions this morning to make a report.

In excuse for my want of that exact information which, as Inspector General, I may be supposed to possess, I would remark, that of late my visits have been confined to the posts on the inland frontier, and that of the seaboard I can speak with no official certainty, but will at the same time express my belief that the following extract of my last report upon the state and condition of certain fortifications on the seaboard is but too well suited to the present condition of most of them:

"The seaboard from New York to Eastport has alone, as yet, come within the course of my inspection, and its defences are in a most wretched condition—not a single post along the whole line, with the exception of Fort Independence, perhaps, being able to protect itself against the attacks of even an armed brig. If any of them have guns mounted, they are upon decayed carriages, which can be no longer traversed, and upon platforms that have long since been declared unsafe."

With respect to the inland posts, I will, in anticipation of any inquiries that you may make, aver that, even with the largest garrisons that can be assigned to them from our present army force, respect being paid to the claims of other portions of our frontier, they can afford no sufficient protection to the settlements of whites in their respective vicinities. In a word, that the entire frontier, from St. Peter's to the Red river, can be laid waste whenever the restless tribes of Indians along it may choose to decree to that effect.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
G. CROGHAN,
Inspector General.

Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War.

Report from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th October, 1837, relative to a plan for the protection of the North and Eastern frontiers of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, January 9, 1838.

SIR: In a reply to the resolution of the Senate of the 14th October last, asking for a "plan for the protection of the North and Eastern frontiers of the United States," &c. I have the honor to transmit herewith extracts of a letter from Major General Scott to the Commanding General. In this communication, that officer does not suggest any new plan of defense, but confines himself to a statement of the minimum force required at the several posts and stations for the protection of the Northern and Eastern frontiers of the United States. Indeed, the very thorough examination given to this subject by a board of engineers appointed after the close of the last war, and the general system of defence laid down by them, render it unnecessary to submit new plans for that purpose. All that can be done is to reiterate their recommendations, and to state the actual condition of those frontiers. They are exposed to insult and attack along their whole line; the inland borders, for want of proper garrisons for the several posts, and the maritime frontier, from all the fortifications being incomplete, unfinished, and unarmed.

Admonished by the difficulties which had been encountered, and the incredible expenses incurred at the commencement of the last war, from want of preparation, the nation, immediately on the return of peace, adopted measures for the defence of the seaboard. The circumstances attending that contest had shown that the whole extent of the coast was vulnerable, and that an active and enterprising enemy, with comparatively small means, might keep the country in a state of alarm, by threatening the entire line, and selecting the unguarded points for attack—a mode of warfare which obliged the Government to incur great and disproportionate expense, and to employ an immense force in ineffectual attempts to protect its defenceless and extensive maritime frontier.

The coast was reconnoitered by a board of engineers, and a system of defence adopted, intended to cover our great naval establishments and principal cities; to close important harbors to the enemy, and secure them to our own navy; to deprive the enemy of strong positions, where, protected by his naval superiority, he might fix permanent quarters in our territory, maintain himself during the war, and keep the frontier in a state of perpetual alarm; to prevent, as much as possible, the great avenues of interior navigation from being blockaded by a naval force, at their entrance into the ocean; and to cover the coastwise and interior navigation, and give our navy the means necessary for protecting this navigation.

For these purposes sites were selected, and works projected and commenced, upon a scale commensurate with the magnitude of the interests they were intended to protect. The whole system was adapted to the principles of modern warfare; and, if the plan had been prosecuted with the same vigor with which it was commenced, the fortifications on our maritime frontier might have been, if not completed, in a state to be defended, and to afford some protection to the points of attack.

Unfortunately, the efforts to carry on these necessary works have been relaxed. Whether lulled into security by a long peace, or influenced by other causes, the nation has ceased to feel respecting them that interest their importance ought to inspire. Appropriations have been denied altogether, or made with a sparing hand; the fortifications have been left in an unfinished state, exposed to the action of the elements, requiring costly and extensive repairs before they were half finished; and, after a period of more than twenty years, and the expenditure of many millions of dollars, there is not a fortress on our long line of sea defences capable of resisting an armed brig; not one that may not be taken by a small force, and some of them, from their quasi insular position, if captured, may be occupied permanently during the continuance of a war, or only to be retaken at the cost of much blood and treasure.

The chief cause of this neglect in one of our most important interests, is the opinion, which has so generally prevailed, that our navy is the first and best fortification, and that all the resources and energies of the country ought to be directed to the improvement of that arm of the service. No one has a higher opinion of the navy of our country than I have; but I believe that, even when carried to the fullest extent to which it can reach for many years to come, it will, alone, prove entirely inadequate to defend the extensive maritime frontier of the United States.

The Board of Navy Commissioners, in a late report, state that, "having due regard to the number of seamen employed in our foreign and coasting trade, and in the fisheries, the force to be prepared ready for use when circumstances may require it, ought to consist of fifteen ships of the line, twenty-five frigates, twenty-five sloops of war, twenty-five steamers, and twenty-five smaller vessels; and that the frames and other timber, the copper, ordnance, tanks, and chain cables, should also be prepared for ten ships of the line and ten frigates." These will probably be required to supply losses from decay and casualties.

The French navy now consists of forty ships of the line, fifty frigates, and two hundred and twenty smaller vessels. That of Great Britain, of one hundred and thirty ships of the line, one hundred and twenty frigates, seventy-five sloops of war, forty-five steamers, and ninety-eight smaller vessels of war. Of these, there are in commission twenty-six ships of the line, eighteen frigates, fifty-three sloops, and fifty smaller vessels of war, and six steamers. And yet the coasts of both these nations are lined with fortifications, and possess a complete system of permanent defences along their maritime frontiers. Without such a system, the navy will have no place of refuge when driven into harbor by stress of weather or a superior force; and, instead of protecting our own commerce, and harassing that of the enemy, will be confined altogether to defensive operations, always distressing and expensive, and too often humiliating. The extent to which our navy can be carried ought, in my opinion, to be fixed; for it is erroneous to suppose that it has no other limit than what a due regard for the revenue of the country imposes: to build more ships than we have seamen to man them, would be to incur a useless expense; and the force proposed by the commissioners ought not, for many years to come, to be exceeded. Anxious as I am to see the defences of the country established upon a permanent basis, and equally desirous to see every arm of the service rendered as perfect and useful as possible, I may be pardoned for travelling out of my own department, and urging the usefulness of fixing this or some other determined limit to our naval forces. This principle once established, the number and size of the naval establishments, store-houses, magazines, and preparations of every kind, would be ordered in conformity to it. The number of officers would likewise be limited to a due proportion, and the young and the ardent and enterprising officer might aspire to command. The best interests of the country require that this system should be adopted, and the preparations be made to carry the navy to this limit as promptly as possible; but this measure will not enable us to dispense with permanent fortifications. Without them, the commencement of a war will always be disastrous. Our laws do not allow the use of the summary means resorted to by other maritime powers to man their fleets. Our ships of war are to be manned by volunteer seamen, and the coast might be laid waste, and important points occupied, before our naval force could be put in motion. Indeed, without fortifications, and strong ones too, ships of war are exposed to be captured or destroyed before they can be fitted for sea. At Copenhagen, the whole Danish fleet was captured, the batteries silenced, and humiliating terms imposed upon a nation, by the sudden attack of an overwhelming force.

With respect to the magnitude of the works, to which objections have been urged, they will be worse than useless if they be not of a description to stop an enemy's squadron, and, if assailable by land, and in a position not promptly to be succored, strong enough to resist a coup de main—not such an assault as the common acceptation of the term implies, but to offer an effectual resistance for five or six days against an attacking force of ten thousand men, furnished with all the means and appliances to conduct a siege. Not to provide against such expeditions would be to neglect the lessons of experience, and to act in opposition to the principles of modern warfare. It has been said that we are too strong to dread such assaults, and need not provide against them; that the enemy could never hope to keep permanent possession of any part of our territory, and, therefore, we are safe from attack. An active and enterprising enemy will make war upon the resources of its adversary; and, by the temporary occupation of any one of our naval depots, principal cities, or harbors, they might drive this country to expend an amount of blood and treasure to recover it, ten times greater than the cost of the expedition. There is always danger of the attempt being made, and, without due precaution, we are exposed to suffer the degradation of having our soil occupied by a foreign foe. From these dangers, neither ships of war nor steam batteries can protect the nation; the former cannot be rendered effective to the full amount of their force at the commencement of a war, nor until commerce receives such a check as to throw out of employment a sufficient number of seamen to man the fleet; nor then ought it to be relied upon to watch over our long line of coast. To resist the navies of England or France, it must be concentrated, and either the Atlantic frontier or that of the Gulf of Mexico be abandoned. With regard to steam batteries, they ought only to be regarded in the light of auxiliaries to the permanent defences of the coast—important, it is true, but, for reasons which it would be tedious to detail here, entirely inadequate, of themselves, to afford sufficient protection to the great interests we are called upon to guard on our Atlantic frontier, and on that of the Gulf of Mexico.

As it may be objected to the completion of all the works projected, that if ever we should be involved in a war with either of the great maritime powers, they are too far off to assail our coast with success, or to send formidable expeditions against the United States; and therefore, it is unnecessary to incur this great expense, I will simply observe that the events of the past wars prove this assertion to be erroneous, and that such stations as Halifax and Bermuda on our Atlantic frontier, and the West India islands on that of the Gulf of Mexico, are near enough to bring those powers within striking distance of all the vulnerable points upon our seaboard; and with regard to the expense to be incurred, I beg to refer to the very able and luminous exposition of the board of engineers, laid before Congress in February, 1821, where it is conclusively shown that the cost of protecting the seacoast of the United States, when menaced by an assailing expedition of twenty thousand men, by means of a competent force of militia for the limited period of six months, would exceed the amount required to establish a permanent system of defence.

Having laid before you the exposed state of our seacoast, and stated the dangers to which the country would be exposed in the event of war, I most earnestly recommend the early completion of the fortifications intended to cover our principal cities and naval establishments, and to protect the entrances of our great harbors. Without entering into the controversy respecting the proper selection of the sites for these works, which would demand a profound knowledge of engineering and great military skill and science to determine, I am disposed to yield implicit confidence to the very able engineers who planned them. I have considered all their reports with an earnest desire to arrive at the truth, and my judgment is satisfied. No doubt rests upon my mind of the wisdom of their choice, and of the vast importance of proceeding, without delay, to complete all those fortifications considered by the board as of the first class; nor of the extreme probability that our enemy will, in the event of a war, avail himself of our negligence to attack, and probably to occupy, some of the most exposed points of our coast. Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Charleston, are all uncovered, and exposed to attack. In the same condition are Narragansett bay and Hampton roads. The defences of the first are of the last importance, whether it be regarded as a refuge to our own fleets in the tremendous northwest storms which so often desolate our coast in the winter season, and from which this bay affords the only entrance and protection during their continuance, or as a position from which, when once occupied by an enemy in time of war, it would be both extremely difficult and immensely expensive to dislodge him. Hampton roads is of equal importance, and equally exposed: and here let me observe that fortifications, such as those projected and in progress at the entrance of this roadstead, serve not only to defend the country and navigation behind them, but to protect the waters within reach of the auxiliary force which ought to be within their walls and under their guns. What enemy would dare to occupy Lynnhaven bay, if steam-batteries were anchored under the fires of Fort Monroe; or attempt to march against Norfolk, if a corps de reserve were within that fortress? So of the works to defend Boston. The fortification at George's island not only covers that city, but protects Nantasket roads, and will prevent an enemy from occupying that position.

There is no part of our maritime frontier more exposed, and that calls more immediately for the attention of Congress, than that of the Gulf of Mexico. The rest of our coast, by a proper system, may be so united as to lend each other mutual succor; but this portion of it is insulated, and, as it were, abandoned to its own resources. It requires for its defence a great naval depot and a considerable naval force; and it demands a complete and distinct system of defence. It must not be considered merely as the frontier of Louisiana, Alabama, and West Florida, but likewise that of Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee, Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas. The whole of the rich and fertile portion of the Union whose waters find their outlet in the Gulf of Mexico is interested that the defences of this frontier should not only be strong and respectable when they are completed, but that the fortifications intended for that purpose should be carried on vigorously, and finished without unnecessary delay.

It is not only necessary that the forts should be built: they must be armed and garrisoned before they will constitute fortifications for the defence of the coast. Without these necessary requisites, they are fitted only for the use of an invading enemy. Not only the appropriation for fortifications, but that for ordnance, ought, in my opinion, to be increased, and the cannon applied altogether to the armament of the forts, until that be completed; the army be so far augmented, that the artillery regiments may occupy these posts; and such an organization adopted of the militia or volunteer forces as will render the neighboring population available in cases of alarm or sudden war.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. R. M. JOHNSON, President of the Senate.

Such, then, is the state of the country—a frontier unprotected, a seaboard undefended, and the very fortifications, raised for the defence of our seaport towns, decaying from neglect, robbed by our own citizens, and liable to be taken, and our cities laid under contribution by the most inferior force, and that which was erected for our strength converted to our weakness. It is a state of things which must make every friend of his country pause and inquire into the causes; it were enough to bring our republican institutions into disrepute, and to prove our scheme of self-government to be Utopian. But let us hope for better things, and commence by inquiring what should be done to save our people from massacre, and the nation from disgrace. Honest differences of opinion exist among us as to the course to be pursued. Some, regardless of the increased expense, and jealous of standing armies, lest they should be used to the destruction of our own liberties, prefer to depend entirely on militia; while others, from their comparative inefficiency, consider that their employment should, if possible, be avoided. For my own part, I consider that both are important to the well-being and protection of the state; and while I cannot fear the contemplated danger of a force of 15,000, or even 20,000 men, scattered over 8,500 miles of frontier, I would not unnecessarily increase it, but rather would keep it below what might be considered by some as necessary to our safety and honor. With a militia force of one million and a half, where can be the danger of a small, but well-appointed army, drawn from the great body of the people, our relations and our friends, educated as ourselves, and imbued with the same holy love of liberty that characterizes every American? Supposing the power to exist, can such men be formidable to the liberties of our common country? Although history may afford some striking examples, when a lawless soldiery, under an ambitious leader, have violated their duty to the state, I recollect of no instance of their eventual success, nor could it happen until the great body of the people had become degraded, and existed only as the ready prey of the first invader, foreign or domestic. But how many more cases can be found of armies devoted to the rights and liberties of their common country? Then, why should we consider the American soldier devoid of those high attributes which adorn the private citizen? Why suppose him less patriotic, and less devoted to the common interest? Is there any thing in the history of our own country which would warrant such a conclusion? On the contrary, does not every page of our short, but eventful, story warrant a conclusion directly the reverse?

Now, sir, while I am willing to grant every security to the Western frontier of the United States, I claim equal protection for the North and East, and seaboard of our country. At this instant, Great Britain has 40,000 men in arms in Canada, and 5,000 in New Brunswick; great excitement exists on both sides of the frontier, and troops are necessary for the protection and the execution of our own laws. And I here claim, as one of the Representatives of the State of New York, that this Congress will so act upon the subject as to place us in safety, without endangering other portions of the Union. It is due to justice and to the interests of the United States, for from New York we derive the largest portion of our fiscal resources; and her position renders her, independently of her population, of equal, if not greater, importance to the nation than any other State in this Union.

There were some points of difference of opinion with the military committee, to which the chairman has adverted in his speech, which I wish, at this time, to respond to, and particularly in relation to the transfer of an officer from each of the companies of artillery. These companies, when used as light infantry or in the field, are organized into three divisions of two guns each, in all six guns: a lieutenant commands two guns; one lieutenant has charge of the ammunition, one acts as aid-de-camp to pass the orders, and the captain commands the whole. Thus, if you take off one lieutenant, you must reduce the effective force of the company two guns, or one third of its power. At other times the artillery is employed in detachments, and, in such, a greater number of officers is always required, as no detachment can be made with less than two officers. The two principal amendments which I have offered to the bill consist, first, in an equalization of the pay of the whole army, conceiving it unjust that those who serve in the field should be worse paid than those who are comfortably accommodated here or elsewhere. The next is a plan to enable officers who have served their lives in the army, but are now worn out or mutilated, and unfit for active duty, to retire upon their pay proper. There are many such who now receive their full pay, because there is no provision otherwise for them, but who would be glad to retire upon a pittance. At a proper time, I shall more fully state the case to the House, considering it, as I do, an act of justice, policy and sound economy.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, JULY 4, 1838.

On the bill "to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. BENTON having briefly explained the object of the bill—

Mr. PIERCE of New Hampshire said that he had never found it more difficult to determine what was his duty, than on the present occasion. That an increase of the military force was highly necessary, if not indispensable, he believed was very generally admitted; and he had felt upon the subject, individually, no ordinary solitude. It was demanded by the present relations of the country, by the unhappy and unquiet state of things on our widely extended borders, on the North and on the East, as well as on the South and West. The call at this moment comes alike from our Southern and Western frontier, and along the Eastern and Northern boundary from Madawaska to the lakes. He was not disposed to disregard the necessity which was urged in favor of the bill. A sufficient force should be provided for the preservation of our neuterality, and to afford to our border inhabitants the protection which they have a right to demand at our hands. His embarrassment, on the occasion, arose from the fact, that the bill had reached a stage in its progress, when it was impossible to amend it; and it embraced provisions, in his judgment, most unequal and unjust. It was emphatically a staff bill; and he would not allow the invidious distinctions made between the officers connected with the bureaus of that department and the line of the army to pass in silence, at least one voice should be raised for those who were not here to speak for themselves, and who are hardly heard of in Washington, except in the official reports from the frontier, or from the battle field.

Mr. P. said he should not, at this late hour, feel justified to enter upon a detailed argument, or attempt any nice analysis of the bill; but he would notice some of its provisions, which were as extraordinary as they were unjust. Let it be known to the country, said Mr. P. that this bill provides for an increase of one hundred and forty-six officers; that one hundred and thirty-three out of the one hundred and forty-six are for the staff, and thirteen for the line of the army; and let it be known, too, that in this reorganization of the staff, and in its immense increase, promotion is exclusively to accrue to those officers who now hold places in this favored arm of the service.

Look, for instance, at the fourth and fifth sections of the bill. They provide "That the corps of topographical engineers shall be organized and increased by regular promotions in the same, so that the said corps shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, four majors, ten captains, ten first lieutenants, and ten second lieutenants; that vacancies created by said organization, over and above those which can be filled by the present corps, shall be taken from the army, and from such as it may be deemed advisable of the civil engineers," &c. It would be perceived at once that officers in the line of the army were prevented, by the terms of the bill, from promotion to any situations of rank. In the organization of the corps, is not the Executive competent to judge of the merits and qualifications of officers? and is it necessary thus to provide against the appointment of officers from the line of the army? The Executive has taken an officer from the staff to command the whole army in Florida, but the Executive is not to be left at liberty to take an officer of rank, who has been fighting your battles in that sickly climate, and disheartening warfare, and give him an appointment in the staff. Other provisions, similar in character, Mr. P. said, will strike the attention of any Senator who would carefully read the bill; and he predicted that the construction which he gave to the bill would be verified by the fact, that, in this reorganization of the various corps, not a single situation above the rank of captain would be conferred upon any officer now in the line of the army.

He, Mr. P. was not one of those who believed that an efficient field officer and fighting officer was disqualified for making a good staff officer. But, said Mr. P. the advantage of the staff, on the score of promotion, is not all of which the officer of the line has to complain; though, as every man knows, it is much to the proud and gallant soldier. By the provisions of the bill, a major in the staff would receive one hundred and forty-nine dollars per month, while an officer of the same grade in the line would receive but one hundred and twenty-seven dollars per month, making a difference annually of two hundred and sixty-four dollars; and the same difference would obtain in relation to all grades in the two corps, in proportion to their rank. These were all provisions for which no man here would pretend to assign any good reason. They are distinctions most unjust and invidious, and distinctions against which he took occasion to enter his decided protest. Having passed this bill, said Mr. B. nothing will be left to be done in the way of injustice, and, he would add, indignity, to the line of the army, except to repromulgate the celebrated order (No. 48) issued several years since, which denied to the officers of the line the right to visit this city. While speaking of the injustice proposed to be done to the officers of the line by this bill, he felt authorized to advert to the treatment they had received on other occasions. He asked what was the cause of that order? Upon what suggestion, and by whom made? Why was it promulgated? Had any officer of the line dared to question here the superior qualities, the superior services, and consequently superior claims, of the staff? Did the occasional appearance of an officer of the line in this city, not leave the field of Washington campaigning sufficiently clear for the different Bureaus? These were questions which he presumed the officers of the line would like to have answered. Listen, said Mr. P. to a paragraph or two of this notorious order:

"No officer will visit the seat of Government, unless ordered, or unless specially permitted so to do by the General-in-chief. An officer, however, may pass through the seat of Government when on duty or on leave of absence, provided it is the most direct route to his place of destination; but in such case he will report in person to the Adjutant General, and will not remain more than twenty-four hours."

Sir, said Mr. P. was it not most gracious to allow the officer who had been for years, perhaps, on your extreme western frontier, to pass through the capital of his country on the way to his post for duty, or, it may be, to the home of his childhood, "provided it was in his most direct route?" Was it not most kind and considerate to allow the gallant soldier of the line, after the toil and exposure of active service, to rest his weary foot for a single night in this city, provided he reported in person to the Adjutant General? Weary and fatigued, he could not report by sending his note, but must make his bow in person to the head of a bureau!

The repeal of this obnoxious order was imperiously demanded by a power higher than the power of Congress, by public opinion; and public opinion would fix the seal of its disapprobation upon the invidious distinctions recognised and established in this bill.

Mr. BENTON replied to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIERCE,] and showed that the increase of the staff which he spoke of was nominal, not real; that it occasioned but few additional persons to be employed in that branch of the service, and actually lessened, instead of increasing, the expense in the branches of the staff which occasioned the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire. The engineers had particularly attracted his attention, and excited his remarks; but a look into the blue book would show him that with an apparent increase of above seventy officers in the engineers proper and in the topographical engineers, there was an actual reduction both in the numbers employed, and now employed by law, in those two corps, and in the amount of compensation which they received. This apparent contradiction is thus solved. These two corps have been proved by the experience of about twenty years to be physically incapable, from their defect of numbers, to perform the duties required of them. To supply this defect, Congress, instead of increasing the corps, directed citizens to be employed, and left it to the Department to fix the compensation. The act of 1824 for making surveys for internal improvement contained a section of this kind. Under these acts a corps of citizens were permanently employed to do the duties of engineers and topographical engineers, and this citizen corps was much more numerous, and in many instances much more highly paid, than the officers of the corps. Thus, look to page 118 of that volume, and it will be seen that the corps of engineers proper consist of twenty-eight officers, of which upwards of one half are first and second lieutenants, and have but small pay; then look to page 100, and you will see fifty-six names under this caption: "A list of officers and agents, civil and military, not named in the Army Register, employed under the Engineer Department." Looking into the compensation which these fifty-six persons so employed receives, and it will be found, in many instances, that they receive much more than any officer allowed by the bill under consideration to be added to the corps. Thus, the first named person receives six dollars per day, and two and a half per cent. on disbursements, not to exceed two dollars per day for disbursements; the second receives two dollars per day and two and a half per cent. on disbursements; the third receives five per cent. on disbursements; the fourth receives the same; the fifth receives $3000 per annum, fixed by law; the sixth receives $1,200 per annum, with 2½ per cent. on disbursements, not to exceed two dollars a day for disbursements; the seventh receives $1,500 per annum, and nine cents per mile while travelling on duty: and so on, some more, some less, according to the duty they have to perform, until the whole fifty-six are provided for. Now, this long list of persons thus employed, are doing the duties of engineers, because there are not engineers enough to do their own duties. They have been appointed for defect of engineers: if this bill passes, a large proportion of these fifty-six persons may be dispensed with; and thus there is, in reality, neither increase of numbers employed, nor of expense in the engineers proper.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIERCE] also speaks of the topographical engineers; and here he must receive the same answer as in the case of the engineers proper. There are now but ten officers in that corps; their names are seen at page 119 of the Blue Book; but these ten could not do the fourth part of the work required of them, and Congress, by act of 1824, authorized citizens to be employed to do the work required of them; and at page 110 of the same book, you will see the names of thirty-six persons so employed, and their compensation stated thus: $6 per day, and 10 cents a mile while travelling on duty; $5 a day, and 10 cents a mile while travelling on duty; $4 per day, and 10 cents a mile while travelling on duty; $125 a month, and 10 cents a mile while travelling on duty; $4 per day, and 2½ per cent. on his expenditures; $3 50 per diem, and 2½ per cent. upon his expenditures. By the bill before the Senate, the corps of topographical engineers will be increased twenty-six in number, and the act by which the thirty-six are employed to do their duty will be repealed. Instead of an increase of twenty-six, then, in this branch of the service, there will be a diminution of ten. There will also be a diminution of expense; for, of the increase, six will be captains, and twenty will be first and second lieutenants, at from $30 to $50 a month and their rations, instead of the compensation of twice, or thrice, or even four times that amount now given to citizens to do their work. There is, therefore, a further gain in the reduction of expense, as well as in the reduction of numbers; but these are not the only gains. The person who is employed in place of an officer does nothing but attend to the particular service for which he is engaged, and is not subject to the rules and articles of war, how great soever may be his mismanagement in the conduct of the work; while an officer of the army is subject to any other duty which the Government chooses to put him on, and is under the strict discipline of the rules and articles of war for the fidelity of his conduct.

Having shown how great was the error of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIERCE] in relation to the two corps of engineers, Mr. B. then went on to show that he was also in error in regard to the ordnance, where an increase of twenty officers was counted, when, in fact, there was no increase at all, the twenty officers added to that corps being merely so many transferred from the artillery. So of the quartermaster's department. Upon the face of the bill there would seem to be an increase of twenty-eight, but, by looking into the existing laws and the present state of that corps, and it would be seen that twenty of the twenty-eighty are already there. This reduces the apparent increase to eight; but by the supplemental bill which the Military Committee of the two Houses had digested, and which he [Mr. B.] should offer as soon as the main bill passed, these twenty-eight officers would not be detached from the line of the army; they would continue to be officers of the line performing duty in the staff. Thus the increase of the staff will, perhaps, be two dozen, instead of the one hundred and thirty-three, which the Senator from New Hampshire supposes; and of this increase a part will undoubtedly be taken from the officers of the line. Having shown these errors with respect to the increase of the staff, Mr. B. went on to show that the Senator from New Hampshire was also in an error with respect to the officers of the line. He says one hundred and forty-six new officers are created by the bill, of which only thirteen are officers of the line. This is a great error. There are forty-five new officers of the line provided for in the bill. The new regiment of infantry itself requires thirty-three officers, and the four new companies of artillery will require twelve more. Thus, instead of one hundred and thirty-three staff officers to thirteen of the line, the bill will show about double as many of the line as of the staff.* The fact is, that the line gains far more than the staff by this bill and the supplement. It gains about double in point of numbers; and besides that, above thirty officers of the line will be employed on staff duties in the Quartermaster's and Adjutant General's department, receiving staff pay and retaining their place in the line at the same time. But the bill was not drawn with a view to favor either class of these officers, but to increase the rank and file—to increase the number of fighting men, by restoring the 4,000 men who were disbanded when the army was reduced from 10,000 to 6,000, in the year 1821. This was the main object of the bill, and this object it accomplishes. By this bill the 4,000

* The list of new officers created during the session, and published by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, shows that the new Army bill and the supplemental bill increased the officers of the line to the number of forty-five, and the officers of the staff to the number of twenty-seven, being a total increase of seventy-two. The following is the statement of the Clerk. The infantry and artillery are line officers, all the rest are staff:

"New regiment of Infantry—One colonel, same compensation as other officers of same grade; one lieutenant colonel, do. one major, do. ten captains, do. ten first lieutenants, do. ten second lieutenants, do.

"Artillery.—Four captains, same compensation as other officers of similar grade; four first lieutenants, do. four second lieutenants, do.

"Corps of Engineers.—One lieutenant colonel, same pay as other officers of same grade in the dragoons; two majors, do. six captains, do. six second lieutenants, do.

"Commissary Department—One assistant commissary general of subsistence, pay same as lieutenant colonel of cavalry; one commissary of subsistence, pay of quartermaster of the army; three do. do. pay of assistant quartermasters.

"Ordnance.—Two majors, pay of officers of dragoons of same grade; one professor of chemistry, mineralogy, &c. at West Point, pay of professor of mathematics.

"Medical Department—Seven surgeons, same pay as other surgeons.

"NOTE.—The other appointments authorized by the new army bill are staff appointments, to be made from the line of the army, and do not increase the number of officers."

will be restored which were cut off sixteen years ago from motives of economy, and for want of which the Southern Indians in Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, have since cost the United States about twenty millions of dollars. This has been our economy: disband regulars which cost but a moderate sum, and employ militia and volunteers to do their duty, at between four and five times the cost of regulars.

Mr. CRITTENDEN spoke for some time against what he deemed the objectionable features of the bill; but admitted, however, his hearty concurrence in some of the sentiments which had been expressed from the other side of the Senate in relation to the pay of the officers of the line. He thought they had been paid with less liberality, or even justice, than any other branch of the public service. His feelings were such on this occasion as would induce him to go as far as propriety would dictate in rewarding that meritorious class of officers engaged in the inglorious war of Florida; he used the word "inglorious," because, through mismanagement on the part of the preceding and present Administrations of the Government, it had been productive of nothing but expense, disaster, and suffering; and although the officers and soldiers engaged in that conflict had signalized themselves by a devotion to their country, by a chivalry and noble daring, and by a patient endurance, such as history furnished few examples of, yet they had reaped no laurels; indeed, were scarcely heard of, unless some poor fellow, with leg or arm gone, made his appearance at Washington. And it was these very brave spirits, (never heard of but in the hour of battle,) who were totally neglected by the bill before them; while others, who had lived their career in one uninterrupted sunshine, were alone made the recipients of Government bounty! Was it not time that such a system should be checked? was it not time to break up the prætorian cohorts, these Capitoline guards, half officer, half civilian, "sprinkled with the dandy," who were dancing attendance at the skirts of Congressmen, or basking in Executive sunshine; never seen in the hour of danger, and found only where favors were to be had? Another objection, which struck him with peculiar force, was the fearful ratio in which the staff was increased. Was it not already a most overgrown branch of the service? The honorable Senator from Missouri, whose judgment might be better in military matters than his, [Mr. C's,] had reported this increase; but could it be possible that, out of an augmentation of one hundred and forty-six officers, one hundred and thirty three were necessary for the staff? Was the whole army to be converted into staff officers? He had always understood that, in its former organization, the avowed object of keeping up such a disproportionate branch, as the staff evidently was, even at that time, to be the readiness with which the rank and file could be filled up, and the economy that would accrue to the Government from a well organized body of officers of that description. Where, then, was the necessity of this further addition? where the necessity of still further increasing this disproportion? Besides, was it not seen that whenever an increase was contemplated, that the prætorian band, to which he had alluded, were found marching in advance, and obtaining all the honors and advantages which such an increase was calculated to bestow. Why were these men made to receive more emolument than those worthy officers of the line who had signalized themselves by their services and sufferings in Florida? Might it not be traced to the influence which their position here enabled them to exert? He thought it high time that this system of favoritism should be checked; and he called upon the Senator from New Hampshire to give his vote against the bill as it then stood, and thus aid in arresting what he considered an unequal and unjust proceeding. If an increase of the staff were necessary, which he would by no means admit, it certainly could not be to the extent contended for in the bill; and such was his [Mr. C's] repugnance, that he would vote against the whole measure rather than lend his sanction to it in its present shape. If this little increase to the staff were admitted now, might we not again be called on for a still further increase, and an increase of their pay, until, like Brennus, they would place their swords in the scale, and still complain that they did not weigh enough. We all knew how easy it was to go on creating abuses, but how difficult it was to retrace our steps; and he, therefore, thought it would be better that the whole matter should lie over until the next session than to be precipitated through Congress at this late period, with all its faults and glaring inconsistencies upon its head. He agreed most fully with the Senator from New Hampshire, that it would have a tendency to create heart-burnings and distrust among those gallant officers of the army, who, after fighting the battles of the country, found all their well-earned claims neglected, and the honors and emoluments bestowed on those who made their campaigns at this metropolis.

The honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] in his explanation of the bill, had told us that, for want of a sufficient number of competent officers in the Engineer corps, citizens had necessarily to be employed, and read us a very formidable list of persons engaged, some at $12 and others at $8 per day, which, to his [Mr. C's] mind, indicated a very great piece of extravagance, as the wisest and best men the nation produced were sent here, and did not receive more than $8 for their services. In the war in Florida, too, it appeared that citizens had been employed, ay, and paid, three hundred thousand dollars, to cut wood and draw water, and make military roads. Why had not the soldiers been taken for these purposes? It appeared to him that one abuse only was to be corrected by the creation of another. Congress was, or ought to be, competent to correct them all at once. He was of opinion that that body was fully adequate to the task, and he called upon Senators not to pass the bill before them until it was pruned, or, at least, made just and equal in its bearings. He thought there was still time sufficient for the introduction of such clauses, at least, as would render it less objectionable than it was at present.

Mr. BENTON replied to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN] and regretted that he had not been in his seat a few minutes sooner, while he [Mr. B.] was replying to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIERCE.] He would then have seen that there was no ground for his fears from an overgrown staff; that there was a great error in supposing there were to be 133 staff officers, and only 13 line officers; and that it was all a mistake to suppose that the line was sacrificed to the staff. He [Mr. B.] had shown all this error before the Senator from Kentucky had got into his seat; but he would go over it again to show him his error, and to prevent him voting against the bill under wrong impressions. Mr. B then briefly recapitulated, showing that there would be about double as many officers of the line as of the staff, and that, so far from being excluded from the staff, upwards of thirty staff officers were ordered to be taken from the line, and, what was more, to be both line and staff officers at the same time. Mr. B. said the Senator from Kentucky seemed to be founding his objections to the bill, not upon the bill itself, such as it was, and such as it lay printed before them, but such as it had been described to be in a newspaper, (the National Intelligencer) and where all these errors about the 133 staff officers and the 13 line officers, and all these statements of invidious distinctions between line and staff, and to sow jealousy between them, and to excite animosity against the friends of the bill, were to be found. The newspaper statement had been shown by him to be a description of what did not exist; and if the bill passed, it would speak for itself, and would show that the newspaper account was entirely erroneous.

With respect to the troops serving in Florida, Mr. B. said it was not necessary for him to speak his sentiments of their merits. That he had done on former occasions, and when it was the fashion to revile and disparage. Mr. B. had defended those troops when they were attacked; and he was glad to see that both sides of the chamber now united in giving them the applause to which they were entitled. He did not, therefore, deem it necessary for him to repeat his opinion of those troops; but as the Administration seemed to be struck at, he believed he would speak with a perfect knowledge of the truth when he should say, that the President and Secretary at War were fully sensible of the services and sufferings of those troops which were in, or had been in Florida, and that, if the bill passed, the officers who had served and suffered there would find that they were not forgotten, or undervalued, when the new regiment came to be officered, or the staff appointments to be made.

Mr. B. was surprised at the distinctions which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] was making between the staff and the line officers. Did not the gentleman know that all the staff officers had been line officers, and had done their part in the services and sufferings of the field? Were not many of them as well scarred with wounds as any officer of the line? And were they not, in many instances, identical, that is to say, both line and staff officers at the same time? These officers of the staff are reproached with being in this city, as if it was not the post of service for most of them! Many of them were stationed in the city; and as for hanging about the halls of Congress, they were but little subject to the reproach. As the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, he [Mr. B.] knew that their presence was often necessary; that they came upon business; that he himself often applied to them to come in person and answer questions to the committee or to its chairman, both as more expeditious, and a more satisfactory way, than answering questions in writing. There were some staff officers who had hardly ever been seen in Congress: the late commander in Florida, the Quartermaster General Jesup, was one of these. He, [Mr. B.] in eighteen years' service in the Senate, had never seen him in the Capitol. It would be invidious to particularize; but there was a staff officer now, or just now, in the galleries, who was appointed to the staff twenty-five years ago, on the field of battle in Canada, and from the line, and who had served all round the circumference of the Union, north, south, and west, from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico; from the Falls of St. Anthony to the Creek nation and Florida, and who now, for the second time in his life, had seen this Capitol, and now only sees it on his way from Florida to the Northwest. He spoke of Major Brant, and who, if this bill passed, might be promoted to a lieutenant-colonelcy. He was one instance, and one only out of many which might be quoted, of the injustice of the kind of remarks which had been made.

It was complained that the officers of the staff, in some corps, were to have promotion; but was not this the case in the line? All officers of the line were entitled to promotion within their respective corps as high as the rank of colonel; and why not give the benefit of the same principle to the staff? Promotion is the life of every service. Man lives upon hope; and he must always see something in the future better than the present to invigorate and animate his exertions, otherwise he pines and languishes and sinks into despair.

The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] is persevering and excessive in his objection to the staff. Does he reflect that there can be no army without a staff? that there can be no military operations without a commissariat of subsistence to furnish food, a commissariat of clothing to furnish clothing, an ordnance department to furnish arms and ammunition, a quartermaster's department to furnish transportation, engineers to construct forts, topographical engineers for maps and drawings, paymasters to pay them, adjutants general for the dissemination of orders, the preservation of records, and the keeping and the right ordering of the details of service, and finally, a medical staff to care of the sick and wounded? Has the Senator from Kentucky considered that there can be no army without all these things; and that the departments which give these indispensable aids, must have their heads at the seat of Government, and their subordinates dispersed all over the country? Certainly, if he had considered these things, and also considered that the staff officers have no soldiers under them, he certainly would not have felt such objections to them, and such dread of them.

The Senator from Kentucky objects that $300,000 have been paid to citizens in Florida to do work and labor for the troops; and why were they so employed? Because the reduction of the army in 1821 left the companies with only 42 men in each; a number which, after making allowances for the usual casualties, would often reduce a company to 20 or 30 men for duty. The present bill raises the companies to 80 men; and if it passes, there will be no more occasion to employ citizens at five times the cost of soldiers, to do the work of soldiers.

Mr. B. again expressed his astonishment at the character endeavored to be given to this bill, as a mere bill for the benefit of the staff, and unjust to every other part of the army. He must be permitted, with the bill in his hand, to contradict the idea. The bill was a witness whose testimony could not be invalidated, and which would prove that the army itself, THE WHOLE ARMY, and not any subdivision, or favorite part of it, was the object attended to. The rank and file, the non-commissioned and the commissioned, the staff and the line, were all attended to; and beyond question it was the most general and universal bill in favor of the army, the whole army, which had ever been passed from the foundation of the Government. In the first place, it increases the rank and file and the non-commissioned officers in number between four and five thousand men. In the next place, it increases their compensation, by giving to every private, to every non-commissioned officer, and to every musician, a dollar more in the month. In the next place, it restores them their bounty money on enlistment. In the fourth place, it makes them a liberal allowance of sugar and coffee as part of the ration, and in consideration of surrendering the whiskey part of the ration. In the fifth place, it creates post chaplains, to be attached to remote posts, and to perform the double duty of inculcating the gospel, and giving instruction to the children of the post. Here are many advantages which enure directly to the rank and file and non-commissioned officers of the army. It puts them on a better footing in relation to their compensation than any army in the world possesses. As to the commissioned officers of the army, both line and staff, the bill gives an increase of compensation upon a new principle, and one of more uniform and equal operation than any other that could be devised. It is the additional ration for every five years' service. This will give to the officers of the late war, now in service, five or six additional rations per diem, and it will come equally to all, without regard to rank, but according to the time which they have served. It makes time the measure of this additional compensation, which is the fairest measure which can be adopted, as time carries forward all alike—the lieutenant and his family as well as the colonel and his family—while rank and promotion are irregular and uncertain, in some corps slow, and in some staff corps not at all until this bill shall give it. Besides this, this bill creates places for 45 new officers in the infantry and artillery, and besides makes several new places in the staff, and besides that authorizes above 30 line officers to be employed in staff duties, with the compensation of staff officers. The bill raises the pay of all the staff officers to that of cavalry pay; and this is an advantage to many officers of the line as well as of the staff, as many of them are to be employed in staff duties. But, the Senator from Kentucky, and the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CRITTENDEN and Mr. PIERCE,] object to the whole bill because it does not raise the pay of all the officers of the line to the same degree. Certainly the bill would be more acceptable to me if it did. I have heretofore, and often, labored for an increase of their compensation. I have heretofore stated, and now state again, that our officers are paid less than they received during the war of the Revolution—that while all the expenses of living have increased, and while all civil officers and the navy have received additional pay, the pay of the officers of the army remain where it was fixed in the year 1791. The bill would be more acceptable to me if it raised the pay of the officers of the infantry and artillery; but is it a cause for any friend of the army to vote against it that it does not? On the contrary, take the bill, and secure the good which it contains, and labor for the remainder hereafter. This is the wise course, in my opinion, for gentlemen to follow. It is the course which I shall follow. The bill does not contain all that I wish, but it does more for the army, the whole army, and every part of the army, than any bill has ever done since the foundation of the Government; and I trust it will be supported by every friend to the army.

In speaking of the bill before the Senate, Mr. B. said he had generally combined it with the supplement which he held in his hand, and which presented some amendments to obviate objections, and which the military committees of the two Houses had agreed upon in informal meetings, and which they had cast into a separate bill, in the form of a supplement, in order to save the main bill from all contingency in the process of amendment between the two Houses at this late and hurried period of the session. He now asked the Senate to pass the main bill, and make sure of it, and he held up the supplement containing the amendments which he should immediately offer. The course of proceeding was new in our Congress, but common in England, and was perfectly parliamentary, and strictly proper in a case like the present, where the main bill, though needing amendments, was too valuable to be hazarded in the last moments of a hurried session, when accidents and contingencies, no way connected with the merits of the bill, might cause it to be lost between the two Houses.

Mr. PIERCE said he had listened with pleasure to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] They had expressed sentiments which, he believed, were heartily responded to by every member of the Senate. This was doing justice to the line of the army in words, and, from the assurances given, he had a right to expect that some more substantial justice would be done at the commencement of another session. He did not doubt that this would take place, so far as the equalization of compensation was concerned; but, with regard to promotion, the bill precluded the hope of justice; it denied it, in terms, as he had undertaken to show in his preceding remarks; and he would be more happily disappointed than he had ever been before, if the nominations which would soon be made did not prove that his anticipations were well founded.

In relation to the pay of the staff and the line of the army, he had something more to say. It had been said that this odious distinction between the two arms of the service had existed from the very organization of the army. It was no new fact to him; it was one with which he was perfectly familiar, and his surprise was that it had been so long patiently submitted to. No course of legislation, unequal and unjust in itself, was to be sanctioned or rendered venerable, in his estimation, by age. Bad examples were not to derive respect from usage and precedent. He must know the reason of the distinction before it could receive his approbation. Was the distinction made on account of peculiar elevation of character, commanding and extraordinary qualifications? No: he claimed for the officers of the line no superiority in any respect, but he did claim equality, and challenged comparison. Was the preference claimed for the staff on account of superior services rendered, extraordinary exposure and fatigues endured, and dangers encountered? If so, when, how, and where? Mr. P. did not complain of the pay received by officers of the staff, or say one word in derogation of their merits; but he desired to know in what consisted their superior claims to the consideration of Congress and the country. Mr. P. said he knew full well that, within the last four years, the army had not been in favor. He would not inquire from what arm of the service popular sentiment had taken its tone; but for the three or four past years, the whole effective force of the line of the army had been in Florida; and with regard to their services there he had a few questions to ask, and some comments to make. It had become quite fashionable to sneer at services rendered in that disastrous warfare; and he wished now to ask, in the face of the Senate and of the country, whether, among those troops who had been ordered to repair to that sickly climate, (and who had obeyed the order) and to engage in most disheartening services with a horde of wild and cruel, but brave and artful, savages—in which service even the conqueror's brow was hardly permitted to wear the laurel, but in consequence of which, many a widow and orphan wept over the wreath of cypress, stained in a husband's or father's blood—whether there had been a single instance of shrinking from duty or from danger?—a single instance where the fight had not been sought, when there was a prospect of bringing on an engagement?—a single instance where a soldier's duty was not discharged in a manner becoming a soldier? If so, it did not come within his knowledge. Sir, said Mr. P. the circumstances of this service, the situation of the country, the character of the foe, has been most imperfectly understood; a country, until this war, entirely unexplored by the white man; a country abounding with creeks and muddy rivers, where the ordinary munitions of war could not be transported; full of impenetrable hammocks and inaccessible swamps; or, if accessible at all, only through "single file," or trail passages known to the savage foe, and to him alone; and through which he sought his lurking places, where he could not be followed, immediately upon the approach of our troops. In such a country, and against such a foe, as gallant and patriotic a little army as ever stood in the field had nobly done its duty.

Why, said Mr. P. I can speak with no patience upon this subject, and the manner in which this service has been regarded. I would award the meed of honor where it is due, whether acquired on the plains of Orleans, or on the banks of the Withlacoochie; and I would look upon no service as degrading where every man performed his duty as gallantly as has our troops in this unenviable service. No battle had been, or could have been, fought in that Territory except under the greatest and most manifest disadvantages, arising from the nature of the country, and the fact that it was wholly unexplored by aught but the savage; and yet when have our troops failed to avail themselves of any opportunity for a combat, no matter what were the disadvantages? Never, sir! The only difficulty with them was that of finding the foe. Recollect, Mr. President, the battles of the Withlacoochie and of the Wahoo Swamp—where men were fighting breast-deep in mud and water, without the possibility of charging upon the enemy, in consequence of the deep morass—and let me ask, was there ever more gallantry, or more devotion, displayed? And in the engagement where the invincible Taylor overcame the enemy on the Okechobee, the conduct of his gallant troops was beyond all praise. Mr. P. said he could not pass over that exhibition of gallantry without noticing it with some particularity. He had seen the official report to-day, and he would read an extract from it. After speaking of the first onset which was made, as usual, under every disadvantage, the report proceeds:

"The enemy, however, were promptly checked and driven back by the 4th and 6th Infantry, which, in truth, might be said to be a moving battery. The weight of the enemy's fire was principally concentrated on five companies of the 6th Infantry, which not only remained firm, but continued to advance until their gallant commander, Lieut. Col. Thompson, and his Adjutant, Lieut. Carter, were killed, and every officer, with one exception, as well as most of the non-commissioned officers, including the sergeant major and four orderly sergeants, were killed, or wounded. In one of the companies, but four men remained untouched."

Sir, said Mr. P. here is an exhibition of bravery, of cool determined courage, and patient endurance, not surpassed in the history of warfare. There was nothing to excite individual ambition; there was no bridge of Lodi; no battle of Wagram, of Lutzen; no "sun of Austerlitz" had arisen to excite them onward; the watchword was not glory, but my country and my duty. A savage foe was to be overcome in a position of his own selection, in an unexplored country. There was no parade, no "pomp and circumstance of glorious war;" there were the well-nerved and effective arm and the trusty weapon; every thing else had been necessarily left behind; and, under such circumstances, the officer must advance at the head of his column, and he did advance. The result is shown by the extract from the report. Every officer, with one exception, as well as most of the non-commissioned officers, including the sergeant major and orderly sergeants, were wounded; and in one of the companies but four men were left untouched!

Sir, said Mr. P. the spirit of the Revolution has departed. We do not celebrate gallantry; if we did so, the gallant services of the Sixth regiment of Infantry would be noticed as often as the day of our American independence shall hereafter recur, and the last words of the gallant commander, after he received his mortal wound, be recurred to and repeated to our children's children: "Soldiers! remember that you belong to the Sixth regiment." During the Revolution it would have found a place by the side of the celebrated exclamation, "Die or live, sink or swim," &c. Sir, said Mr. P. there is nothing in the history of warfare which discloses more individual bravery than the Florida campaign. I have omitted many exhibitions of that bravery; some because they are not proper for me to mention.* Young men under the age of twenty-one, who left their homes and families, where they enjoyed the ease, the comforts, and the luxuries of life, against the earnest remonstrances of their friends, have fallen mortally wounded while charging the enemy at the head of their columns, with a gallantry not surpassed even at Thermopylæ; and marched miles, while enduring almost the agonies of death, before medical aid could be obtained. And, sir, men who have been performing such services in a thankless war escape your notice! The dangers of meeting the very climate of Florida have been equal to those of Napoleon's army when led to sunny Italy, or called to endure the freezing blasts of a Russian winter; and our officers were called to endure the climate at the most dangerous season that it was possible to select for a Florida campaign.

Sir, where so many men have fought bravely, and have suffered, it would be invidious to call names; but I have met two of them upon the walks of your Capitol; to one of them I was introduced long ago, in my own State, although he is a Southern man. He was young, hale, healthy, and cheerful; and a man with whom I became almost instantly acquainted, from his frank and generous character. When I met him again, here, I did not know him. Pale, emaciated, and sallow, with his left hand he took my right, and said, "You do not remember me." I recognised him; changed as he was, his right arm broken to pieces with a bullet, his voice and eye were still familiar to me. Sir, said Mr. P. I did not know he had been in Florida; and so modest was he that he was indisposed to narrate the cause of his disability. He was in Taylor's regiment, and led a company in the desperate charge made by that regiment. I will read an extract from the report of the battle of the Withlacoochie, Dec. 31, 1835:

"Capt. —— was fearlessly brave, and although severely wounded, continued to head his company in the most gallant manner, until he received another severe wound, when he was taken from the field."

Mr. P. said he should be glad to see services rendered, and duties performed, like these, by men whom he knew to be competent to almost any station, suitably rewarded, even if it were to give them, in their disabled state, a place in the engineer, or topographical engineer corps, in preference to men who are their inferiors in rank, or who had in the army no rank whatever.

Sir, said Mr. P. that these offices are bestowed in this manner, the Senator from Missouri has admitted; but he has admitted them, at the same time declaring his disapprobation. The pay of the officers of the army had remained, as it now was, from 1791, (when the pay of the army was established lower than the pay of the officers of the Revolution,) to the present time. The pay of the navy has been raised within the last three years, and that branch of the service was now, he believed, liberally paid, and justly rewarded; although, as a member of the other House, he had voted against the increase, and on the same ground that he opposed this bill—because it made distinctions unequal and unjust, placing the staff above those who had fearlessly and gallantly done their duty in the face of the enemy. This bill provides for placing the staff upon a footing with the dragoon service. To this, Mr. P. said he had no objection. It also provides for increasing the pay of the soldiers and non-commissioned officers, and the officers of the army proper. The gallant men who have sacrificed their health in the marshes of Florida, and who, whenever called, have gone cheerfully into the field, are the only persons who have received no increase of pay since the act of 1791!

Mr. PIERCE would inquire of the chairman of the committee, whether the fifth section of the bill was intended to give an intimation to the Executive, that he was to appoint individuals to the topographical engineer corps, who were employed there temporarily under the law of April, 1824, whether they might be resigned lieutenants, or persons who had never been connected with the army? If this was not the intention, he did not understand its import; and if this was the object, he desired to enter his protest toto cælo. He believed there were officers in the army, fully qualified, who had done done their duty on the frontier and in Florida, to discharge the duties in any of the staff corps; and he protested against other appointments until those individuals were provided for. If gentlemen desired to enter the army, he wished them to take their noviciate in active service; and if brave and faithful there, he would urge their promotion to the staff with cheerfulness; but he had no expectation that selections would thus be made. There was little doubt, in his mind, that promotions would be made in a manne to verify the oft repeated saying, that one campaign in Washington was worth two in the field, in the face of an enemy.

Mr. BENTON, in reply to the question of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIERCE,] said that the bill itself contained the answer. The section in relation to the topographical engineers expressly provided that the officers to be appointed to that corps should be taken from the army, and from such of the civil engineers now employed as it should be deemed advisable to retain. The effect of this was to confine the appointments to the army, and to the citizens employed under the act of 1824. It gave the latter no legal right to be retained; but only such of them as should be deemed advisable; and of this the Senate would have to judge as well as the President.

PRE-EMPTION TO SETTLERS.

SPEECH OF MR CUSHING,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, June 13, 1838—On the bill to grant Pre-emption Rights.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I have two or three ideas touching this question.

Early in the debate, it was intimated by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] that this bill could receive little favor among the members from the North. This may be true. But I have considered the bill; and I am so thoroughly persuaded of its justice and propriety, that, even if alone, of all the members on this side of the mountains, I am prepared to give it my vote and voice.

My colleague [Mr. LINCOLN] seems to think the Legislature of Massachusetts has instructed the delegation of that State to resist the measure. I have no knowledge of any such instructions. I never saw them nor heard of them. I have made inquiry of individuals, and have turned over all the books, without being able to find a single line of instructions applicable to this bill. I am confident that no such instructions exist. Entertaining high respect for my colleague, and differing with him almost never on a question either of opinion or fact, when I do so, I feel bound to revise my own conclusions; and after careful examination, the only vote of the Legislature of Massachusetts, bearing on the subject, which I can discover on the files here, is the following, of April, 1836:

"Resolved, &c. That this Legislature approves of the principles of the bill now before Congress, for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands of the United States among the several States of the Union; and that our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their exertions to procure the passage of that bill into a law."

These instructions are very precise and specific. They instruct and request the members from Massachusetts to vote for a particular bill, a bill for distributing among the States the proceeds of the public lands. This bill is not that bill. Nor does one govern the other. The Legislature desired to have the proceeds of the public lands distributed among the States. It did not instruct us as to the mode of sale, or price, whether by public or private sale, with preference to any class of purchasers or not. This bill secures proceeds. It does no more, indeed, than simply to prescribe a mode of sale, or rather to allow to the actual settler a preference over the speculator, at a fixed price. The proceeds of sale, in this as in every other case, would be susceptible of distribution among the States.

I am confirmed in the opinion that the State of Massachusetts has left its members to pursue their own judgment in this matter, by the course they have actually pursued hitherto. The act of 1830, which has been treated in this debate as the foundation of pre-emption rights, received the vote of the only Senator from Massachusetts present [Mr. Silsbee;] and the votes of seven out of eleven members of the House present from that State, [Messrs. Davis, Dwight, Everett, Gorham, Hodges, Kendall and Richardson.] When the act of 1832 passed, it seems to have been considered so little objectionable, that the ayes and noes were not called upon it, nor even a division had, either in the Senate or in the House. The act of 1834 passed the Senate without opposition, or a recorded division, and received the votes of two out of ten of the members from Massachusetts present in the House, [Messrs. Choate and Everett.] One of the Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. Webster] supported this bill by speech and vote. And I have the proof before me, that the opinions of his upon the general subject which that vote indicates, are not new ones. On Monday, April 21, 1828, the bill to graduate the price of the public lands being under consideration, Mr. Webster proposed the following amendment, viz:

"That at any time, from and after the first day of January, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine, such portions of the public lands as shall have been offered at public sale, and shall also have been subject to entry at private sale for the term of —— years, and shall still remain unsold, shall, thenceforward, be offered at private sale, in parcels conforming to sectional divisions and subdivisions, at the rate of —— per acre.

"SEC. 2. And be further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for any head of a family, young man over the age of twenty-one years, or widow, not having received a donation of land from the United States, and wishing to become an actual settler on any parcel of public land authorized by the first section of this act to be sold at —— per acre, and not exceeding in quantity the amount of one quarter section, to demand and receive, from the proper register and receiver, a written permission to settle on the same, upon payment, to be made to the proper receiver, of the sum of —— cents per acre; and if such person, so applying for and receiving such permission, shall forthwith settle on the said land, and he or she, or his or her heirs or legal representatives, shall cultivate the same for five successive years, and shall be a citizen or citizens of the United States at the end of that time, then, on proper proof being made, before the register and receiver, of such settlement, cultivation, and citizenship, a patent shall issue for the said land to the person who received such permission, or his or her heirs or legal representatives. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged to all persons who may settle on the public lands, according to the provisions of this section, that no dispensation shall, at any time, be granted to any individual from complying with the substantial conditions herein prescribed. And if due proof of settlement, cultivation, and citizenship, as herein required, be not made within —— year next after the expiration of said five years, the said land shall again be subject to entry at private sale, as land belonging to the United States."

These references to the records of Congress prove, it seems to me, that the members from Massachusetts are not instructed in this question; and that they may well continue to vote upon it, as they have done, according to their own individual convictions, and with mutual respect and forbearance for each other's freedom of opinion.

Sir, I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] that every Representative here owes a paramount, or rather a primary duty to the State which he immediately represents; and if the public policy or the interests of Massachusetts were in my opinion injured by this bill, that fact would materially affect my views of the subject. I think that the bill, in those great ulterior consequences of it which gentlemen have alluded to, is beneficial to my constituents; and if this was the place and the time to go into that question, I would undertake to prove it. And, so far as regards the principles which the bill involves, they are directly sanctioned by the municipal law of Massachusetts.

That State has at all times possessed a valuable public domain, not only within its proper limits, but also in what is now the State of Maine; and the relation of Massachusetts to its public lands in Maine is in some respects the same as that of the United States to its public lands in the new States of the West. As in the latter case, so in the former, the public lands of Massachusetts in Maine, though within the jurisdiction of another State, are not subject to be taxed by it, and remain at the primary disposal of Massachusetts.

From the very outset, in the earliest days of that colony, it seems to have been held by its people that its public domain was to be administered, not merely for the benefit of the body politic, but also for that of the individual persons constituting the body politic. Accordingly, in 1629, the very year of the foundation of the colony, they passed the "Act assigning lands in the Colony of Massachusetts Bay to individuals," allotting two hundred acres to every adventurer in the common stock, to the amount of £50; one section of which read as follows:

"For such as, being no adventurers in the common stock, shall transport themselves and their families, it is ordered that fifty acres of land shall be allotted and set out for the master of the family," &c.

Here is a distinct indication of the policy of providing settlers for the public lands of the colony. And without minutely tracing the legislation on the subject down to our time, it will be sufficient to pause on the State law of [illegible], already cited by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HARRISON,] and

---

* In explanation of the above, we take the liberty to state that Colonel Pierce, of the army, brother to Senator Pierce, was one of the officers who fought with great bravery during the Florida war; and Lieut. McNiel, who fell at the head of his company, was nephew to Senator Pierce.—Ed. Globe.

the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS.] That law, as its title and its provisions prove, was designed to systematize the survey, settlement, and sale of the lands of Massachusetts in Maine. It contains the following section:

"SEC. 6. In every township to be laid out pursuant to this act, the commissioners shall set apart fifty lots of one hundred acres each, of average quality and value, no two lots of which shall be contiguous to each other, which shall be granted and conveyed to the first fifty settlers in said township, upon the payment of five dollars for each lot: Provided, That application be made to said commissioners, and a certificate obtained from them, authorizing the person applying for the same to enter on and improve the lot applied for: Provided, also, That every person, at the time of receiving such certificate, shall give bonds to the satisfaction of said commissioners, with condition that such settler, his heirs or assigns, shall, within one year from the date of said bond, build a house and barn upon such lot, and within five years from the date clear up and make fit for the purposes of agriculture at least ten acres of such lot; and upon the faithful performance of such condition, such settler, his heirs or assigns, shall be entitled to and receive a deed of the lot described in his certificate, conveying to him and them all the right and title of the Commonwealth to said lot; and said commissioners shall also set apart one lot of average quality and value, in each township, for the use of the first settled minister, one for the use of the ministry, and one for the use of schools, in said township."

Now, it may be, as my colleague [Mr. LINCOLN] suggested, that the Legislature, in passing this law, did not attain the object it intended; but the intent it seems impossible to deny. The provisions of the act are a distinct legislative recognition of the policy of placing settlers on the lands then held by the State. It promises a donation of one hundred acres to each of the first fifty settlers in every township. It makes reservations for religious and educational purposes. And the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HARRISON,] who has investigated the subject, informs the House that a similar policy has been adopted in most of the several States which possess a public domain of their own.* It is the self-same policy which I advocate in the matter of the public domain of the United States. Doubtless a conflict of interest may grow up on this point, when the domain of a State ceases to be within its own limits, and the population settled upon it is no longer its own. But that does not apply to the public lands of the Federal Government, in its relations, as a great whole, to the several States, all constituting integral parts of the United States.

There is another set of laws in Massachusetts and Maine still more pertinent to the present question. I allude, not to the ordinary case which enters into the municipal law of all the States, of rights in land acquired by length of possession, but to the particular case of betterment laws, so called, which I cannot distinguish in principle from pre-emption laws, each description of laws being applicable to persons who settle on wild lands without authority of the proprietor, and each protecting the betterments or improvements which those persons make.

It has been said that this law does not affect public lands, but private only; that the tenant who would avail himself of its provisions must proceed under color of title; and that a squatter would not get any right by the law. But such is not the fact. Even if the law applied to private persons only, and not to the Government lands, that would not help the other side of the argument; for if the Government may give title by intrusion, as against individuals, a fortiori has it the power and the right to do so as against itself. But the "betterment act" has been expressly adjudged to apply to the lands of the State, and to squatters; and instead of requiring the tenant to show color of title, the law is precisely the reverse; entry by contract is fatal to his claim, as decided reiteratedly in the courts of Massachusetts, Maine, and the United States. I have the statute before me, and some of the various decisions.

The law of Massachusetts, stat. 1807, ch. 75, extended by stat. 1809, ch. 84, and by stat. 1819, ch. 144, still further extended and made to cover all cases, (1 Greenleaf's Rep. 92,) re-enacted by Maine in 1821, after the separation of that State, and re-enacted by Massachusetts on occasion of the codification of her statute law in 1835, (ch. 101,) provides, that if any action be brought against one holding land by possession and improvement, for the space of six years, by himself or others, the jury may be required to assess the value of the improvements, and also the value of the land without the improvements; and if the demandant or proprietor elect to take the land, he must pay the tenant the assessed value of the improvements; or he may abandon the whole land to the tenant for the assessed value of the land in its wild state. Such is the substance of the law.

This law has repeatedly been brought under the eye of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. In one case, the Court say:

"The intention of the statute manifestly being to provide for those settlers upon land who had entered against the will or without the knowledge of the proprietor; and NOT for those who had entered under a lawful contract." (xii Mas. R. 330.)

In another case:

"The object of the Legislature in making the provision was to give relief to those who had entered without a title, perhaps expecting to obtain one; there being many persons in the Commonwealth who had entered upon wild land," &c. (xv Mas. R. 294.)

In another case, it is expressly admitted, as being in favor of those (but not those only) "who knowingly and wilfully enter upon lands belonging to others."—(xvii Mas. R. 357.) Indeed, the tenant, who holds under a defective title, which he believed to be good, is entitled to compensation for his improvements, even though in for a less time than six years.—(vi Mas. R. 303, and ii Gallis. 105.)

These and other cases in Massachusetts, reaffirmed in Maine, (1 Greenl. R. 357,) establish my assertion that the betterment acts apply to squatters, and secure their improvements to them. And this doctrine has been revised and approved in the Circuit Court of the United States.

The Court say:

"The statute (of 1807, ch. 175) * * makes no discrimination between an innocent possessor or purchaser and a trespasser knowing his own want of title, and acting openly in defiance of the rights of the legal owner. * * There is much apparent ground for arguing that the true reading of the statute is, that the tenant, entitled to the value of his improvements, must be one who has no title but by a possession and improvement. The words are, 'that where any action has been, or may hereafter be, commenced against any person for the recovery of any lands and tenements, which such person now holds by virtue of a possession and improvement,' &c. Now, the argument is, that a person who holds under a title, cannot be accurately said to be in by virtue of a possession and improvement, whether that title be defective or not. * * My opinion is, that this question was completely decided by the State court (of Massachusetts.) * * Deeming this THE SETTLED LAW OF MASSACHUSETTS, I feel myself entirely bound by it. * * And there is very strong reason to believe that THIS CONSTRUCTION HAS, IN PRACTICE, BEEN FOUND WHOLESOME AND PRODUCTIVE OF PUBLIC GOOD."—(iv Mason's Rep. 174.)

But this law, it is objected, does not touch the domain of the State. Well, I am prepared to clear up that point also. I have a case here from the Maine Reports, part of which I shall ask to have read, not only because it elucidates the betterment law, but because it affirms the moral equity and the justice of the principle common to that law and to the bill now before the House. The marginal note of the case is as follows:

"When one entered upon lands belonging to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, lying within the State, and continued there for more than six years, erecting a house, planting an orchard, and making other improvements, it was held in an action to recover the possession, brought by the grantees of the Commonwealth within six years from the time of their purchase, that the tenant was entitled to the benefit of the provision of stat. of 1821, ch. 47, commonly called the Betterment Act."

The counsel for the demandant argued, as it has been done here, that Massachusetts could not be dissolved; nor could a settler on her lands within that State, by a possession of any length of time, acquire a right to betterments.

The Court overruled this argument, and decided in favor of the squatter. They say:

"The protection of interests of this kind (settlers' improvements) has not, for nearly thirty years in Massachusetts, been regarded as inconsistent with the just rights of the proprietor. A law of that Commonwealth, which passed as early as 1806, lends its aid to vindicate his title and to restore to him his possession, but upon the condition that he pay for the additional value, derived from the labor and expense of those who may have held the land for the period of six years or more. The proprietor may, at his option, claim to receive the full value of the land, if unimproved; or, if he choose to retain it, he is not to enrich himself at the expense of the occupant, but is held to pay for its increased value arising from the improvements. This law, which has been re-enacted here since the separation, has become a rule of distributive justice, which has commended itself to the favor of the public for the equity of its provisions, and has received a liberal construction in the highest courts of both States. It relaxes the rigor of extreme right; and is intended generally to extend some indulgence to those who penetrate the wilderness, subdue the soil, and render it productive, and who usually have families depending upon the fruits of their labor. It has not accorded with the moral sense and enlightened justice of either State, to suffer a proprietor to strip the occupant of these fruits, so far as they have given additional value to this land, without compensation. This increased value is not considered as of right belonging to him, (that is, the proprietor.) If, therefore, in this suit, we award it to the tenant, as our laws and their laws require in ordinary cases, we do not impair the rights of Massachusetts, either according to our sense of right and justice or their own." (iii Fairfield's Rep. 373.)

And by statute, under the old process by information against persons who unlawfully enter and intrude upon or hold any lands belonging to the State, if the State prevail, the tenant is, in express words, entitled to an allowance for all improvements made on the premises, as in the case of individuals (Mass Rep. Rev. Stat. ch. 108.)

Such, then, is the "betterment act." The courts of justice, which are not slow to vindicate the majesty of the law against wrongdoers, say the act is right in principle. The people of Massachusetts have said so, by extending, enlarging, and re-enacting it, after the experience of successive periods of two, of twelve, and of twenty-nine years. And I recur to the position that there is no difference in principle between betterment laws and pre-emption laws. Each of them relaxes the rigor of extreme right in favor of settlers going on wild lands and making improvements. The betterment act, to be sure, requires six years' cultivation by a settler, or a succession of settlers; but then it is permanent and prospective in its provisions, and so, if it be more strict than the present bill in one respect, it is more liberal in another.

Leaving these analogies to the legislation of the States, I come to the bill itself, and its own intrinsic merits.

Sir, in the course of this debate, much has been said of the rights of the United States, as against these settlers; and the observations of gentlemen seem to me to betray some confusion of thought as to the nature and limitations of this right, of which they speak. If gentlemen contented themselves with discussing the question upon the policy and the law of the country, we should understand each other; but they reach out beyond and over the statute book into the unexplored domain of abstract right, and draw from thence terms of moral obloquy with which to overwhelm the settlers. Sir, it does not become us to employ any very lofty language on this subject. What ABSTRACT right has the Government of the United States to these very lands? How came we here? Gentlemen speak scornfully of squatters. If the Indians of this country were to speak out—they whom we found here, as Red Jacket said, in possession ages before us, and with title-deeds from heaven—were the Indians to judge the question, should not we, the Government of the United States, be but squatters, save on a grander scale? How came we here, I repeat? By intrusion upon the aborigines, by purchase at nominal prices, by fraudulent bargains, by conquest. We call this right. What right? The right of our strength. Any legal right? Yes; the conventional law, adopted by Europeans, and by us under and through them, that, by landing and burying a bottle in the earth, or planting a flag in the cleft of a rock, the nation so doing acquires a title to a thousand miles of the soil of this continent, to the exclusion of its aboriginal inhabitants. That cabalistic operation is the legal groundwork of this omnipotent right of yours.

Pushing this argument of the abstract rights of the Government to the extreme which some do, there is another point of regard, in which they are hollow and weak, and crumble away at a touch. Place yourself in the situation of one of these wanderers on the prairies of the far West. Suppose him to have read or heard tell of the theories which the books of philosophy teach us on this subject—the theory which I remember learning in my boyhood from the celebrated John Locke's Treatise of Civil Government.* Nay, he does not need to go to books for the theory; it is twisted into every fibre of the human constitution, and stamped upon the face of universal nature: the theory, that God gave the earth to be tilled by man; that by subduing and cultivating the wilderness he has mixed up with the soil something that was imprescriptibly his, the sweat of his brow, and the work of his hand; and that in so doing he has withdrawn from the common stock, appropriated, and made his own, that little modicum of his native earth which is thus commingled with himself. Independently of conventional law, such is indeed the primitive foundation of the rights of property, namely, the skill and labor of the individual man; as the protection of that skill and labor in what they accumulate is one of the great objects of law itself.

It is impossible not to feel this, in the midst of the vast uninhabited wilds of this country; to feel it as no longer a mere speculative theory of the books, but as a vivid present reality. Standing in the wide expanse of one of our great Western savannahs, solitary in the domain of Nature, will you tell me that I shall not shoot the buffalo or the antelope that crosses my path, or build me a cot by the river side, or plant a hillock of corn in the virgin soil that seems to invite and demand the presence of the cultivator? Will you tell me that the game I have hunted, the hut I have built, the corn I have planted, is not mine? Will you treat me as a criminal for reclaiming the wilderness from a state of nature, and making it habitable by man? Will you set up an abstraction here, one or two thousand miles off, that shall strip me of the fruits of my toil, and send me and mine houseless into the woods? Sir, you will not persuade me that this is justice. It is impossible. You cannot deal thus with the free hearts of the West. Their strong arms and bold spirits will scatter such iniquitous conceptions as these to the winds.

Mr. Chairman, I am ashamed to be arguing such mere abstractions to the House. But gentlemen drive the friends of the bill into this train of thought. They do it by the unreasonable excess of their condemnation of the settlers, and by the untenable grounds of assumed abstract right, which they take for granted, in uttering this condemnation. Away with abstractions, then. Let us come to the law of the land, and to a practical consideration of the facts as they are, the only rational rules to guide us in this matter. It seems to be assumed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MASON] that, upon the law of the land, the Government has all right, the settlers none. I say, the law of the land, which the Government makes itself, which it makes for itself, and which it makes as it will; but which law of the land is, after all, the true foundation of the rights and relations of property under every well organized Government. By law the settler has such rights as we the Government have chosen to give him, or such as we may now choose to give him; we having the power to measure his legal rights according to our sense of justice and of public policy. He has been treated in debate here as a mere outlaw. Is it so? The gentleman points me to the law of 1807, for preventing unauthorized settlements on lands of the United States, as the warrant for this idea. Let us look into that law.

It forbids unauthorized settlements on the public lands. That is plain enough. And that is the whole foundation of the language of opprobrium so freely applied to the settlers. But does the law say they have no rights as settlers? No; on the contrary, twice it speaks of the right, title, and claim of the settler; thus testifying, involuntarily, as it were, to the fundamental truth that skill and labor give rights. It says the settlers shall "forfeit all his or their right, title, or claim, if any he hath or they have;" and that "every right, title, or claim forfeited under this act shall be taken and deemed to be vested in the United States." That which is forfeited, that which being forfeited by one vests in another—mark the force of these legal phrases—is and must be something which exists. So that the very act which provides a penalty for unauthorized settlements, yet recognises an existing right in the settler: it does by no means consider him as a mere outlaw.

What may have been the origin of this law—whether it was enacted for the limited object specified by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. PRENTISS] or not—is immaterial to me. I take it as I find it. And I contend that, although, on the face of the law, the settler offends, yet to enforce it according to the letter would be that strictum jus or summum jus, which may be truly characterized as summa injuria; that, whether enacted in terrorem only, or for whatever other cause, it never has been enforced according to the letter; that the Government has

* The present administration of the State of Maine entertains similar views, embodied in a recent law passed on the recommendation of Governor Kent, who, in 1830, in the Legislature of Maine, spoke as follows:

"When, sir, as a legislator of the State of Maine, I cast my eye over these unfelled forests, ready for the axe of the pioneer of civilization, I cannot bring myself to the cool calculation of their market value, and rest contented if they sell well. In my opinion, sir, the first great object which we should have in view in all our legislation, is the settlement of those lands. The great point to which all our acts should tend, to present inducements to the hardy yeomanry of our land to migrate to these sections, so that in a few years the desert may become a fruitful field, and where now stands the native unsubdued forest, our eyes may be blessed with the sight of a free, enterprising, industrious, Yankee population, with their churches and schoolhouses. I deprecate the policy, sir, which regards these lands as an appendage to the Treasury Department; which views them only as a source of revenue; which is willing to sell them in large tracts to individual speculators, if a few dollars can thereby be placed in our coffers, although by these very sacrifices (I will not call them sales) the settlement will be retarded for years, and the suffering tenants may mourn in dust and ashes the hard-hearted policy which has placed not merely themselves, but their towns, under the control of an absent landlord."

* "God and his reason commanded him to subdue the earth, that is, improve it for the benefit of life, and therein lay out something upon it that was his own—his labor. He that subdued, tilled, and sowed any part of it, thereby annexed to it something that was his property, which another had no title to, nor could, without injury, take from him." (Locke, on Civil Government, bk. ii, ch. 5.)

"God hath given to the sons of men a twofold right to the earth. There is a natural right and a civil right. The first right was natural, when men held the earth in common, sowing and feeding where they pleased. Then, as men and cattle increased, they appropriated some parcels of ground by enclosing and peculiar manurance, and this in time got them a civil right." (Plantations in New England, Hutch. Sc. Pap. 30.)

a perfect right to remit the forfeiture of the settler's right which the act threatens; that, in fact, as if conscious of the injustice of the letter of the law, or of the impotency of all attempts to enforce it, the Government has perpetually intervened, in one way or another, by a sort of equity power, to remedy the unjust operation of the strict letter of law. They have done this, by pre-emption laws without number, dating far back anterior to the law of 1807, and so on, year after year, down to the present time.

Sir, one gentleman [Mr. RANDOLPH] speaks of the law of 1830 as the beginning of pre-emption rights; and another [Mr. ROBERTSON] says the land system was sound until 1830; as if that law innovated upon the preceding course of legislation. Not so. To enforce the strict letter of the act of 1807, after allowing it to slumber for thirty years—to refuse protection to the settlers by rejecting this bill—that would be the innovation. True, the act of 1830 is the first pre-emption law covering the whole public domain. But there is a multitude of old acts for classes or lists of settlers in Ohio, and all the other new States; and there is a long series of acts covering specific States, (or Territories;) as that of 1803 for Mississippi, (including Alabama,) of 1805, 1806, and 1811, for Louisiana, (including the country west of the Mississippi;) of 1808, for Michigan; of 1812, for Missouri; of 1813, for Illinois, (including the Northwest;) and of 1823, for Florida, Alabama, and Mississippi. Beside which, the act of 1816 contemplates the conversion of the whole mass of settlers into tenants of the United States. How is it possible to shut our eyes upon the fact that these relaxations of the system are as old as the system itself, that they are the equity running along, side by side, with the law, to remedy its defects and to soften its rigor?

Gentlemen opposed to this bill began the debate by assuming the general excellence of our system for the sale of the public lands, and deprecating pre-emption rights because of their being a departure from the system. But new light broke upon us as the debate proceeded. Instead of its being so excellent, so faultless, I hear member after member, on both sides of the House, declare that the auction sales, which constitute the first element of the system, are a downright farce. So says, among others, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] If the fabric itself be so ridiculous, it would seem to be scarcely worth while to maintain its symmetry at the expense of great injustice and hardship to individuals. But suppose the system itself were intrinsically as perfect as some of the arguments against this bill assume it to be, still that constitutes no valid objection to its passage. There is imperfection in every thing human, perfect as it might be in the main. It is the common case. There is one point, in which the system strains. It is unjust and impossible rigorously to carry it into effect, as against the poor and honest actual settler. A pre-emption law in his favor is the equitable modification of the standing law, by which that which is right in the general is saved from working injuriously in this particular application. It is the rectification for the unavoidable derangement of the machinery at this point.

What nation, it is asked, ever exhibited such a spectacle, prohibiting a thing by the general law, and continually sanctioning the violation of the law by special acts? I reply, it may well be that we are alone in this respect, as we are alone in the adoption of a policy which attempts to convert the public domain into a source of revenue. Other nations, situated as we are, have encouraged by all means the colonization and settlement of their lands, looking to the great object of building up industrious and prosperous communities in the wilderness, rather than the small one of extracting revenue from land sales. No other nation, probably, seeks or pretends to do what is impossible, namely, to exclude settlers from its wild lands.

For suppose the bill to be rejected. Suppose we decide that the settlers are entitled to no favor. What will you do? Thousands of settlers have entered on the unsurveyed lands, doing it in the conviction that they wrong nobody, expecting that pre-emption rights will be conceded to them as they have been to others, perceiving that the Government has never enforced the act of 1807, and that pre-emption rights have been recognised by almost every Congress from that time to this; I say they have proceeded, under such circumstances, to make to themselves homes in the West. What will you do? Will you endeavor, at this late day, to reawaken the slumbering vitality of that law? Will you prosecute the settlers under it? Why, every man in his senses must know that it would be impossible to obtain convictions, or rather impossible to obtain a competent jury, any where in the region of these settlements. Will you oust the settlers by force? It would be well to count the cost before undertaking that. Will the President send a marshal to drive these men from their homes? Sir, that would be civil war. These men are courageous, daring, accustomed to danger and hardship by their forest life, and not the men to yield passively to what they conceive to be deep injustice. Your Scotts, and Jesups, and Bradys, and Arbuckles, and Dodges, and Atkinsons, would be gloriously employed in leading troops—if they could find any willing to be led in such a cause—against their own peaceful fellow-citizens. Have we not wars and rumors of war enough on hand, without getting up one against our own people? Is the Government prepared for this? I am not, for one. Instead of outraging these men, it is our duty and interest to favor them. They stand on the outposts of the country, upon that Western frontier which may, at any moment, become the theatre of a desperate contest with the savages, in which, if such a contest should unhappily come, we need the services of these very men, the hardy pioneers of the West, for the defence of the border States. It is impossible to enforce the law against them; it would be madness to drive them to extremities by attempting it. I stand upon this physical impossibility. There is no other practical alternative. And it is the part of a wise Government to concede gracefully that which it cannot and ought not to refuse.

The settlers have been denounced as men of lawless habits and character. I do not believe this. Doubtless, they want the polish mannerism of city life. But they are men adapted to the circumstances that surround them, manly and bold, inured to toil, with minds and bodies fitted to grapple with the perils and privations of a pioneer life. They who have bought land of the Government at the Government price, and then settled on it, and they who have first settled, and now stand ready and anxious to pay the Government price, are the same class of persons. Condemning one, you condemn both; that is, the whole of the frontier population; which is unjust to them every way. It is a mistaken idea that such of them as are on the public lands are less regardful of general law than their neighbors. Why, then, do they go upon the public lands? I have a little book here, lately published, a description of Wisconsin, which explains this. It seems that Iowa, the new Territory beyond the Mississippi, has more inhabitants than Wisconsin proper. Why is this? Not because they are speculators, rapaciously seizing upon the best lands, as gentlemen seem to imagine; but the contrary. My little book says:

"We may perhaps safely say that eastern Wisconsin has a population at this time of about 20,000; and Iowa, or the district west of the river (Mississippi) of about 25,000. * * The emigration to the western side of the river was greatly increased in consequence of the spirit of speculation having been so widely and destructively diffused over the eastern part of the Territory. * * The industrious emigrant finds many of the best lands in the hands of the speculator, and he is compelled to move onward to the West, until he can settle on lands to which he may have his pre-emption right, or at least be able to purchase at the Government price, without being obliged to purchase at an enchanced price from the capitalist." (Observ. on Wisconsin, p. 111.)

Gentlemen who oppose this bill have a great deal to say about speculators; and in what they do say, they contradict themselves very strangely. At one time they tell us these pre-emptioners are lawless speculators, planting themselves upon the choicest parcels of the public lands. At another time, they are described as poor men, incapable of taking care of a few acres of land, the victims and the prey of speculators. There is, I think, much error and exaggeration in all this. Certainly, the actual settler is more to be favored than the mere speculator. Still, men will speculate in the public lands, as in every thing else which is bought and sold. They may do it lawfully, they may do it honestly. But gentlemen from the West, enemies of this bill as well as its friends, have assured the House that the great field of speculation, and of combinations of speculators, is at the auction or other sales of the Government. And as for the settlers, there is no more reason why they should not have the power to sell that part of the fruits of their labor which is invested in improvements, than that part which consists of crop or cattle. It was the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD] I think, who suggested in argument against the bill, that the settlers were improvident men, who would lose their improvements to shrewder men around them. That is a singular objection. If it proves any thing, it proves that settlers of this class should not be allowed to buy land of the Government at all, or indeed to have property of whatever description. A poor man is not to have property, not even that which he has fairly earned by hard knocks, unless he can first show satisfactorily that he is skilful in keeping, as well as industrious in acquiring, property! What sort of doctrine is this? Not such as I can approve. Ours are institutions of equal laws for all. The same free field of competition is open to the rich and poor alike. If either has more claims on us than the other, it is the poor man, who has less of the advantages of fortune. Him, at any rate, we are not, because of his being disfavored already by fortune, to disfavor further by law; especially if he be the pioneer, who is the first to open the wilderness to cultivation, and the first to be called upon to fight the battles of the country in the hour of danger.

Sir, the House perceive that I disagree altogether with the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MASON,] who regard the settlers as men deserving of no favor. I hold the contrary. I honor the enterprising men who carry their stalwart limb and free-spirited hearts into the Western woods and prairies, and subdue the wilderness to the dominion of our civilization and our laws. I deny that this indicates any lawlessness of character. Who are these men? Are they not, many of them, our own friends, neighbors, and people—fellow-citizens of ours from the Atlantic States, who remove to the West, not to live a life of idleness, but to carve out for themselves a competency by laborious industry, in that noble field of enterprise and of toil? They are the instruments and the evidence of the expansive energies of our country and our institutions. If among them be some of less orderly tempers, the better for us who remain behind. Western emigration is the safety-valve of the Union. It serves to relieve the more crowded population of the old States; to relieve them of those evils of a condensed society, with crime and extreme poverty in its train, which are the curse of many parts of Europe; to relieve us of all the uneasy and exuberant spirit which is compressed and fretted in populous communities, but which finds ample scope for the beneficial expansion of its energies in the wide West.*

* "There is, probably, no people on earth with whom business constitutes pleasure, and industry amusement, in an equal degree with the inhabitants of the United States of America. * *

"Labor is as essential to their well-being as food and raiment to a European. This national characteristic of Americans, together with their love of independence, is a complete commentary on the history of all their settlements, and the progress of manufactures and commerce. Thousands of persons who, as servants, or in other inferior walks of life, might be able to provide for themselves in the large cities, emigrate to the western woods, to procure for themselves a larger field of enterprise and useful occupation. There is no hardship or privation incident to the lives of new settlers, which their robust and athletic constitutions would not willingly suffer, to gratify their insatiable desire after active and independent labor: there is no pleasure within the range of all a city can afford equal to the proud satisfaction of beholding the daily results of their indefatigable exertions. These phenomena it would be in vain to explain by the mere spirit of adventure. There are no gold mines in the Western States; no active commerce equal to that from which they emigrate; no accumulated wealth to allure their covetousness. The riches of the soil can only be explored by active labor and a series of harassing details, connected with the sacrifice of every convenience of life: the commerce of the explored region is to be created by new roads and lines of communication, which call for new and increased exertion on the part of the settlers, and it is only after a period of many years their sturdy industry can hope for an adequate reward of ease and prosperity. Such prospects are not apt to allure the weak, either in body or mind, and require a determination and steadiness of purpose totally incompatible with the vague and loose spirit of adventure. Neither is there any thing in the character of the Western people which could give the least foundation to such a suspicion. They are a hardy, persevering race, inured to every toil to which human nature can be subjected, and always ready to encounter danger and hardships with a degree of cheerfulness which it is easily perceived is the effect of moral courage and consciousness of power. * * *

"It appears, then, that the universal disposition of Americans to emigrate to the Western wilderness, in order to enlarge their dominion over inanimate nature, is the actual result of an expansive power which is inherent in them, and which, by continually agitating all classes of society, is constantly throwing a large portion of the whole population on the extreme confines of the State, in order to gain space for its development. Hardly is a new State or Territory formed before the same principle manifests itself again, and gives rise to a further emigration; and so is it destined to go on, until a physical barrier must finally obstruct its progress." (Grund's Americans.)

The Confederacy does not want wild lands to be hoarded for the uncertain hope of revenue. If it did, this bill would not materially interfere; since it requires the settlers to pay the Government price of $1 25; and the average sales since 1823 have only yielded $1 27.920 But what we as a Government want is men, tax-paying men, free nations to pay, and to fight if need be. Or, as Sir William Jones well said, it is not lands, nor battlemented walls, that constitute a State, but "men, high-minded men." I rejoice, therefore, in the growth and prosperity of the rural population of the country. I am for protecting and encouraging all, the commercial, the manufacturing, and the agricultural; but it is the latter, the producing class, they who raise the very necessaries of subsistence, which is of primary necessity to a nation; and which is at the same time among the freest and the hardiest by habit of life; and are they to be the objects of obloquy and reproach? These are the men, reared in Nature's lap, the fearless cultivators of the virgin soil of America, commemorated by the great poet:

> The freeborn forest found and kept them free,
> And fresh as is the torrent or the tree.

Their leading characteristic traits, devotion to liberty, enterprise, perseverance, courage, love of labor and activity, are the very elements of our country's greatness. I do not relish the language of censure applied here to such men. They deserve all reasonable protection at the hands of this Government; and so far as I can contribute to give it to them, they shall continue to have it.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not enter at present into the great question of the future disposition of the public domain of the United States. I have said, and I repeat, that I do not think it for the good of the country, or its inhabitants, that the public lands should be hoarded as a source of revenue. Very soon we shall have to take up the general question in earnest. As at present administered, the fund derived from the land sales is the chief cause of the irregularities in the fiscal action of this Government. The lands themselves are the object of perpetual sectional jealousies, and the means of infinite political corruption. They make this Government the greatest landlord in the country, and thus give to it overwhelming patronage and power in the new States. He who shall come forward to put an end to this state of things, who has courage to run the hazards as well as to deserve the honors of attempting to carry through a plan for adjusting the relations of the States individually and of the United States to the public domain—though, like Tiberius and Caius Gracchus in reviving the Licinian law of the Roman Republic, he should fall a victim to the attempt—will deserve well of his country. Meantime, I shall vote for this bill, as a measure beneficial to the actual settlers, the men who encounter all the hardships of converting the wilderness into cultivated fields, and of preparing it to be the seat of civilization and of freedom, and of new communities, the future members of our Confederacy.

PRE-EMPTION TO SETTLERS.

SPEECH OF MR. ROBERTSON, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, June 13, 1838—On the bill granting Pre-emption Rights.

MR. CHAIRMAN: The disposition of the public lands becomes every day more and more a subject of profound and exciting interest. The claims of the pre-emptioners, now so strenuously pressed upon us, certainly merit our candid consideration; but they are of trivial moment, compared with those of another description, which have been passed by almost unnoticed by those who have taken part in the present debate. I allude to the deep stake held by the original States, and, above all, to the peculiarly imposing claim of that State which you,* sir, as well as myself, represent. It is time that these great interests should attract the attention of Congress, and some final measure be devised for placing them on a just and satisfactory basis.

Whatever may be our opinion of the pretensions set up by the pre-emptioners, we should adopt no partial legislation on their behalf, while higher and better claims are left unadjusted. The Treasury cannot much longer require the resources arising from the sales of the public lands. Let us then, sir, understand what ultimate destination it is proposed to give them. Shall the old States be allowed any share of what they generously yielded for the common benefit? Shall the proceeds of sales, when no longer required for revenue, or the lands themselves, be distributed among all the States in just proportions? Or shall the whole be surrendered, with or without equivalent, to the States in which they lie? These, sir, are momentous questions in all their bearings. The geographical divisions to which they inevitably tend are far more dangerous than those of a political or party character merely. But, sir, they must be met. Unless the interests to which I have adverted are to be forever abandoned, delay will but aggravate the evil! The time, too, is as favorable as perhaps will ever again occur, to adjust them on fair and satisfactory principles; and, by so doing, we shall, in my estimation, deserve more of the country than by creating a Sub-Treasury or a National Bank, or adopting any scheme, however perfect, for regulating the currency. Perhaps, if we narrowly examine our own hearts, we may find ourselves in this, as on other occasions, too much swayed by selfish considerations. Let us endeavor to discard all such, and confer together in a spirit of conciliation. Quiet, if you will, the pre-emptioners in their unauthorized possessions; satisfy, if you can, the insatiable cupidity of speculators; comply with the wishes of the Western people, by graduating and reducing the price of the public lands, if such measures be within the limits of your authority and consistent with good faith. Sir, I should dishonor the State we represent, by asking, on her behalf, what she is not entitled to demand; justice, bare justice, is all she ever sought; and I should dishonor myself, if, viewing the signs of the times, I could stand by and see her just claims overlooked, her rights wrested from her, without an effort to maintain them. If I know myself, sir, I have no other feeling towards any portion of our wide-spread Union than that of warm attachment; but I must frankly say that I love, above all, the State which gave me birth. Nor will Western gentlemen, who now, and on all occasions, so zealously defend the interests of their own constituents, condemn me for vindicating those of mine. I go further, sir. They boast, and justly, perhaps, of the growing importance and power of the new States; but when they find an Eastern or Southern man seeking by undue concessions to conciliate their favor, I warn them not to trust him. If treacherous enough to sacrifice the rights and interests of his own constituents, with a view to selfish ends, they may rest assured he will never prove true to others when the same motive shall prompt him to betray them.

The subject of the public domain, Mr. Chairman, has been discussed as if the United States possessed an unlimited right to dispose of it at their will and pleasure. Such, sir, is not the fact. They hold a large part of it—all that ceded by the States—under solemn stipulations, which they cannot violate. They are mere trustees; and the terms, being in themselves essentially just, apply with equal moral force to the lands since acquired by purchase. These propositions would seem too clear for argument. I will not enter at large into their examination, nor cite the many great names by which they have been demonstrated. It will be all-sufficient to refer to the opinions of one whose authority this committee will not question. General Jackson, in his Message of 5th December, 1833, putting his veto on the land bill, takes a full view of the rights of the States, and asserts the obligation of this Government to maintain them. It will be gratifying to his friends, no doubt, to refresh their recollection by citing the doctrines of this learned jurist. I do not know—I must say, in answer to a gentleman near me—whether it was this veto Message which raised him to the rank of doctor of laws, or whether the degree was conferred for the learning displayed in the proclamation or protest. Be this as it may, the argument alluded to, so far as respects the present question, was never refuted, and I believe it to be irrefutable. Permit me, sir, to cite a few passages.

After giving a history of the waste land held by the original States, he speaks of the motives which induced them to surrender it. He quotes the terms of the cession made by Virginia, (1st March, 1784,†) and the clause in the Constitution giving power to Congress to dispose of the territory of the United States ‡. He then says:

"The Constitution left all the compacts before made in full force, and the rights of all parties remained the same under the new Government as they were under the Confederation."

And adds:

"By the facts here collected from the early history of our Republic, it appears that the subject of the public lands entered into the elements of its institutions. It was only upon the condition that those lands should be considered as common property, to be disposed of for the benefit of the United States, that some of the States agreed to come into a 'perpetual union.' The States claiming those lands acceded to those views, and transferred their claims to the United States, upon certain specific conditions, and on those conditions the grants were accepted. The solemn compacts, invited by Congress in a resolution declaring the purposes to which the proceeds of these lands should be applied, originating before the Constitution, and forming the basis on which it was made, bound the United States to a particular course of policy in relation to them, by ties as strong as can be invented to secure the faith of nations."

This, sir, is strong language.

Adverting to the ordinance of 1787, which he tells us was made to secure to the Government of the United States, forever, the power to execute these compacts in good faith, he quotes the article which declares that the new States shall never interfere with the primary disposition of the soil by the United States, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers.

From all this he deduces several distinct propositions, affirming, in substance, the obligation of the Government to dispose of the waste lands, for the common benefit of the States, according to the proportions stipulated in the deeds of cession. The pledge of those lands for the payment of the public debt he considers as practically conforming to this obligation. But that debt, he says, may be considered as paid, and the lands consequently released from the lien.

Now mark the grounds, sir, upon which he rejected the land bill. I will refer to the first two objections only. In a spirit of concession, perhaps too liberal, the bill proposed to give to the new States 12½ per cent. out of the proceeds, and then to divide the residue ratably among all. Referring to this proposal, he says:

"The bill begins with an entire subversion of every one of the compacts by which the United States became possessed of the western domain, and treats the subject as if they never had existence, and as if the United States were the original and unconditional owners of all the public lands."

Again:

"This twelve and a half per cent. is to be taken out of the nett proceeds of the land sales, before any apportionment is made; and the same seven States which are first to receive this proportion are also to receive their due proportion of the residue, according to the ratio of general distribution.

"Now, waving all considerations of equity or policy in regard to this provision, what more need be said to demonstrate its objectionable character, than that it is in direct and undisguised violation of the pledge given by Congress to the States, before a single cession was made; that it abrogates the condition upon which some of the States came into the Union; and that it sets at nought the terms of cession spread upon the face of every grant, under which the title to that portion of the public land is held by the Federal Government?"

His second objection is founded upon the same principle:

"In the apportionment (he observes) of the remaining seven-eighths of the proceeds, this bill, in a manner equally undisguised, violates the conditions upon which the United States acquired title to the ceded lands. Abandoning altogether the ratio of distribution, according to the general charge and expenditure, provided by the compacts, it adopts that of the Federal representative population. Virginia and other States which ceded their lands upon the express condition that they should receive a benefit from their sales in proportion to their part of the general charge, are, by the bill, allowed only a portion of seven-eighths of their proceeds, and that not in the proportion of general charge and expenditure, but in the ratio of their Federal representative population."

Having thus warmly reprobated the injustice of depriving the old States of any portion of their just share in the public domain, he proceeds to observe:

"The Constitution of the United States did not delegate to Congress the power to abrogate these compacts. On the contrary, by declaring that nothing in it 'shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State,' it virtually provides that these compacts, and the rights they secure, shall remain untouched by the legislative power, which shall only make all 'needful rules and regulations for carrying them into effect.' All beyond this would seem to be an assumption of undelegated power."

Such, sir, was the respect manifested, some few years past, by the Chief Magistrate of this Union—himself a Western man—for the obligation of this Government to redeem its pledge and execute its contracts in good faith—these invaluable monuments, as he termed them, of an age of virtue, patriotism, and disinterestedness. But a new light has dawned upon us, and doubts begin to be suggested as to the true meaning or obligatory force of explicit engagements, the most solemn that could be devised to secure the faith of nations. This Government, it is more than insinuated, may sell the lands for a nominal price, or surrender them unconditionally to the States in which they lie; and these ideas, strange to say, are thought to be shadowed forth in the official communications of the same Chief Magistrate, who so triumphantly asserts the rights of all the States to an equitable participation. It must be acknowledged, sir, that there is some ground for this charge of inconsistency, gross as it is. In his message of December, 1832, General Jackson says: "It seems to me to be our true policy that the public lands should cease as soon as practicable to be a source of revenue, and that they be sold to settlers in limited parcels, at a price barely sufficient to reimburse the United States the expense of the present system, and the cost arising under our Indian compacts." And adds: "It is desirable that, in convenient time, this machinery be withdrawn from the States, and the right of soil and the future disposition of it be surrendered to the States, respectively, in which they lie."

He repeats these suggestions in the very message from which I have just quoted an argument demonstrating that such surrender would be a palpable violation of our plighted faith.

The present incumbent, following in his footsteps, insinuates the same policy, and almost in the same words. He tells us in his last annual message, that "the time will come when it will be the true policy of the General Government, as to some of the States, to transfer to them, for a reasonable equivalent, all the refuse and unsold lands, and to withdraw the machinery of the Federal land offices altogether." Both the present and last Administrations, it would appear, then, concur in recommending a surrender of the lands. But, more just or more wary than his predecessor, Mr. Van Buren does not propose to yield them up without an equivalent. Nor, indeed, can it be believed that Gen. Jackson, although he does not in terms propose an equivalent, could have intended so gross an outrage upon rights he had himself so ably vindicated. It is strange enough that he who considered the division among the States, in the ratio of their representation, as the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of a surplus of general revenue, should find an insurmountable difficulty in dividing among them the proceeds of the public lands, which this Government is expressly bound to dispose of for their common benefit. But it is inconceivable that he who pronounced the division of those proceeds, as proposed by the land bill, an undisguised violation of the pledge given by Congress, because it gave an advantage to the new States of 12½ per cent. only beyond their due proportion, could have contemplated a gratuitous surrender of the whole. I cannot ascribe to him an intention indicating so unaccountable a perversion of intellect, or so monstrous an obliquity of the moral sense. The very grounds on which he rejected the land bill, I repeat, present an unanswerable argument against the pretension. I could hope to add nothing to the force of that argument, were I to attempt it. I am willing to leave it where he has placed it; and will now turn to the question more immediately involved by the bill on your table.

When we compare the operation of our land system, as it was admirably organized previous to the fatal act of 1830, we cannot fail, sir, to be struck with the contrast. In place of order and fair dealing in the conduct of public sales, and perfect security of title, we have introduced confusion, fraud, and insecurity. The reasons assigned in favor of this and the subsequent pre-emption laws have not satisfied my mind of their policy or justice. Gentlemen differ among themselves as to the true grounds on which they should be defended. Some regard the privileges they confer as a favor bestowed on the poor; others as a just right, founded on merit at least, if not on law. The gentleman from Mississippi who has just taken his seat, [Mr. PRENTISS] takes the bold ground that the act of 1807, prohibiting settlements upon the public lands until authorized by law, is to be regarded as repealed or obsolete; that the conduct of the Government has been such as to invite settlers to take possession, and that it is its interest as well as its duty to protect them. There is much plausibility, sir, as well as boldness, in these propositions; but they will not stand the test of examination.

It is true that pre-emption laws have been granted, from time to time, from an early period; but they were partial and local in their operation. It was not the practice of those who at that time administered our Government to invite aggressions upon the public property, nor, unless for peculiar considerations, to sanction them after they were committed. It seems, sir, that they were but in the horn-book of politics—not half a century, but a century and a half, at least—behind the enlightened statesmen of the Jackson era. THEY were simple enough to imagine that some respect ought to be paid to the laws of the land. One of their earliest measures, founded upon that antiquated notion, was to prohibit unlawful entries on the public domain. They actually treated it as an offence; and, as far back as 1785, required a proclamation to be issued, warning all persons against committing it. Those who followed them continued to blunder on in the same way for a succession of years. In 1807 they went much further. They not only authorized the removal of all intruders by the marshal, and, if need be, by military force, but subjected them to a criminal prosecution—to fine and imprisonment.

Nor can it be said that this law has ever been repealed or has become obsolete. Had the gentleman from Mississippi more closely examined the past history of our legislation, he would have found that Congress not only refused, even upon the application of the Legislature of his own State, to relieve against the law of 1807, but that they repeatedly reasserted the policy that law was designed to enforce. I will not fatigue the committee, sir, by a special reference to the earlier recognitions of that policy, nor comment upon them. I will refer those who doubt to the more recent reports only, (in 1824, '25, and '26) from the Committee on the Public Lands of this House, composed, I doubt not, then, as now, for the most part, of Western men. No general law was ever passed confirming illegal settlements, until that of May, 1830; nor did that law, nor either of those since passed in 1832 and 1834, repeal the act of 1807; they quieted the settlers in possession, but did not legalize such entries in future.

The gentleman from Mississippi contends that the act of 1807 is to be regarded as abrogated, because it has not been enforced. He asks, why has the Government neglected to enforce it? Sir, I echo the question, and should be glad to hear a satisfactory answer. How, sir, has it happened that the last incumbent of the Presidential office, above all, has permitted these settlements to go on unchecked, until the intruders are numerous enough to defy the power of the Government? Had he been as vigilant to prevent violations of law in the West as in the South, this state of things could never have arisen. There has been a shameful dereliction of duty on the part of the Government; and the consequence is, a ruinous sacrifice of public interests and depravation of public morals. In 1830 the Executive was informed of fraudulent combinations, between the settlers and speculators, to keep down the price of the public land, and share the spoils among themselves. The information was communicated in obedience to the call of this House, on the 25th day of May, and then only in a dry, naked transmission, by the Secretary of the Treasury, of the letters he had received, without stating that any measures had been taken to suppress or defeat such vile attempts. This communication was immediately followed up by the act of the 29th of the same month, rewarding all intruders, up to that time, by giving them a right of pre-emption; not merely to a sufficiency for their support, but to a full quarter section of one hundred and sixty acres; and when the same quarter section has been settled by two, allowing to each what is called a float—that is, the privilege of entering eighty acres apiece, in addition. What, sir, have been the fruits of the new system? Shall I refer you to representations of Gwin, one of the registers of the land office, giving an account of fraudulent combinations between the settlers and speculators, and expressing the opinion that the sales in his district in 1833 were void, and the purchasers liable to prosecution? His statement has been already commented on by gentlemen on both sides, and the House will take it for what it is worth. I pass on to the account given us by one acquainted with the land system for many years. I allude to Gideon Fitz, the late register at Mount Salus. In a letter addressed to the Commissioner of the Land Office, he expresses his regret at the feverish anxiety manifested by members of Congress to make alterations in the land laws, and pronounces the pre-emption act of the 29th of May, 1830, the most unguarded, and, in all respects, the worst, land law ever passed in the United States.

[Mr. PRENTISS inquired what was the date of the letter.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. The 16th January, 1831.

[Mr. PRENTISS. That was too soon after its passage to judge of its operation.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. True, sir, it was but the beginning; we had but tasted of the bitter fruits it has since so abundantly yielded.

In a subsequent letter (20th of March, 1831,) he says, "it is not to be expected that the settlers will pay up in one year," the period limited by law; "nor the land freed from intruders." You observe, sir, he calls a spade a spade. "In general they will do no such thing, and at the end of the year a large additional number will be settled, claiming equal privileges with their neighbors, and uniting to elect members of Congress who will promise to continue the pre-emption privilege, from year to year, forever." He then alludes to the injuries likely to result to fair purchasers as well as to the public. "Cultivation in 1829, and possession on 29th May, 1830, is all that is required to give the pre-emption privilege. If a child, a slave, or hired person, without regard to age, sex, or color, should have cultivated a hill of corn, potatoes, or ground peas, on the land, in 1829, the father of such child, the owner of such slave, or employer of such hired person, and the person and child themselves, living on public land, may claim the right of pre-emption long after the tract may have been purchased by an innocent and honest purchaser, and houses, gins, and fields, made thereon, worth thousands of dollars." He then goes on to describe the improvements made by the pre-emption claimant.

"They may be so obscure," he says, "as not to be observed by a purchaser, even if he had examined the land for that purpose, or such improvement may never have existed: if it be proved in the land office, it will be sufficient to get the title." Again: "If a person had cultivated a hundred tracts, more or less, scattered all over the district, by himself, negroes, hirelings, or children, each having a hill of corn, potatoes, goober peas, or one turnip, he could keep all those tracts out of market one year; for he may select which he pleases just before the close of the term, or may not purchase any." He tells us that many innocent and honest purchasers will probably be stripped of their labor and improvements, and that the mischief to them is likely to be ten times greater than the injury would have been to lawless settlers.

The gentleman from Mississippi asks, would I give the benefit of the settler's labor to speculators? He would have but little right to complain of such a measure, if it were adopted. If a hardship, it would be one brought upon himself by a voluntary breach of a public law; and one to which every man subjects himself who takes possession of land belonging to others. But, for myself, I would not give the benefit of his labor to the speculator; and I would equally disdain to transfer it to the public coffers. Nor is there any danger he will be subjected to so rigorous a measure. Mr. Fitz informs us that settlers generally have but small improvements, and for these it is common among purchasers to pay them a generous price, both at public and private sale. There have been, he says, very few complaints of hardship of that nature in this district. But no man, sir, should be rewarded for setting the laws at defiance. It is going quite far enough to let him keep the land, not at the minimum price, but on condition of paying its full value, deducting his improvements from the estimate, or allow him their value when the land is sold to others. When the settlers really are objects of charity, it would be far better policy, Mr. Fitz suggests, to make them donations at once, upon proof of their inability to purchase, confining them to the lands subject to entry. When we reflect, sir, that there are upwards of eighty-eight millions of acres of land open to entry, at one dollar and a quarter per acre, it would not seem there was much occasion to make further provision for the most indigent. But when we recollect that, under the pre-emption laws, they pay the same price for lands on which they have unlawfully settled as for those which they may lawfully enter at private sale, the pretext is seen to be wholly unfounded. Were it otherwise, the poor are not confined to the West. There are sufferers also from poverty in the old States, and probably in greater numbers. If you may lawfully give away the public lands to the poor of one section of the Union, so may you to those of every other. If you can bestow the public lands in gratuities, so may you the public money. Draw funds, then, sir, from the Treasury, and distribute them with even-handed justice among all who need them.

† "That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for or appropriated to any of the before mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

‡ "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

But there is no pretext for giving to the poor this unjust privilege; nor do they, in truth, derive the principal advantage from it; that is reaped by the very speculator of whom it is the custom to profess so strong an abhorrence, and whom it was the avowed object of the pre-emption laws to defeat. We have the express testimony of Mr. Fitz to prove this. The rich, he says, are the persons benefitted in the end, because the poor cannot pay for the land. It would seem, as he says, that pre-emption rights were but of very little use to those who are not able to pay for them. Sir, the fact speaks for itself. By a document printed during the present session, it is shown that 2,371,363 acres of land have been paid for under those laws since May, 1830. The payments, at the minimum price, amounted to nearly $3,000,000, an enormous sum to be paid by the poor, and which would have sufficed to furnish 20,000, had there been so many, with eighty acre tracts, to be selected out of nearly 90,000,000 acres open to entry; that is, to give them permanent settlements without violating the laws. Those who can pay for lands they are forbidden to enter, can surely pay the same price for those they are authorized to purchase. But, it may be said, they sold a part of their pre-emption right, to enable them to secure their settlements. No doubt, sir, this was often the fact; and it follows that the privilege, to a great extent, has enured to the benefit of the speculator. The floating privilege almost invariably, I presume, fell into his hands; and this, it is admitted, was the chief source of profit.

But sir, the gentleman from Mississippi, aware of this, disdains to rest the claims of the settler on the plea of poverty. He takes higher and more independent grounds. Exclusive of the right founded on the culpable neglect of the Government to execute the law of 1807, and the occasional relief extended to those who had violated it, he represents the system as conducive to the public interest. I will not deny that the settlement of the country enhances the value of the public lands; but I insist there are inducements enough to settle them, without giving to the lawless intruder or the keen speculator an advantage over the fair purchaser. Town sites, mill sites, lands on rivers and elsewhere, worth, on an average, from five to twenty dollars per acre, are greedily seized upon by these Government favorites, at the same price paid for the poorest pine barrens. The rest of the community have no chance to purchase but at second hand and at a high price. This is the statement of the register at Mount Salus. Nor does he stand alone in reprobating this new system. Mr. Ethan Allen Brown, the Commissioner of the Land Office, after full time had elapsed to see its operation, speaks in terms equally strong of the frauds and mischiefs to which it has given rise. In a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 28th of January, 1836, he gives it as his confident opinion that the privileges conferred by it, covering at least four millions of acres, joined with outrageous combinations to intimidate purchasers, have diminished the receipts from public lands in a single year, (the year 1835,) full three millions of dollars; at a moderate estimate, below what they would have brought in fair competition. He tells us, even were no frauds practised, still the selections of the most valuable lands and the most desirable situations, at the minimum price, would produce an effect upon the revenue too considerable to be overlooked by the financier.

[Mr. PRENTISS here asked leave to enter into an explanation. He said he did not believe in the correctness of Mr. Brown's statement. If the result was as Mr. B. supposed, still the loss did not arise altogether from the pre-emption system; that system had authorized floats, and those entitled to them had a right to fix them on the best lands; on a paradise, if they could find one. He did not admit that the system was impolitic. Though it might benefit speculators, it did not injure the Government. The Government would have got no more at public auction. The price at public auction, on an average, had exceeded that obtained under the pre-emption laws but a few cents per acre. It was the auction system that produced the greatest mischiefs. If any part of the system was rotten, the whole was rotten.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. It was sound enough till 1830. The first speck was then discovered, and was occasioned by the pre-emption act of that year. It has become, I doubt not, thoroughly rotten since. But, sir, the gentleman must excuse me for saying that I rely more upon the official statements of such men as Fitz and Brown than upon any conjectural estimates or paper calculations founded on the comparison of prices obtained under the pre-emption laws and at public auction. The frauds and combinations which are known to be practised, the very operation of the pre-emption system itself, must have kept down the price at the public sales. When millions of acres of the very best lands have been taken possession of at the price of the most indifferent, it will not do to say that the Government would have got no more. These lands were worth, as we are told by those who know the fact, from five to twenty dollars, and must have commanded, if openly and fairly sold, a price more nearly approaching their value than one dollar and a quarter per acre. The price paid by the speculator for pre-emption rights justifies the estimate made by Brown. Those rights cost him, as I am informed by an intelligent member of this House, on an average, about six dollars per acre for the whole quarter section, (160 acres.) Now, sir, upwards of sixteen hundred thousand acres were paid for under the act of 1831 alone. Allowing them to be worth on an average ten dollars per acre, they would have brought more than sixteen millions of dollars. The Government received about two. If these views be correct, the Government lost the whole difference. But if it lost the half, or the fourth, Brown's estimate is still greatly below the mark. Gentlemen deny this: they say the Government would have received no more than it did, had the lands been sold at public auction; and that, therefore, it is better to give the advantage to the settler than the speculator. Sir, the speculator gets the better part as it is. If the Government cannot command the fair value of their land, in consequence of fraudulent practices, it is our duty to unite in endeavoring to suppress them. No system can be devised, perhaps, that will altogether prevent them; but that is no excuse for submitting to notorious frauds, and incurring the enormous sacrifices we are now sanctioning by law. It is not the auction system, it would seem to me, but the pre-emption system, that give rise to the fraudulent and lawless combinations so much complained of by our land agents. Nor are they wholly to be ascribed to the privilege of floats, which all concur now in denouncing. Neither the Commissioner nor the registers of the land office confine their objections to them. They tell us that the settlers and the speculators made common cause in swindling the Government: and reprobate the whole pre-emption scheme, as tending to produce fraud and confusion. The settler is not always content with having the pre-emption privilege once. When the tract on which he has settled is worn out, Fitz tells us, he will move to another, and be ready to sell another float. The land, gentlemen tell us, is open; and he has a natural right, it seems, to take possession wherever he will. Yes, sir, the world is all before him, and—I had nearly said—Providence his guide; but no, sir; Providence directs no man to seize upon what does not belong to him. "He" (the settler) "says he would be a great fool to buy land, because those who have purchased land and reside on it have no such privileges." Well, sir, the gentleman from Mississippi thinks this is all as it should be. The settler, he says, cannot know the precise line which bounds the public lands; that there are no lawyers there to tell him what constitutes a trespass. Sir, this plea of ignorance will not do. The settler, probably, may be unable to find the lines; he may not know whose land it is; but he cannot be so ignorant as not to know it is not his. It requires no counsel learned in the laws to tell him that. He need only consult the monitor that ought to be in the breast of all—the most ignorant as well as the wisest. The gentleman from Mississippi would scarcely permit the land to be wrested from him on so flimsy a pretext.

Nor can this intrusion be compared with the trespass committed in hunting a hare, or cutting down a bee-tree; these acts imply no claim of title.

[Mr. PRENTISS said: Neither did the settler, in his State at least, set up title in opposition to the Government.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am glad to hear it. But if this be so in Mississippi, I apprehend it is not so elsewhere. The gentleman from Michigan, if I did not misunderstand him, in vindicating the pre-emption laws, alluded to the danger encountered by those who, at the public sales, should purchase lands held by unauthorized settlers. He expressed a hope that our legislation would be such as to do away the necessity of attending those sales armed with pistols, dirks, and Bowie knives. We are to legislate, then, it seems, with threats that the laws now existing cannot be enforced. I have a newspaper, sir, giving an account of what is called a settlers' meeting. It took place last winter, at a place called Upper Des Plaines, which I believe is in Illinois. I will produce the paper if any gentleman desires it. At this meeting numerous resolutions were adopted, for defining the bounds and quantity of land held by the settlers in the unsurveyed territory of the United States, and for preventing the holding of claims solely for speculation. Commissioners were appointed, and regulations prescribed for the settlement of disputes relating to boundaries, titles, &c. and all who refused obedience to the orders of these commissioners were to be considered inimical to justice and good order, and treated accordingly. What kind of treatment they were to receive may be readily understood from the allusions made by gentlemen on this floor, and the accounts given by your registers and receivers. This looks, sir, pretty much like a claim not to title merely, but of jurisdiction; like a determination to supersede all law, and, after making settlements upon the public lands without authority, to maintain them by force.

Nor is this all, sir; not satisfied with picking and culling the best lands for cultivation, they are now apparently preparing to claim similar privileges in respect to the mineral and other lands heretofore expressly reserved from sale or entry. The fact appears from a communication in a newspaper, handed me yesterday by a member of this House. But, strange to say, the complaint seems to be not that these valuable lands should be claimed under the pre-emption laws, but that the speculator should get the profit instead of the settler. The writer considers all the lands in the mineral districts, except certain school lands and canal lands, as now liable to sale under the act of 26th of June, 1834, in like manner as other lands. He affirms that many tracts of land claimed by the actual settler, to which the right of pre-emption was refused, on the plea of its being mineral land, and which was not offered for sale at public auction, but excluded from sale by order of the President, had since the day of sale been entered at private entry. This is regarded as great injustice to the miners, who have better claims, no doubt on account of having been the first to seize upon it.

[Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana said they were not trespassers, but employed to dig the mines by the Government.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. They were authorized to dig for minerals, and paid for their labor. But that certainly gave them no title to the land.

[Mr. GARLAND rejoined that he had not so asserted.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. This, sir, is the effect of your pre-emption system. The question is not how the Government is to be protected from fraud and loss, but who shall enjoy the privilege of plundering it. In this contest, sir, I shall take no part. If the Government is to be defrauded, it is indifferent to me whether it be by the speculator or the settler.

The gentleman from Mississippi avows that he will, to all future time, claim the benefit of the pre-emption laws in favor of all settlers. I admit the frankness of the avowal. He is dissatisfied with the President's last message, because it recommends, after the present session, an abandonment of the system. He says it is too milk and water. Why, sir, what else did he expect? The President is of an accommodating and conciliatory disposition. He naturally desires, as politicians always do, to satisfy all. He says something in favor of the law, and something in favor of those who violate it; something for the West, and something for the East, and the North, and the South. But, sir, I agree with the President that the law ought to be repealed or enforced. It will not do in this hall to say it cannot be executed. Why, sir, if the western States themselves were to sustain the settlers in their open defiance of law, I should expect their representatives on this floor—all, at least, of the Democratic Republican party—to raise the cry of nullification, and to recommend an immediate recourse to the proclamation and force bill. Surely those who threatened with military execution the rebels of the South, for refusing obedience to an unconstitutional measure designed to oppress them, and who spoke of chastising a sovereign State of this Confederacy, will not suffer the laws to be trampled upon elsewhere with impunity, or tell this House they dare not disperse a band of unlawful intruders upon the public property.

Mr. Chairman, the culpable neglect of the Government, though it is no justification, affords some excuse, perhaps, for the settlers; nor, sir, should I be willing to see measures of undue severity adopted towards them. But it is easy to prevent the recurrence of similar intrusions for the future. If our condition, however, be such that the Executive cannot or will not enforce the law, then, sir, I repeat, we should repeal it. The present state of things should not be permitted to continue. The United States, as our land agent tells us, are now in fact "hiring intruders to go on the public lands, and bribing them not to buy." Did France, or England, or Spain, or the private land companies, which gentlemen have commended for pursuing a course so much more liberal than ours, ever adopt a policy like this? Pay a man to transgress the regulations made for the security of their own possessions? No, sir, it was reserved for the enlightened statesmen of the Jackson era to adopt so incongruous and anomalous a policy—to denounce an act as criminal, and at the same time hold out encouragements and rewards for committing it—to refuse to the honest and conscientious the privileges conferred on the lawless and unprincipled. Sir, we have not only changed our code of laws, but I fear have adopted a new code of morals. It is the custom now to speak of those who trample the laws under foot as a meritorious class. The time was when the term was applied to those who respected the institutions of their country, and were prepared at all hazards to defend them. It is a merit now to despise them. For the soul of me, sir, I cannot comprehend the merit of the act so much commended, even if it were strictly lawful. There is no more merit in a man's seizing on a fine tract of land for a fourth or a tenth of its value, than for helping himself to the best slice of a fat turkey when he is hungry. Sir, a change has come over us. While we are zealously pressing forward the claims of the meritorious settler who seeks to benefit himself at public expense, and make them the special order of the day, the services of the Revolutionary soldier remain in many cases still uncompensated; we refuse to devote an hour to consider them, and lavishly bestow the very land acquired and defended by his toil and blood among those who seize upon it without law and against law.

The pecuniary losses, Mr. Chairman, sustained by the public are by no means the worst consequences resulting from the present system. It is regarded by men on the spot, and who have every opportunity of forming a correct opinion, as demoralizing in its tendencies—productive of infinite confusion, fraud, and perjury. I beg the committee to examine the facts and observations contained in the document printed by the order of this House in April, 1836, (Doc. No. 211,) and especially those contained in the letters of the register at Mount Salus.

[Mr. GARLAND inquired if the gentleman from Virginia would endorse the statements.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Certainly not, sir. I endorse the statements of no man with whom I am not personally acquainted. But the gentleman from Louisiana will not, I presume, impeach the veracity of Gideon Fitz.

[Mr. GARLAND said he made no such charge. Fitz himself, however, had speculated in public lands.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that he engaged in fraudulent speculations?

[Mr. GARLAND. I do not say that.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Then, sir, he was an honest speculator. His conduct proves that he was a vigilant and faithful officer—yes, sir, and a bold one, too—who durst to utter the truth, where it must have been considered little short of treason. Sir, Fitz speaks of the whole system as impracticable; as calculated to bring into fierce action two of among the worst passions of the human heart—avarice and revenge; and to occasion the most extensive schemes of speculation. "The idea," he says, "has become widespread among old and young, that there is no harm in defrauding the public; that is fair game." "I am persuaded that when persons, of tender age at least, learn to get valuable property by hard swearing, they will in the next generation transfer their plans from the Government, to operate on individuals." He goes on to describe the confusion in the register's office. "Hundreds of questions," he says, "are put, to know the meaning of a law no more ever understood." No, sir, I verily believe, not even those who passed it. How should they? It was taken up some three or four days only before the close of the session, amidst a mass of unfinished business, and, with the help of the gag, carried the next day through all the forms of law. It was approved the same day it was passed, or rather approved in advance; and now, sir, the whole country is astonished at the results of such hasty and crude legislation, radically changing a system framed with great care and deliberation.

"The books, papers, and maps are whirled through a house from place to place, and a dozen persons claiming to first in to prove. Then twenty more wish at once to know what they have to prove. The great difficulty is general over when it is known WHAT is to prove."

[Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, inquired whose letter the gentleman from Virginia was reading.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. It is a letter from Gideon Fitz, register Mount Salus.

[Mr. JOHNSON. Is the gentleman of Virginia acquainted with him?]

Mr. ROBERTSON. No, sir, but I refer the gentleman to Louisiana to his colleague, who sits near me, [Mr. GARLAND.] I understand from him that Mr. Fitz has been long in the public service, and bears a high character for integrity.

[Mr. GARLAND rose and said that Mr. Fitz had been sent, at an early period, (1806,) to Louisiana, by Mr. Jefferson, and had, since that time, continued in the land business, in the employment of the Government. He had never heard any imputation on his character.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. It is scarcely credible that any man of bad character would have been appointed by Mr. Jefferson, and continued in such an office under every succeeding administration for thirty years. Would to God there were many such officers in the public service as Gideon Fitz. Sir, it is because his letters give evidence of integrity and ability that I have brought them so fully to the attention of this House. They are the official statements of a man thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and of unquestionable veracity; and they are of a character to compel me to oppose the renewal of that system whose operation he has shown to be every way pernicious. He tells us its demoralizing effects have disgusted the community; and I concur with him in the hope he expresses that it will never be renewed.

Gentlemen complain of the want of liberality on the part of this Government, and of the original States, towards the West. These complaints, sir, have no just foundation.

[Mr. PRENTISS disclaimed having made the charge.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. I did not allude to the gentleman from Mississippi; but more particularly to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HARRISON,] who gave us a long list of grievances. He spoke of large sums expended for the benefit of the Atlantic States, on the Army, the Navy, fortifications, &c. Sir, it is not my intention to state an account current; but let him who will engage in that task, and I am much deceived if he does not find any thing but an ungenerous policy pursued in reference to the new States. Have gentlemen forgotten that this Government has paid out of the common Treasury for Louisiana and Florida, principal and interest, nearly thirty millions of dollars? That, in the last ten years alone, the amount expended in extinguishing Indian titles, and for defending the frontier settlements, and other matters connected with the Indian department, is estimated by the chairman of Ways and Means at about 46 millions of dollars? Do they forget the appropriation for the Cumberland road, exceeding seven millions of dollars, and almost exclusively a Western improvement? The grants for seats of Government, schools and colleges, roads and canals? Yes, sir, for these objects, to say nothing of large sums in money, this Government has bestowed upon the new States between 14 and 15 millions of acres of land: a quantity exceeding that which has been acquired by purchase in Indiana or Illinois, and nearly equal to that sold in Ohio, and now sustaining upwards of a million of inhabitants; while that State which, on the express condition of enjoying a proportionate benefit, made a voluntary donation of the domain now constituting those large States, the State of Michigan, and the Territory of Wisconsin, has received an amount in money too paltry to be mentioned, and not an acre of the immense region which was once all her own. Sir, the old States too have rivers and roads to improve, and sons and daughters to educate. It ill becomes the West to complain of their injustice or illiberality, and its present condition alone furnishes conclusive proof to repel the charge.

We are told of the great amount paid by the Western people into the Treasury, for the public lands; and this is spoken of as a drain of money from them. Sir, those who paid for these lands received more than a full equivalent, and far more than a just proportion has found its way back to them. But in truth the drain was from the old States; it is their population and their wealth which has been drained, and which has made the West what it is. We, sir, cannot but know that it is owing to this cause, in part, that comparatively our commerce languishes and our fields are deserted. Our brothers and our sons have been tempted to emigrate in search of fresher and richer lands. But however, sir, this may affect our prosperity, we can never cease to rejoice in theirs; we can never forget that we are connected with them, not by ties of political association merely, but of blood; nor harbor towards them an unjust or unfriendly sentiment.

Mr. Chairman, it is the common interest of all that the public domain should not be wantonly sacrificed nor unjustly apportioned. In seeking to prevent this, we manifest no hostility to any section of our country. It may suit the purposes of politicians to keep these questions open; it may enable them, as has been said, to buy up votes. But it concerns every friend of that peace and harmony which should prevail among us, to bring about a speedy and satisfactory adjustment. All that is wanting to effect this is a mutual disposition to assert no claim which honor and conscience do not approve; let no State urge unfounded pretensions to superior merit or exclusive title. It does not become the descendants of those who fought side by side in the noblest of all causes—the cause of liberty—to engage in a contest for petty pecuniary advantages. The original adjustment of this vexed question by them, under circumstances of much greater difficulty than those now presented, affords us an example well worthy to be followed. They indulged the hope, no doubt, that they had laid the foundation of a lasting friendship. I fear, sir, that hope is not to be realized; that their arrangements, on the contrary, just and liberal as they were, are to prove the source of enduring enmity. The seed of discord has been sown among us, and the tree is already springing, destined unless we now cut it up by the roots, to spread its branches far and wide, and darken the face of our Union.

Let the Representatives of the new States themselves come forward with their propositions; divide the lands themselves, or the proceeds beyond the wants of the Government, according to the terms of their original compacts; or distribute them among the People, on the principle of the Georgia lottery law; or dispose of them on any principles they may deem more fair and equal. They will not, I am confident, propose a surrender to one or more States, exclusively, of what belongs equally to all. The States in which the lands lie have no better right than others; nor would the new States themselves consent to such a proposition, should it ever be seriously made. In some of them nearly the whole of the public domain has been disposed of, and the money paid into the Treasury. The effect of the scheme alluded to, therefore, would be to divide the five or six millions of acres remaining in Ohio among upwards of a million of inhabitants. In Illinois and Indiana half that number of inhabitants would receive probably four times the quantity of lands. In Michigan, some eighty or one hundred thousand persons would divide among them twenty or thirty millions of acres; and the citizens of Wisconsin, when admitted, would probably share in a still greater disproportion. This inequality would never be tolerated among the new States themselves, leaving the claims of the original States wholly out of view. But these claims cannot be willingly abandoned. Let the same benefits be extended to all. I speak not, sir, of a division scrupulously exact, as to dollars and cents, or acres, or thousands of acres. Those States which have already made generous sacrifices for the public good will be ready again to concur in a liberal policy. I can answer for one, sir, which, neglected, oppressed as she has been by this Government, has never besieged it with eleemosynary petitions for any peculiar privilege or unjust advantages. But, sir, no communities can long subsist together which do not mutually observe justice towards each other. It is not in the nature of man to submit to glaring injustice or wanton injury. Give us, then, some measure that savors of equality; and let us settle, at once and for ever, this disturbing question.

SPEECH OF MR. JENIFER, OF MARYLAND.

In the House of Representatives, Friday, July 6, 1838—

On the bill to prohibit the reissue of the notes of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. SPEAKER: When I came into the House, an hour since, I was surprised to hear my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] discussing the merits of the bill now on your table, or rather I was at a loss to know how that bill came there at the present time, knowing that various others had precedence on the calendar. But upon learning the manner in which it was brought about, and knowing in whose charge the bill had been placed when it came from the Senate, I ceased to be at all astonished. I was aware that a political measure could set aside parliamentary rule in this House whenever it might subserve the views of the party. This bill, when it came from the Senate, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, reported on by that committee, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. From that moment, the Judiciary Committee ceased to have any rightful control over it; and before the bill could be brought into the House, out of its order, it required two-thirds to suspend the rule for that purpose. This, it is well known, could not have been obtained; and some indirect means must be resorted to, to do that which could not be directly got at. Whenever the presiding officer of the House is disposed to connive at irregular proceedings, it is always easy to find the means of accomplishing them, and some individual to propose them.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, my colleague, [Mr. THOMAS,] understands well parliamentary manœuvring, as also party discipline. He therefore, by a preconcerted plan, as it appears, moves "to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, that it might be brought into the House and acted on." And, notwithstanding the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had not had the bill under consideration one moment, they are discharged from its further consideration, the bill is brought into the House, and the previous question demanded; so that a bill, which the Senate deemed of so much importance as to consume days in the consideration and discussion of, was to have been forced upon its passage here without a moment's warning. Does any member doubt that all these arrangements were made before my colleague moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill? The plan being arranged, the Speaker entertains the motion, the committee are discharged, and the bill would now be bepound the control of this House, but for the premature demand for the "previous question" by the member from Maine. Such was the anxiety of the member to perform his part in this achievement, that this motion was made before the question pending was stated or put by the Chair. To this premature movement are my friends from Mississippi and Virginia, [Messrs PRENTISS and WISE,] as well as myself, indebted for this opportunity of exposing the artifices which are resorted to, to effect the measures of "the party."

Mr. Speaker, I will ask, what gave rise to this bill? Who was the originator of it? And for what purpose is it to be pressed in this House, at this late day of the session, to the exclusion of so many important bills, both public and private, which might otherwise yet be acted on before the close of the session? Three Sub-Treasury bills of the same tenor have been sent to this House by the Senate, all of which have been rejected by the immediate representatives of the people. A fourth came from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] of similar import; that met the same fate. Not content with having kept the country in an agitated, dissatisfied position for the last twelve months—having her currency deranged, her commerce at a stand, a prostration of many important interests—another effort is to be made still further to affect her currency. But this is not all: the effect and operation of the bill on your table admits of great doubt whether the penalties which are intended to be inflicted on the old Bank of the United States may not reach the innocent, unsuspecting holders of its notes. This impression has already taken possession of some of those who have those notes on hand; if such be the construction of the provisions of the bill, it renders still more obnoxious the unprecedented irregularity and haste which have characterized the whole proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, have not your repeatedly rejected Sub-Treasury experiments, and your abortive efforts to affect the character and standing of the Bank of the United States, convinced you of your impotency to do that institution further harm? You profess that all those measures are intended for the benefit of the people, and that you are only carrying out their wishes; that a war has been waged by the banks against the Government, and that the banks are responsible for the derangement of the currency. Were a demagogue upon the stump to hold such language as this, the intelligence of the people would laugh him to scorn; yet this, and much more, equally ridiculous, has been frequently repeated upon this floor. Sir, there has been no war waged by the banks against the Government: on the contrary, the banks have been too willing to bow to the Executive will; and had it not been that the requirements of the Government were too exorbitant for even their political morality, the banks might yet have been at the command of the Executive, and expanding and contracting as orders might come from the Secretary of the Treasury. For not acquiescing in these demands they are denounced by the very Executive who endeavored to make them subservient to his views, and charged with having caused the derangement of the currency, which it was their interest as well as policy to preserve sound and uniform. No, sir, the war which has been waged, and is still raging, is of a much more dangerous character; one which, if not checked in time, will number the days of this Republic. It is a war of the Government against the well-known wishes of the people! It is a determination on the part of the Government to disregard their interests, and to adopt their own measures, contrary to the consent of the people. It is the use of means to induce a violation of representative duty, immoral in practice, and, in the language of President Jackson, unless arrested by the people, "will lead to corruption and bribery." I am sure, Mr. Speaker, I am not misunderstood; recent events fully justify the language I have used. That Executive influence has been brought to bear upon the deliberations of both branches of Congress will not be denied. How far it has been successful, a few facts will enable you to determine. After all other schemes and experiments to coerce this House to yield its assent to the various Sub-Treasury plans recommended by the Executive, registered by the Senate, and supported by the faithful here, this bill is sent to us from the same body, the ordinary course of proceedings departed from, and by a trick in legislation is to be passed into a law, that the Executive vengeance may still pursue the Bank of the United States. This is but small game, indeed, for a Government. This bill originated with, and was, whilst in the Senate, under the especial charge of a gentleman, (now no longer a member of that body, and, therefore, it is not unparliamentary to speak of him,) an active co-operator and steadfast adherent to Executive plans, wilfully and knowingly misrepresenting his constituents; and now, at the close of the session, as his term of service expires, receives his reward from the President by being appointed Attorney General of the United States.

This gentleman [Mr. GRUNDY] has been an advocate for the establishment of a branch of the Bank of the United States at Nashville, Tennessee, his place of residence; and now proposes, by this bill, heavy penalties upon that Bank for issuing its own notes. This is the dying agony of Executive vengeance against that institution. After having deprived the country for so long a period of all other sound circulating medium, the expiring effort is made to drive out of circulation that which is admitted to be the best; that which the people have the most confidence in, and which even you, Mr. Speaker, prefer to any other: I mean the notes of the Bank of the United States. They form now, as they always have done, the best means of exchange throughout the whole country.

The time has gone by when the people will longer be deceived in relation to this matter. But a few years since, when all the power of President Jackson's Administration was brought to bear on the credit of the Bank of the United States; when it would have cost any man his office to have been known to take the notes of that bank in preference to those of the pet banks; when the then Secretary of the Treasury, by a labored argument, endeavored to prove that, as its charter approximated to its end, its paper would be below par, and cease to be a circulating medium; at that very moment and up to the present, the office-holders and politicians who were foremost in denouncing that institution and its paper received their notes in preference to any other, and hoarded them up as gold and silver. But President Jackson said that the Bank was insolvent; and all his sycophants said it was so. Yet none believed it. The pet banks grasped the notes of the Bank of the United States, and would not pay them out, except as a matter of favor, keeping them in their vaults in preference to gold or silver. These facts, in more than one instance, I myself know. I will here, Mr. Speaker, take occasion to mention a case which occurred during the "panic" of 1834. A gentleman of high respectability and integrity of purpose, a warm, devoted friend of General Jackson, residing in the country, having a considerable amount of various bank notes in his possession, alarmed at the various rumors he had heard, went to Baltimore to convert them into specie. Amongst other notes, he held some of the Bank of the United States. Upon consulting with his Jackson friends there, he concluded to get rid of the United States Bank notes, and take in their stead those of pet banks only. He came to Washington with his pet bank money, and, after taking advice from his friends here, although one of those banks at that time was in fact the Treasury, and the principal part of his notes were of that bank, he converted them all into specie. Finding, however, the inconvenience of so much dead weight, before he returned home he resorted to the Bank of the United States, deposited his specie, and took its notes into the country with him. Upon being asked if he distrusted the pet banks, he declared that he did not, that he believed them to be perfectly safe and sound. Why, then, do you prefer the Bank of the United States? I do not; but those who know more of the banks than I do advised me to do so. This gentleman is still a warm friend of General Jackson, though I believe he has but little confidence in his financial skill. Sir, this is not an isolated case; this is not the only instance where politicians have held opinions and used language, official and unofficial—to Gen. Jackson they denounced the Bank; to the people they denounced its paper as not safe. But when self-interest was at stake, their steps were directed to the place of safe deposite. They knew more than my friend knew. (for so he is personally, though a political opponent) and they have availed themselves of their knowledge.

Another case, and I will detain the House no longer upon this point. Two years since, while travelling upon the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, when the notes of the Bank of the United States were the only paper current every where, a gentleman (for such he seemed to be) came on board, and, meeting a plain countryman, who had travelled but little, seeing in his possession several large notes of the Bank of the United States, (which he apparently took no notice of,) became exceedingly friendly to him, and, upon an opportunity occuring, offered him the most disinterested advice. He told him that within the last three days he had met with a confidential friend of General Jackson, who had assured him that the bank could hold out no longer; that the Government had determined to put it down; that it was ascertained that there were now more notes issued than could be redeemed, and that the notes were then considerably below par. The honest, deluded countryman informed him that he had none other than United States Bank notes, which were the savings of several years' hard labor; that they constituted his whole fortune; that he had sold out his stock in trade at New Orleans, and was now returning to the West, for the purpose of investing its proceeds in land, for the benefit of his family. His new friend advised him to say nothing of what he had communicated; that a knowledge of the fact would still further depress the value of the notes; and that he would try and do something for him when he reached New Madrid, Missouri, where he had a friend, a little way above. In a few hours the boat stopped at New Madrid, the newly cemented friends stepped on shore, whilst passengers were coming on and going off. In a few moments the steam was up, and the boat under way. The countryman jumped on board just in time; his friend was bound for St. Louis, Missouri, where he no doubt found an apt tutor in political knavery. A few hours after, a rumor was afloat that the United States Bank had failed. The countryman congratulated himself upon meeting with so kind and disinterested a friend, and communicated the result. He had received for his United States Bank notes those of the pet bank of Mobile, and some from Louisiana and Ohio, to the amount of upwards of three hundred dollars, as a particular favor, he being, like his friend, warmly devoted to General Jackson's administration. You may readily imagine his confusion and astonishment when he found how shamefully he had been cheated. He paid for his United States Bank notes, in New Orleans, four and a half per cent. and had exchanged them for paper more than five per cent. below par. This is the manner in which many honest, confiding countrymen have been tricked by political knaves. Are there none here who feel as if similar treachery has not been practised by themselves towards the country? Are there none here who, for the last six or eight years, have been unceasing in their efforts to cry down the Bank of the United States, to gratify the malice of General Jackson; to render its notes uncurrent, to induce the people to believe it would be unsafe to hold them, when they themselves have, even during the present session demanded of the Sergeant-at-arms notes of the old Bank of the United States, in preference to Treasury notes or specie? If there are any such holding seats upon this floor, they are traitors to the people whom they were sent here to represent.

Since this Administration came into power, the people have been at its mercy for their currency; they have had none, properly so called. That privilege has been extended by the Government to members of Congress and office holders alone. They are tendered gold and silver, whilst the last remnant of sound currency remaining is to be driven out of circulation, and the people left entirely destitute of any. Treasury notes are to be forced into circulation at the option of the Executive; transferred from one quarter of the Union to another, as may best answer political purposes. This is the metallic circulation promised by General Jackson, and which, in the language of his subservient demagogue, "was to flow up the Mississippi."

How long will gentlemen act counter to the known will of their constituents? How long will they persevere in supporting Executive measures, when the people have so signally rejected them? Have they not, in every instance where their voice could be heard, where their votes have been counted, emphatically expressed their dissent from those miserable experiments?

President Van Buren commenced his Administration with a majority in Congress, and amongst the people in his favor, when elected, it was confidently believed that he would cut loose from those miserable sycophants who had spell-bound General Jackson, by administering to his vanity and imposing upon his credulity; that the Treasury circular, which had been adopted contrary to the expressed opinion of his friends in both Houses of Congress, would be rescinded; in fine that he would look to the interests of the country, to the sufferings of the people, however brought on them, and, in the true spirit of Democracy, lean towards their wishes. How he has fulfilled their expectations is too well and dearly known to the country. In September last, only six months after his inauguration, looking to the deranged state of the currency, apparently sympathizing with the people in their then distress, the President convoked Congress three months earlier than its accustomed period. He proposed what he deemed a remedy. He asked for ten millions of Treasury notes; they were granted. He offered his Sub-Treasury scheme; it was, after due deliberation, rejected by the House of Representatives. Congress was immediately virtually prorogued until its constitutional period. It met again in December, the Representatives having had an opportunity of consulting with and ascertaining the will of their constituents upon this all-absorbing measure. The President, at the opening of Congress, recommended the rejected experiment. The Senate, having a majority, not by the will of their constituents, subservient to Executive purposes, adopt again his plan. It is again, and again, and again rejected by the immediate Representatives of the people; and now we have the consolation of being told, upon this floor, by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] who reported the last bill, that, whether we pass it or not, the Sub-Treasury is, and will be for three years to come, the law of the land, and in full operation! It was a mere mockery to propose it to Congress. Thus we are triumphantly told, by the organ of the Executive in this House, that, in despite of the Representatives or the people, his experiment shall endure as long as his presidential term shall continue. Sir, we should be thankful to the organ and the President for their mercy as well as modesty, in not claiming seven years, instead of only three; we should be thankful that the days of this dynasty are admitted to be numbered. But is this the language of a Democratic Republican President, or is it the Loco Foco doctrine which characterizes "the party" in New York? Are the people aliens to the Government? and is the President's will the law of the land? The chairman of the Ways and Means says it is so; and it is for the country to register the edict.

In Great Britain, when the King's ministry asks of the House of Commons supplies, or other measures deemed important to the Government, if rejected, the ministers throw up their seals of office. And why? Because it is considered that their measures are not approved by the People; and even in that monarchical Government a respect is paid to their will. How is it in this Democratic Republic here? The Senators of the United States are elected for six years, and at this moment near one-third hold their seats acting against the known will of their constituents. The President of the United States is elected for four years: he appoints his ministers for the same term at his will. How many of their measures have been rejected by the popular branch of the Legislature, or disapproved by the People, your proceedings here and throughout the country exhibit the evidence of. What has been the situation of your Post Office Department; of your Navy Department; of your Treasury Department; of your express mail? and what the effect of the refusal of the Postmaster General to obey the laws of Congress, thereby setting at defiance its enactments? Look at your exploring expedition, which, of itself, has brought your Navy into disrepute both at home and abroad; at your Treasury circulars and other financial projects, which have bankrupted your Treasury, and compelled you to issue scrip for the payment of your debts. What minister in Great Britain could have retained his office after such splendid failures as these? Even Pitt himself, with all the power he wielded in 1783-84, with the King at his back, would not have dared to persevere in measures so repugnant to the popular branch of the Legislature and the People, or have attempted to hold office contrary to their will. But in Great Britain there is republicanism under the name of monarchy; whilst in these United States there is despotism under the name of democracy. Having shown in what the democracy of the Executive and of some of the Senators consists—a total disregard of the People's will—I will call the attention of gentlemen to the composition of this House at this time, and to their votes upon those measures of the Executive to which I have adverted. Which of the States is in favor of the Sub-Treasury experiment? Is New York? Or are the constituents of many of her Representatives on this floor in favor of those who voted for that bill? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will not venture so rash an assertion. How stands Connecticut? She has spoken, but has not been regarded by her Representatives either in this House or the other. A small voice has been heard from New Hampshire, but unheeded here. I ask, where has an election been held since President Van Buren developed his ruinous measures in September last, where the Administration has not lost ground—where the Whigs, who oppose their measures, have not, in almost every instance, been triumphant? Look to Maine, where all means were resorted to, however disreputable, and countenanced here, to operate upon her elections—in two instances of vacancies on this floor, where both were friends of the Administration, the one a Whig, the other by a greatly diminished Administration vote, is returned here. Look at Maryland; notwithstanding all the imposition which could be brought to bear by foreign influence, from the city of Baltimore, that stronghold of Jacksonism, a Whig is returned by near one thousand majority. From Virginia, the Representative comes here by, I believe, some fifteen or twenty votes; clearly indicating in all those States a want of confidence in either the men or the measures. Last, though not least, comes Mississippi. To refer to her election, Mr. Speaker, I know must be mortifying to the Executive, to the party in this House, to yourself. When Congress convened here in December last, and the Sub-Treasury project was again recommended by the Executive, it excited some surprise amongst its opponents, and we could not imagine upon what expectations the Executive rested his hopes of carrying a measure which had been in October so promptly rejected by the same House of Representatives. It was soon perceived, however, that upon South Carolina it was believed his prospects depended; if not upon her vote alone, her influence was calculated on to carry others. It was at this time believed that the New York Conservatives were not made of such malleable materials as to be Conservatives at home and Loco Focos in Washington. A short period was only required, with the requisite appliances, to induce some of them to unveil themselves; and those who were at the extra session foremost and most uncompromising in defeating the Executive will, by electing a Conservative printer to the House of Representatives, in opposition to the Globe, could no longer resist; and, like most young proselytes, took the lead in the most detestable measures of the Administration—the disfranchisement of the State of Mississippi, and the Sub-Treasury projects. That State was deprived of her representation upon this floor, assisted by the active agency of two distinguished Conservatives from New York, [Messrs. BRONSON and FOSTER,] who occupied six days in delivering their arguments against her right to be represented—by the overpowering influence of the Executive, applied personally to Representatives on this floor, and the casting vote of the Speaker. Sir, the two gentlemen who were denied seats in this House, after being elected by an unprecedented majority of the voters of Mississippi in July last, [Messrs. PRENTISS and WORD,] have been again returned by the people of that State, and sit here now to rebuke the President, the party, and the Speaker, for the flagrant outrage done to them and their constituents.

It may be asked why I include the President as a "particeps criminis" in this transaction. It is because the facts have justified it. Regardless of other great and important interests of the country, looking ultimately to the accomplishment of the great object of his solicitude, his rejected Sub-Treasury experiment, he overlooks all others to effect this.

It will be recollected that, eighteen months since, a convention of tobacco planters convened in this city from various States in the Union, and memorialized Congress upon the subject of the high duties and restrictions imposed in foreign countries upon that article of export. A select committee, consisting of nine members, of which I was chairman, was appointed. Upon an examination of the subject, it was evident that the tobacco planters of the United States had much to complain of. It was seen that, whilst very many articles of foreign product and manufacture were admitted into the United States with only a nominal, and others entirely free of duty, American tobacco, both raw and manufactured, was in some of those countries either taxed so high, or restrictions so rigidly imposed, as to amount to almost a prohibition of its import into those countries.

The committee, after mature investigation, made a report, urging the Executive to an attentive consideration of the subject, and unanimously reported a resolution requesting the President of the United States to instruct our ministers and agents abroad upon this subject, and to appoint special agents to negotiate with those Governments where no accredited representatives of the United States were already appointed. The report and resolution were adopted by the House of Representatives, and, to enable the President to carry those views into effect, outfits and salaries were appropriated to defray the expenses of a minister to Austria and to Prussia, to neither of which countries had the United States before appointed a minister. As a still further evidence of the desire of both Houses of Congress to place the tobacco interest upon a proper basis, and to show the interest it had elicited, after the appropriation bill had gone to the Senate, without a specific appropriation for defraying the expenses of agents to be appointed by the President to negotiate for a modification of the duties and restrictions upon our tobacco abroad, the Senate increased the contingent fund, at the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] $12,000, for that specific purpose; and the House of Representatives agreed to the amendment, although it was warmly urged by a member on this floor that the contingent fund was amply sufficient for this purpose. Notwithstanding these repeated indications by Congress in favor of the interests of the tobacco planters, and when it was all-important that promptness of action on the part of the Executive should follow and carry out these designs, the President delays for more than twelve months to appoint a minister to Austria, having the commission and fund at his disposal; nor have we yet learned that but two special agents have been appointed under the resolution. Thus far there appears to have been a marked apathy in relation to the tobacco interests. It is true that instructions have been given, as appears by a communication of the Secretary of State in reply to a resolution moved by me in October last, calling for information upon this subject, to our ministers and agents then abroad. But why have the appointments of minister to Austria and other special agents been so long delayed? It was from the efforts of those agents, to be sent specially for this particular purpose, that we anticipated most benefit. It was to satisfy those Governments with whom we are carrying on commercial intercourse that we feel the injustice of their impositions upon this staple; that the inequality of burdens imposed by those Governments upon this American staple bears no proportion to the duties demanded here upon their products; and that, however patiently we had heretofore acquiesced in this inequality, we now have a right to demand reciprocal modifications. And in the language of our minister in Prussia, communicated to the Secretary of State, "we had, therefore, certainly reason to complain of the duty imposed on our tobacco in Germany," and the same remark may equally apply to England and France, and other countries in which those heavy duties or restrictions are imposed upon American tobacco, whilst their exports are admitted into the United States either free or at a nominal duty.

The Executive have generally evinced a thirst for appointment and patronage, and have never heretofore permitted an opportunity to pass without exercising this privilege to the extent of their power. It must, therefore, be borne in mind that other and more important concerns, to them at least, were at stake, than a moment's attention to the interests of the tobacco planters. Political arrangements were to be consulted, and the tobacco interests must yield until they are accomplished. This delay on the part of the Executive to further the views of the tobacco planters and the expressed will of Congress, excited some interest, in Maryland at least, and during the last summer an anxiety was felt; a deputation was sent to Washington from Prince George's county, (the most extensive tobacco-growing county in the State,) who waited on the President of the United States, and urged the speedy appointment of a minister and agents from the tobacco-growing States. This deputation, a majority of whom were political friends of Mr. Van Buren, returned from their visit, under the assurance that the tobacco interest would be a special object of attention by the President. What must be their astonishment, as well as that of the select committee of this House, to find that up to this time—eighteen months since the power and money were placed at the disposal of the President—but two special agents have been appointed to look after this interest; and one of the two ministers but scarcely departed, and not one of either from a tobacco-growing State, but all from manufacturing, non-slaveholding States? It will be recollected that Mr. Maxcy, charge at Brussels, is not recognised by the Executive as one of the special agents. It is not my desire to attempt to create any geographical distinctions in appointments, either at home or abroad; such attempts I have always deprecated, come from what quarter they may. But, I would ask, what would the manufacturers say to have a planter to represent their interests, or the cotton planters to have a manufacturer to take care of theirs? To Mr. Wheaton and Mr. Dodge I have no objection; on the contrary, from their experience, I approve their appointments. At one of those appointments of ministers, however, I am sure the planters, this House, and the country, have been more than astonished; and, when all the facts in relation to that appointment shall have been developed, the members of the select committee upon the tobacco interest, with every member of this House who united with them to carry into effect the objects of the report and resolution in relation to the same, will feel indignant at the circumstances which attended that appointment. I mean the appointment of Mr. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania, as minister to Austria, to represent the tobacco interest of the United States. Is there a member here present who does not view it as a misrepresentation of that interest which Congress intended, by making the appropriation, should be represented? Is it not insulting to the planting States, that none could be found amongst them competent to protect their interests; and that an individual from the interior of Pennsylvania, who never saw a tobacco plant grow, or has had any concern whatever in commercial matters, should be selected as first minister to Austria, to obtain a reduction of, and restriction from, duties exacted on American tobacco? I have inquired of some of the friends of the new minister what are the qualities he possessed to justify the appointment; and I have been answered, more than once, that he spoke Dutch.

Mr. Speaker, it is very true that, in many cases, "where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise;" and I have no desire to dissipate the delusion; and if this proficient in Pennsylvania Dutch can prevail on the accomplished and talented minister, Prince Metternich, to admit our tobacco into the ports of Austria, untrammelled by the present duties and prohibition, the tobacco planters will not complain of his language. But I apprehend it will require an interpreter from the kitchen cabinet of Prince Metternich, before he can understand one word of this Pennsylvania high Dutch; and, at the splendid court of Vienna, this language will be found to be more an exotic than at the palace in Washington. It is not, however, to the man alone we have a right to object; the planters should protest against the appointment on all accounts; the country, from the manner in which it has been made, and the inducements which led to the appointment. Mr. Muhlenberg had been for several years, as he was at the time of his appointment, a member of the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania, and had been a warm supporter of Gen. Jackson's administration. During the called session of Congress, and subsequently, he had, as was understood, evinced symptoms of dissatisfaction at Mr. Van Buren's course, and at the commencement of the present session was believed to stand, to say the least, in a doubtful attitude towards the Administration.

The internal feuds had not been entirely settled in Pennsylvania between the Wolfs and the Muhlenbergs. The leader of the former, from being Governor of that proud State, had descended to accept a Comptroller's appointment at Washington. This, it was supposed, would have quieted the dissension. It was soon found that it produced a different result: the other, the Capulet, felt as if a preference had been given to his rival. A restlessness began to show itself, and was about to break out into open rebellion, when the mission to Austria quieted all apprehension from that quarter. The intelligence of the nomination of Mr. Muhlenberg as Minister to Austria was received with the utmost astonishment by all sides of this House, and by none with more than the chairmen of the Committee of Ways and Means and of Foreign Affairs. I would ask either of the gentlemen if he dreamed of such an appointment when the appropriation was made; or the members of the select committee, when they, at the last session, looked with so much anxiety to the benefits which were anticipated from a cordial co-operation, on the part of the Executive, with Congress, in relation to the tobacco trade, if they could have been content with such an appointment? And what is there now to reconcile them to it? Is it that it insured the disfranchisement of the State of Mississippi? That, it is believed, it did accomplish; for the day after the vote was taken in the House of Representatives, which, by the casting vote of the Speaker, sent Messrs. Prentiss and Word back, to be returned here again, the President of the United States nominated Henry A. Muhlenberg as Minister to Austria, he having voted to vacate their seats.

If there were no conditions attached to that appointment, express or implied, if there were not some object to be effected by delaying the appointment, why not have made it twelve or eighteen months ago, when the minister to Prussia, whose outfit and salary were embraced in the same law, was appointed? Why not have made it at the commencement of the present session? The same reason applies as does in the case of another member on this floor, [Mr. BRONSON of New York,] whose judgeship is held back until he does the work of his masters here. And, further, several gentlemen were tantalized by the delay, and the expectation of this mission. It was also all-important that the schisms in the Keystone State should be healed. Mr. Muhlenberg held too securely the balance of power in Pennsylvania to be permitted to return home to his constituents dissatisfied. His former competitor for the high honors of that State (Governor Wolf) had been provided for, and reposed quietly under Executive patronage here. Many other former members of Congress, notwithstanding General Jackson's denunciation of the practice, had been taken from Pennsylvania and placed in high and lucrative offices by the Executive. No wonder that Mr. Muhlenburg felt that injustice had been done to his claims. He became restive, the collar was about to be loosened, his thraldom too heavy to be longer borne, when the Court of Vienna, with the outfit and salary attached, presented a fit opportunity of reconciling all. But, I ask again, why was not his appointment made at the commencement of the session? Another object was to be accomplished; and, as I have before remarked, the disfranchisement of the State of Mississippi was a primary one with the Administration. The securing of Mr. Muhlenberg's vote upon that question could not be dispensed with, as the result proved. These are some of the speculations which this appointment has given rise to; and, if injustice has been done to the Executive or the minister, they have the means of disabusing themselves. But as the case now stands, with the facts before them, no honest jury in the country would hesitate a moment to bring in a verdict (under the report of the committee of the Senate of 1826, of which Mr. Benton was chairman) of guilty of the charge made in said report: that "the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage; I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for." The fact is, the verdict has already been pronounced by jurors who sat in anticipation of the case, and whose high stations in the country forbid the idea that they were packed for the purpose. The four most prominent of the committee of 1826, who passed sentence in that report upon a President who should appoint to, or a member of Congress who should accept, office, were Mr. Benton, (chairman,) Mr. Van Buren, Mr. Richard M. Johnson, and Mr. Dickerson. Will you believe it possible that these are the gentlemen who now so openly advocate this bargain and corruption? One now your President of the United States, another your Vice President, another your Secretary of the Navy, and another the leader of the Loco Foco demagogues throughout the country.

I am asked by a friend why I single out this particular case, when there are so many others equally flagrant. It is because, in the appointment referred to, I view the Executive as having disregarded the expressed will of Congress, the wishes and interests of the tobacco planters of the country generally, and of my immediate constituents in particular. Sir, an intense anxiety has been, and still is, felt upon this subject. The tobacco planters have borne with patience the neglect of the Government in protecting them from imposition and unprecedented exaction in foreign countries; they have murmured least in regard to what they felt most—the duties upon foreign importations; they have yielded to the impression that the Government of the United States was formed for the benefit of the whole; and they have quietly acquiesced in the duties imposed, both at home and abroad, upon their interests, whilst all others have been protected and guarded, however insignificant in their product. With an export of $10,000,000 annually; denied admission into some, and received, where received at all, into other ports with heavy imposition, from whence are imported into the United States articles, amounting to millions, free of duty—still they have ceased to complain. Sir, from no other class of our citizens would these burdens, these grievances, have been so patiently, so quietly, submitted to. It is their love of peace, their confidence in the justness of their Government, and an indissoluble attachment to the Union, which has prevented their speaking a louder, a more impressive language. Had other interests been thus neglected, similar applications thus treated, your desks would have groaned under innumerable memorials for redress, convention after convention would have denounced your neglect, deputations would have thronged your city, and perhaps nullification threatened.

After the prompt action on the part of Congress, in approving the report and resolution of the select committee on the subject of tobacco, we had a right to expect a prompt and cordial co-operation on the part of the Executive. Appropriations for two ministers being made—one to Prussia, the other to Austria, (Courts where the United States had not been represented before by so high a grade,) and agents authorized to be appointed, in addition, to take active steps for the prosecution of those interests, we looked to the Executive for a faithful execution of the powers thus given him. We did not anticipate that the President would avail himself of those appropriations, made for a specific object, to consummate his political arrangements in Pennsylvania, or to gain an ascendancy over this House. That his friends miscalculated in sending back to Mississippi my friend Prentiss, who sits by me, and his colleague, is evinced by the fact of their being now here. How far the Keystone State will be operated upon by the distinguished honors and profits bestowed upon her is yet to be tested. That the United States Treasury has been lavished upon her since the last and present Administrations came into power, to an extraordinary degree, the number of benefits that State has received will sufficiently show.

Of the ministers to Russia, the last three have been from Pennsylvania, to wit: Mr Buchanan, Mr. Wilkins, and Mr. Dallas, now there; and now Mr. Muhlenberg to Austria; Mr. Rush, Agent to London; not to name various other less important appointments abroad, such as consuls, &c. At home, Governor Wolf, Comptroller; but, since Mr. Muhlenberg was made minister, he in his turn kicked, and was about to be off for Pennsylvania, to derange the party there, when it was found expedient to add a little more to his salary, and he is now custom-house officer at Philadelphia, (vice Mr. Barker, taken in his place here in Washington,) preferring the profits to the honors of office; Mr. Gilpin, Solicitor of the Treasury; Mr. Miller, late member of Congress, Auditor, in the place of the venerable Richard Harrison, who was the First Auditor of the Treasury, appointed by President Washington, and continued since the formation of the Government in the faithful discharge of his duty until put aside for the present incumbent. This venerable old man, who had served his country either at home or abroad from the year 1783, now in the 87th year of his age, with his faculties unimpaired, with three female relatives dependent on him, is displaced from the office to make room for a member of Congress from Pennsylvania. If, sir, I were at liberty to disclose the means which were resorted to to have him peaceably ousted, a development of them would make the friends of the old Hero blush for the act; for it was President Jackson who removed him, and not Mr. Van Buren. If I were not afraid of jeoparding his just and meritorious claim, now lingering in the Senate, for money spent in behalf of his Government, and to keep up its credit abroad during the trying period from 1783 to 1785, I would state some of the ungenerous means, to say nothing more, practised to induce the old gentleman to withdraw from his office, to save President Jackson the odium of directly turning him out. But, sir, this might, and I have no doubt would, defeat his honest, his long-delayed claim upon the Government; and, therefore, I forbear. Mr. Harrison's, I believe, was the last of the appointments at the seat of Government of General Washington; and it seems that General Jackson could not quit the Presidency with a vestige remaining of President Washington's acts. The 8th of January has superseded the 4th of July; Sunday has become the working day of Congress; and the name of Jackson has obliterated that of Washington.

"Sic transit gloria mundi."

But, Mr. Speaker, to return to the question immediately before the House. What good will result from driving out of circulation the notes of the Bank of the United States? You say they are spurious, illegal, worthless. If so, the community will soon find it out, and take them no longer. If they are not preferred to your Treasury notes, they cannot interfere with them. The notes of the Bank of the United States are a benefit to the people as a currency; the Treasury notes exclusively for the Government. You therefore have your currency; and, if a separation of interest is to take place, all we ask is, to permit the people to have such a currency as they approve. Let the true reason be assigned. As long as the notes of the Bank of the United States are in circulation, they will be preferred to your Treasury notes. Both are paper. Twenty years' experience has given confidence to the notes of the Bank; they can and will be converted into specie at all times; your Treasury notes at the option of the Government; and the last nine years' administration of it has not added to its confidence. It is therefore important to the party that these notes should be taken out of circulation, else your Treasury notes, over and above what are required by the debtors of the Government, will be a dead capital in the hands of their holders. You have, in part, succeeded in depreciating the notes of the State banks, and, with the aid of the illegal Sub-Treasury, (which the chairman of the Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] assures us "must continue, as it is now, the law of the land, and will continue through 1838, '39, '40, and '41, in spite of all the lamentations here or elsewhere,") you may compel the people to recognise your currency; but it will only be because you have deprived them of a better.

PRE-EMPTION TO SETTLERS.

SPEECH OF MR. LOOMIS,
OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, Thursday, June 7, 1838—On the bill to grant Pre-emption Rights.

Mr. LOOMIS of New York said that he was in favor of the bill under consideration, not because he did not think it defective, but because, as it stands, it is worth something; it is better than nothing; and he was not without hopes that it might be so modified and amended as to make it still better. I am, said he, for adopting a permanent system of pre-emption in favor of actual settlers, prospective as well as past in its objects.

The bill before us does not go far enough in this respect; and I think it might also be improved by additional guards and restrictions against frauds. I am unable to see the propriety of limiting its beneficial operation to those who were in possession on the first day of December last. I can see no good reason which renders the bill expedient and proper in favor of those, that does not apply with equal force to those who have located their homes on the unsold lands since that time. I would prefer bringing it up to the present time, or, to name a day, say the first day of June, 1838; and I hope that the committee or the chairman will move to amend it in that respect. I think it will not command one the less vote in this House. I believe nearly or quite all the gentlemen from the new States, all persons living in the immediate vicinity of the public lands, are in favor of pre-emption rights to actual settlers, and they seem to anticipate that the citizens of the older States are hostile to it. So far as my observation has enabled me to judge, I think them mistaken in this opinion. I believe, sir, that a very large proportion of the citizens of the older States are entirely favorable to the principle of pre emption in favor of actual bona fide settlers, and that this is the prevailing sentiment at the North and East.

These lands are, it is well said, the property of all the people of the United States. Their best use is to furnish farms for those who are destitute; and really there seems no good reason why those in this situation, who go on and take possession, and make improvements, should not be preferred at the same price. I believe a large share of the sales have heretofore been to non-residents, speculators, those who desire to make investments, and let the land lie for the rise. I speak not disparagingly of this class of persons. Such investments are not only lawful, but obviously encouraged by the Government; and surely those who avail themselves of the opportunity are by no means censurable. Still, I doubt the wisdom of this policy by the Government. I can see no good reason, I confess, why sales should not be limited to actual settlers, by which those who cause the rise in the value of the land by their labor would have the exclusive benefit of it; that is, assuming that Government kept a fixed minimum price for all lands alike. The present bill is, however, not calculated for such a state of things, but its provisions are favorable to the actual settlers, to the pioneers of our settlements; and I assure the Western gentlemen that a strong feeling exists in the older States to favor actual settlers.

The class of emigrants who, or whose friends, have observed the policy of the Government in granting pre emption laws at intervals, covering all time past up to a certain date, who ascertain that all who have preceded them and gone upon the unsold public lands, have been uniformly confirmed in their possessions by pre-emption laws, giving to them the right to purchase the lands they have improved in preference to strangers: this class, I say, sir, have gone boldly on and taken possession, relying on the past policy of the Government as affording evidence of its future practice. And I ask the question, had they not good grounds for their opinions, how would they anticipate the future action except by the past? They may well consider the policy of granting a preference to actual settlers a well settled policy of the Government in the sale of its lands. Mr. Chairman, we must keep faith with settlers; and why should we not? Why not grant them a preference? The rise of the value of lands in a neighborhood is caused by the improvements made by the hard labor of the actual settlers; and why should not these improvements and that labor go to enhance the value of the lands of their fellow-laborers, rather than those of non residents? Who should have the benefits of the rise of these lands? who but those who earn it; who, by their labor produce it; who add all the increased value, all that exists, or can exist, above the mere Government price? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] stated, and truly, that the minimum price of public lands, fixed by law, is $1 25 cents per acre, and that this minimum price is all the lands will fetch at any rate, as the accounts of sales show; and he urges that giving pre-emption rights will not increase the value to the Government of the surrounding lands, however it may do to individual owners. This I do not deny. I claim nothing on that score. I only ask a preference to be given to actual occupants at the same price. The same gentleman says that these occupants having gone on against law, maintain their possessions against law, and that no bona fide purchaser dare locate his purchase on a lot so occupied. And he urges that it is inexpedient and unjust to legislate in favor of sustaining and encouraging these lawless individuals in their practices and their trespasses. The fact in this respect have been stated by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. YELL] and others, and stand undenied to be, that after the public sales are over, and the lands subject to private entry, no such practice exists as preventing a purchaser from locating any lands that are not already purchased; but that the settlers do combine to protect their possessions until they have the opportunity of entering them themselves; that when a tract is first opened for sale, it is done by public auction, before which no private entry is received; and that these squatters, as they are termed, will not permit any one to purchase their possessions at those public sales; but that, if the possessor fails to avail himself of the first opportunity to complete his own purchase, by entering and paying for his possession at the public sale, he is no longer protected by his fellows; the squatter's law is then at an end; but, should any speculator, at those sales, attempt to avail himself of the improvements made by a settler, and thus to speculate out of the hard earnings of those pioneers in the forest, he does so, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] justly says, at the peril of his head; the settlers will not permit it. Sir, this may be against the letter of the law, but it is not against justice. It is but common right, common honesty; it originates in a principle which is above law itself, and which always should be followed by laws—common right, the title which every man has to what he earns by the sweat of his brow. Before the occupancy, the lands belonged as much to one citizen as to another; all had a common interest in them. If one has added to their value by his labor, cleared the fields, erected his dwelling, made roads, is it right, is it honest, that the other may enter into equal competition with him to secure to himself all the fruits of this labor of his brother, without first giving that brother the right of securing them himself, by the opportunity of purchasing first, and at the same price? This, sir, is all that this bill seeks to do. Shall we complain of men for protecting their rights, so manifest as these? Are they to be deemed lawless and unworthy of protection for sustaining the highest, first, best moral principles? I think this far from being a good reason why pre-emption rights should not be sanctioned by law. It is, in my judgment, a manifestation of moral right and justice in advance of the law. It shows what the law ought to be.

Mr. Chairman, many of these settlers upon the public lands are of the very class alluded to by the gentleman from Massachusetts; those who leave our older States, with money in their pockets to enable them to become freeholders, and who go on, for the first time, with large families and small means; whom he would protect by rejecting this bill, and whose interests I would advance by passing it, and by making it prospective also. I would have it so that those of our citizens who go to the west to improve the Government lands, and enlarge the boundaries of our settled country, should feel free to locate themselves on any of their and our common property, knowing, from the statute book, that the fruits of their labor would be protected to them on complying with the law before them. There can be no doubt but the sales of lands to non-residents is against the interests of those living near them. It retards their settlement, keeps prices of land high, and sends the new-comers further on, where they can get choice lands without having to look up a non-resident owner, or pay a profit of one hundred per cent. It makes the settlements sparse, and leaves large tracts of uncultivated, though good lands lying waste for years, when the tide of emigration is rolling on past them.

Nor is it, in my opinion, desirable for the old States to have their capital drawn away as it accumulates, and, instead of being invested in productive business at home, paid into the National Treasury to exchange for wild lands far away, and which generally lie many years before a return of profit is yielded. In my opinion, sir, it would be much better that our men of wealth should employ their capital in business, and that Government should keep its lands until wanted for actual use, and then sell them to the settler, and let him take the rise on them. Sir, I should be glad to see our whole policy in this respect changed. We have too much land thrown into general market at once; it is the inevitable result of our present system; if sales were limited to actual settlers, it would not be so. But, sir, I do not even hope to change the system at present; time will do it.

I have, Mr. Chairman, before me, a letter written by a gentleman who has resided for several years in the northern part of Illinois, which describes the actual state of things as I believe them to be, so well, and which is so full of good sense and sound views that, with the leave of the committee, I will read a part of it.

Mr. LOOMIS here read the following extracts from a letter:

JULIET, (Illinois,) January 26, 1838.

MY DEAR SIR; Having noticed a bill to grant pre-emptions to settlers on public lands, I take occasion to do what I hold it to be the unbounden duty of every man in the West, who has an acquaintance at Washington, either in Congress or out, viz: to urge upon you what kind of a pre-emption justice, strict justice, demands.

It is impossible for an Eastern man to understand our exact situation without visiting us, but you may have some faint idea when I inform you that more than one-half of the emigrants to this country, from New York and New England, come here for the first time, with their families and their all, in the fall and winter, under the full expectation of purchasing Government lands at $1 25 per acre. The idea of seizing upon public lands, and appropriating without compensation, is as abhorrent here as it is absurd. But the emigrant arrives, stops at a convenient resting place for his family, and reconnoitres the country for his desired future residence. Judge of his surprise when he learns that there is no land in market on which he could subsist without a fortune to commence with; that all the lands in market have long ago been entered by greedy speculators, except the extensive prairies too far from timber to allow of settlements. This is the case as regards Illinois, Wisconsin, and a great part of Missouri, and probably of the whole public domain.

What, then, can the emigrant do? He has sold his home at the East, (perhaps the sheriff sold it for him,) and by self-denial and sacrifices has saved money enough to purchase 80, 160, or 240 acres, at Government price. He cannot return; if he does, he has no home. Speculators hold their lands altogether beyond his means. They are non-residents, too, and unknown, and there is no other resource than to do as others have done—as Government has permitted, and, by repeated pre-emptions for ten years past, tacitly invited them to do, to wit, to go on to Government lands not yet in market, in many instances not yet surveyed. These are the facts, not sufficiently understood abroad. The President himself has not seemed to understand them, but his results are the same; give us his recommendation, and we are satisfied. After selecting a location, then, I say, from necessity, on Government lands, the emigrant commences substantial improvements, and moves on as soon as his family can be made comfortable. He has come a thousand miles to purchase a home—he is ready to purchase, and anxiously waiting Government to give him an opportunity.

"There are in this village fifteen families, the heads of whom are on what is here called their 'claims' on Government land, where they are preparing log cabins, rails, &c. where they intend to move to, so soon as they can be made comfortable. Others have just moved on, and the number that daily settle are altogether beyond the belief of any man who has not been here.

"Now, what does your law propose? Why, to revive the old pre-emption law, and cut off from its benefit all who were not here in 1837, or, in other words, all who did not cultivate in 1837. To those who come after, it is well enough that they come, but they are not fit subjects for Government protection. This looks to me too absurd; it reminds me of the proposition once made in New York, to tax all lands within ten miles of the Erie canal to pay for the same, when those eleven miles off were just as much benefited as those within the ten miles. Strict justice imperatively demands that if you will not make your pre-emption law prospective, upon a residence and certain amount of cultivation, you should extend the pre-emption to all who have the necessary improvements at the passage of the act. Any thing less must be arbitrarily exclusive. I will say nothing of the amount of land, leaving that to the liberality of Congress. It is, however, worthy of observation, that a majority of the settlers occupy 160 acres prairie, and from 40 to 80 of timber adjoining, or as near to it as possible; 200 to 240 acres is almost indispensable, and limited to 160 prairie, with 40 to 80 timber, to include only such land as was previously in possession of the settler.

"The misrepresentation constantly made of settlers in Congress, and the preposterous claims of some of them to more land than is reasonable, I greatly fear will work injustice to the mass of them; but there never was a subject of internal legislation where justice more earnestly demanded that all the circumstances should be understood, than in the case of pre-emptions.

"I have taken this liberty with you, from our former acquaintance, and I have no doubt you will pardon any thing erroneous. If any facts or views here stated can be of the least advantage to the pre-emption law, I shall be satisfied. I have no claims for pre-emption, I know of no benefit I shall derive from such a law; but there are others, many of them your former constituents, who, if the law be limited to the 1st January, will be no better off than they now are, and yet who are bona fide settlers, some with their families on the lands, and others stopping in the neighborhood, while the men are preparing their houses, &c."

I said I should go for this bill. I hope the chairman of the committee who reported the bill will move to amend it, bringing its provisions up to this time, or to the 1st of June.

Mr. Chairman, I have prepared some further provisions which are probably imperfect and defective in detail, but which propose to legalize in advance pre-emption settlers, to obviate the objection against them as violators of the law, by giving to those who shall hereafter go and settle upon the public lands, not merely an equitable right to secure their settlements, their homes, and the earnings of their labor, but a statute right, definite, and plain to be understood. I hardly anticipate that they will be adopted, for the reason that they are unprecedented here, so far as I know, and embrace an important principle which ought to come in the more imposing and deliberate form of a bill from a committee; still I believe them just, and I can at least place them on the record. It appears to me that they embrace a principle, that of a pre-emption law for the future, requiring an occupation for a given time, which should, and at some time will, be adopted.

SPEECH OF MR. RANDOLPH, OF NEW JERSEY,

In the House of Representatives, Tuesday, June 12, 1838—
On the bill granting Pre-emption Rights.

MR. CHAIRMAN: When I moved that the committee rise, a few evenings since, it was not for the purpose of discussing the measure now under consideration, but merely to have the amendments printed, so that they, together with the bill itself, might be the more deliberately examined. Having, however, been urged to vote for this bill, I will embrace the present opportunity to offer some reasons why I cannot support the measure.

Notwithstanding the pleasant altercation between the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. BOON] and the honorable member from Illinois, [Mr. MAY,] I do not myself consider the present a political question. It is one of those matters, sir, in which the whole country is interested, and which, in the bosom of every statesman, should be paramount to mere party considerations. The controversy, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, is rather between the old and the new States, though in fact it should be between all the States, and the land speculators and those who are disposed to acquire the public lands in some illegal manner; for I will attempt to show, sir, that the new as well as the old States are interested to defeat the pre-emption laws. I confess, Mr. Chairman, after the apology of the honorable chairman for the President—that, when Senator from New York, he opposed the pre-emption laws because such were the wishes and interest of his constituents—that I was not a little surprised at the remarks of the honorable member from New York, [Mr. LOOMIS,] coming as he does from one of the "old thirteen." He told us, sir, that the North is in favor of the actual settler. What, sir, the North in favor of those who, in violation of law, have taken possession of the public domain! This, sir, is both new and strange; and if it be so, I am at a loss to conjecture by what alchemy so strange a transmutation of public opinion has been effected. But not only is the North in favor of these people, but the honorable gentleman says they dare not insult the right of the possessor. The right of the possessor, sir! Dare not! Why, what right has the possessor, so called, more than any other trespasser? Is it intended to be intimated that these possessors, having placed themselves beyond the law, and banded together, have become so strong that even the Government dare not interfere with them? Sir, whenever a pact or combination of our citizens becomes stronger than the law, and may violate its precepts with impunity, our Government and free institutions will become of little value.

Mr. Chairman, in examining the subject of the public lands I find that prior to the act of the 24th of April, 1820, they were sold upon a credit of two, three, and four years, at the minimum price of two dollars. The credit system, however, was found to operate injuriously, so that, on the 30th of June, 1820, when it ceased, there was due the Government, for lands sold, the sum of $21,500,000. The present system went into operation on the 1st of July, 1820; it reduced the minimum price of land to one dollar and a quarter cash, required all the land to be first offered at auction in half-quarter sections, or eighty-acre lots, and then any part remaining unsold was subject to private entry in sections, halves, quarters, and half-quarters. The first general pre-emption law was the act of May 29, 1830, though, to secure the French and Spanish settlements, and some few other private locations in the Mississippi valley, various pre-emption laws of partial operation had before that period been enacted. This general pre-emption act, which the present bill seeks to revive, gives to the first settler or occupant of any of the public lands who had cultivated the same in 1829, the right of pre-emption for one year to the quarter section of land which he had settled and cultivated; that is, the settler had for one year the right to purchase the one hundred and sixty acres of land at a dollar and a quarter per acre, to the exclusion of all other persons, whatever they might be willing to pay for the same. It also provided that where two persons had settled on the same quarter section, it should be divided equally between them, and each individual to have a floating pre-emption to eighty acres more, at the minimum price. The act prohibits the assignment or transfer of pre-emption rights. The act of April 5, 1832, was passed to enable poor men to purchase at private sale a quarter of a quarter section, or forty-acre lots, and by some strange kind of legislation there is appended, by way of proviso, not a matter which the act itself covers or effects, but a totally different subject, a right of pre-emption for six months to all actual settlers being house-keepers on the public lands—the act of 1830 having expired. How this proviso became thus strangely incorporated in the act, I have been unable to learn either from any member of this House, or the proceedings of the day. The statutes of July 14, 1832, and of March 2, 1833, were passed to enable persons having pre-emption rights under the former acts, but who, for certain specified reasons, were unable to enter their claims within the times limited, to put their claims on record and perfect the title, the same as if the acts had not expired. The act of June 19, 1834, revives the pre-emption act of 1830 for two years, with some few additional provisions; this act expired in 1836, and the last Congress did not revive it, or pass any other pre-emption law. This, then, Mr. Chairman, is the system of pre-emption laws which is sought to be revived and extended by the present bill, and which the honorable gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MAY) says it is the interest of all to encourage; whether he be correct or not, let us examine.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, this system lessens the average amount of the sales of the public lands; as a matter of course, the settler locates himself on the most valuable tracts, the richest soil, the best wooded or watered, or possessing some other peculiar benefit. This tract he gets, without competition, for a dollar and a quarter per acre, the minimum price of land sales; and when the land in the vicinity comes to be surveyed, and offered at public sale, the best tracts being already sold under the pre-emption law at the minimum price, it is not to be expected that the poorer tracts will bring more than the richer; accordingly, all that is sold is disposed of for about a dollar and a quarter per acre by the Government, although the settler sells his choice tracts for four or five, and sometimes twenty or thirty, dollars per acre, and is then ready to locate another pre-emption right. If, on the contrary, the pre-emption claims were disallowed, and the land surveyed and brought fairly into market, and exposed to public sale, Government would get the four and five dollars per acre for the choice lands, which now the pre-emptioner gets, and of course the average price of public lands accruing to the Government would be much increased; and yet the permanent settler would in fact pay no more than he does now. Prior to the passage of the pre emption law of 1830, the average sales of public land amounted to from a dollar and thirty-five cents to a dollar and fifty cents per acre; whereas, since the passage of that law, it has never exceeded a dollar and thirty-one cents per acre. In 1827, the average was a dollar and forty-two cents per acre; the next year a new order of things commenced, settlers began to locate the public lands, in anticipation of the passage of a pre-emption law, and for that and the two succeeding years the average was only one dollar and twenty-six cents per acre. From 1829 to 1828, being the time between the commencement of the present system of cash sales and the anticipation of a general pre-emption law, the land sales averaged one dollar and thirty-five cents per acre; but from 1828 to 1836, being the pre-emption period, the sales only averaged one dollar and twenty-seven cents per acre, being a difference of eight cents per acre, or a loss of about four millions and a half of dollars on the aggregate sales during that period. But when it is considered how much the desire of acquiring the public domain has increased since 1828, and how many more competitors there have been since that period, and that the pre-emption laws have almost destroyed competition at the public sales, it must be obvious to every one that the mere comparison of the average price of land sold prior and subsequent to 1828 affords but a very faint idea of the actual amount of loss to the Government, arising from the pre-emption laws. In 1836 the House of Representatives published a document (No. 211) on this subject, from the General Land Office. In a letter, dated January 28, 1836, Mr. Ethan A. Brown, the Commissioner of the Land Office, says, pages 6 and 7:

"The pre-emption laws originated and bestowed rights, but recognised none in the settlers as previously existing. I conceive they have no other rights, in this respect, than what the law confers; and that the pre-emption privilege may be considered little else than a mere benevolence, enabling the adventurer to appropriate to himself the choicest lands, most valuable mill-seats, and localities for towns, at a vast cost to the public; or, in other words, preventing the receipts of vast sums into the Treasury. It is confidently believed that these privileges, covering at least four millions of acres of land, joined with outrageous combinations to intimidate purchasers, and other unjustifiable confederacies, have diminished the receipt for public lands, in the year of 1835, full three millions of dollars, at a moderate estimate, below what they would have brought in fair competition. If frauds in pre-emptions were unknown, if no one obtained a pre-emption but upon a faithful compliance with the conditions prescribed, still the selections of the most valuable lands, and most desirable situations, at the minimum price, would produce an effect upon the revenue too considerable to be overlooked by the financier."

And in a letter of April 11, 1836, the same officer remarks:

"The estimate of three millions of dollars, which I had the honor to submit to you on the 28th of January last, appears to me now to underrate, much rather than to magnify, the difference between the receipts for pre-emption concessions and the sum the same lands would have brought into the Treasury, had no impediment laid in the way of full and free competition for the purchase."

But, Mr. Chairman, this system not only lessens the price of the public land, but it leads to endless frauds and perjuries, and, in proof of this, I will again refer to the document No. 211.* The commissioner says, (p. 7.)

"It seems to me a hopeless task to project any modification of existing enactments that shall silence perjury, and defeat the devices of sagacious speculators, so long as their ingenuity shall be sharpened and stimulated by the prospect of immense gain attending their success."

Again (p. 3.) "The public sales are attended by combinations of two kinds interested in keeping bids down to the minimum; the one composed of those who have, and those who pretend to a right of preference, and to resort to intimidation, by threats and actual violence, as exemplified most particularly at the public sales at Chicago in June, 1835; when and where the controlling party is represented to have effectually prevented those from bidding who were not acceptable to themselves."

At page 5, the Commissioner, under date of January 28, 1836, says:

"It is said, on credible authority, that preparations appear to be making, in hopes of a pre-emption act at this session of Congress, to acquire, at a minimum cost, a great part of the precious lands on Red river."

Page 8. "The interest of the Treasury seems to demand a guard against force as well as fraud. I allude to that system of terror which threatens the competitor for the purchase of public lands with the vengeance of the settler with whose usurpation he may interfere." Page 10. "It is not believed there are thirty honest pre-emption floats in the whole Western District of Louisiana." Page 20. "A formidable company was formed on the second or third day of the sale (at Choechuma, in 1833,) that silenced all opposition, and the lands went off generally at Government price."

Other instances might be given of fraud and corruption, as well from this same document as from other sources; but I trust, Mr. Chairman, that enough has been shown to satisfy any reasonable mind of the impropriety of the present measure. It is no answer to the objection arising from these frauds to say that they arise from the public sales, or from companies of speculators; these, no doubt, contribute greatly to the evil; but, after all, the pre-emption system is the basis of all the iniquity. It is this that withdraws the choice lands from fair competition in open market; it is this that engenders perjury and fraud, and combinations of settlers to preserve and protect what they assert to be their rights; it is this system that begets combinations of purchasers and speculators, either to encounter and overcome the combinations of settlers, or, by collusion with them, or luring scores of them to locate valuable tracts, to commit the grossest frauds against the pre-emption laws and their country. And this, sir, is the system so highly eulogized by the honorable member from Illinois, and for the extension of which the present bill is intended. Sir, as wise legislators, when about to pass an important statute, we should look back to the old law, and ascertain the evils arising from, and, if possible, endeavor to provide a remedy against their future recurrence; but this bill, sir, instead of looking to a remedy, greatly extends the evil. Without intending any imputation against the honorable Senator, whoever he be, that drew the bill, I do conceive, Mr. Chairman, that, had his object been to cover up, conceal, greatly extend and perpetuate all the speculations, frauds, and perjuries of the past system, he could not more effectually have done it than by the present bill. The ostensible object of former pre-emption laws was to protect the poor settlers in the little homes they had hewed for themselves in the forest; and so far as that object alone was honestly pursued, I am not disposed to quarrel with the system; but the present bill throws off the mask, and its object would seem to be less to protect the bona fide settler than the speculator or fraudulent pre-emptioner. Former laws, sir, required not only settlement, but actual cultivation; though, under the construction of the Commissioner, the most trifling effort to cultivate, even the sowing of a few turnip seed, was held sufficient; but the present bill, so far from correcting that fraudulent construction and practice under it, and requiring a real cultivation in good faith, has stricken out the requirement altogether, and made mere settlement alone sufficient.

* It is but just to note, that the truth of the statements contained in this document has been questioned by the letters of Mr. Garesche, in document No. — of the present session; but whether these letters do in fact impair confidence in the statements in the document quoted is submitted to the candor of those who may investigate.

Again, sir, no length of settlement in connection with cultivation is required. An individual may on the night of the 30th of November have erected a booth or cabin on the most valuable tract of land in the West, and on his waking the next morning this bill would vest in him the fee simple of the land on paying the minimum price. By the construction of the Commissioner, an individual under the former laws, who selected a water-power and settled on the adjacent land and erected a mill, still had no pre-emption right without the actual cultivation of the land; but under this bill neither the erection of a mill, nor the cultivation of the land, nor any thing else but a few hours' settlement and the erection of a shantee, is necessary to confer title to the most valuable mill seat on the Western waters. This bill does not, unless it be by implication, prevent the assignment and transfer of pre-emption rights, nor that species of fraud upon the system by which a speculator may have, as I understand to be the fact at this time, in many cases, fifty or a hundred individuals in his pay, settled on valuable tracts of land, for the purpose of taking advantage of this bill the moment it becomes a law, and thus create a splendid fortune at the expense of the Government. This bill extends to all lands to which the Indian title is extinguished, and of course to lands which will not be surveyed for years by Government; it authorizes the pre-emptioner to go in advance of the public surveyor, and enables him to select the choice lands, valuable mill seats, and sites for towns, years and years before the laws of your country will permit an honest purchaser to acquire a foot of the land. And this not only destroys all competition for these lands when they are put in market, and thus reduces the very best to the minimum price, but it has another and most injurious effect—it leads to continual encroachments upon the Indian lands and collision with their rights, to endless strifes and quarrels, to tampering, and to all the little arts that can debase the Indian character, and eventually, by fraudulent treaty, to extinguish his title to the land of his fathers; and this in order to enable speculators, who sit like cormorants, hovering around the wasting tribe, fixing their eagle eyes upon the bright sunny places which cheer the Indian's home, and watching, day after day, his degradation, in order to pounce upon those beautiful places. I have been told, Mr. Chairman, on good authority, that, long before the Sioux and Fox tribes of Indians, who were here last fall, and disposed of part of their land by treaty, reached their homes, the choice places were all located; yes, sir, the moment the title was extinguished, the settler or pre-emptioner planted his foot upon the Indian's home, and there he stands yet, waiting the passage of this bill, to give him a good and valid title, though the land will not probably be surveyed or put in market for five years to come. Sir, I am told an individual claims title to the immense water-power at the falls of St. Anthony, valued at $100,000, which, by this bill, he will get for a few dollars. I recollect, Mr. Chairman, of seeing in the public papers, some year or two ago, though I have been unable to find it at the present time, what appeared to be a regular organization and constitution of the settlers living on the unsurveyed land in that part of Wisconsin now called Iowa. I mention this, sir, to show the extent to which the pre-emptioners have gone. They have stretched beyond the protection of the law, settled on the public lands in violation of the statute, and erected a kind of imperium in imperio.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the whole pre-emption system. I believe its operation to be unjust and deleterious. It gives a most unjust advantage to the few reckless over the many honestly disposed, by enabling the former to obtain the choice lands at the lowest price. It enables the wealthy speculator, by employing scores of pre-emptioners, to amass a fortune, at the expense of the Government and the poor honest settlers. It lures men beyond the protection and influence of society, education, and religion, to become the lonely settlers in the dense forest; and by teaching them that the laws for the protection of the public domain may be violated with impunity, it has a most demoralizing effect upon the state of society. This system, Mr. Chairman, is based upon false principles; it enables men to take advantage of their own wrong, and compels Government to yield to the force or the fraud of the few on the many, singly or combined. It says to the honest law-loving and law abiding citizen, you may acquire a right and an advantage over your neighbor, by violating the laws of your country. The principles of the pre-emption system, if carried out, would destroy all government, and dissolve the very elements of the social compact.

Again: Mr. Chairman, I do conceive, though I say it with all deference for the better judgment and the more enlarged intelligence of honorable gentlemen from the West, that this system is unjust and injurious to the new States themselves. The primary interests, sir, of those States are to increase and condense population within their own borders, whilst the effect of this system, sir, is to scatter population, and drain those States of their inhabitants, by emigration into the wilderness for the benefit of pre-emption. Sir, it is not the citizens of the old, but of the new, the border States, who go in advance of the land sales, and of the public surveyor, to settle on the rich soil, or by the flowing stream of the forest. I recollect, sir, some years since, being in the State of Kentucky, and noticing that the spirit of emigration was much more rife there than in my own State. The traveller, sir, was constantly met by families and caravans of emigrants, leaving the rich lands of that noble State, and seeking a home in the far West; and never, sir, was I so forcibly reminded as on that occasion of the truth, as well as poetry, of the oft-repeated line from Berkeley:

"Westward the star of empire takes its way."

Sir, this system not only deprives the new States of their inhabitants, but it reduces the value of their lands; for by reducing the best Government land to a dollar and a quarter, the best settled land must be reduced in the same ratio, and these settlers on the public land get a long credit, and prevent their being purchased at Government sales, and are for years exempt from paying taxes to the State.

I am, Mr. Chairman, opposed to this whole system, because it is peculiarly unjust to the old States. I cannot, sir, but view it as one of those measures calculated, if not intended, to deprive the old States of all interest in the public lands. By enabling the settler to select the best lands, and thus leaving the poorer unsold for years, it co-operates with, and provides for, than plan of graduation so long talked of, and now before the House for final action, and thus the annual proceeds and the aggregate value of the land will be reduced to a mere cipher. These lands, sir, even what was formerly designated the Crown lands, wrested from the British nation by the blood and treasure of the "old thirteen" States, and after some controversy, were eventually ceded by the States within whose limits they were, to the nation, to be used as a common fund to pay off the debt of the several States and the nation, and for the "only use and benefit of such of the States as have or shall come into the Union." That debt, the cost of the Revolution, sir, which has been stated by the Treasury Department at $135,193,703, has been paid off by the sales of the public lands; for the amount paid by purchasers is stated at $106,245,656 88; and if to this be added the value of twenty-eight and a half millions of acres granted in bounties and to States and colleges, the aggregate, I apprehend, will more than discharge the Revolutionary debt and that incurred by the purchase of Louisiana and Florida; at all events, the Revolutionary debt has been paid off, and the States have a right to a distribution of the future proceeds according to the terms of the compacts of cession. The present estimate of the quantity of the public lands is 292,000,000 acres within the States and Territories, and 750,000,000 beyond them; and the amount of land sold since 1820 is rising 61,000,000 acres, being about 3,500,000, acres annually, the nett proceeds of which is something over one dollar per acres; and if the annual nett proceeds were distributed among the States, the proportion coming to New Jersey annually would be over $70,000—a sum sufficient to pay all her State and county taxes, or to educate all the poor children in the State. And this amount would be not for one or two years, but it would require more than eighty years to dispose of those lands lying within the States and Territories, and centuries for the disposition of the millions that lie beyond.

In prospect, sir, of this immense resource for the replenishment of the empty State treasuries, New Jersey was one of the last States to join the Confederacy without a guaranty that the Crown lands, which should be obtained by the joint effort of all, should be a common fund for all the States; but she did come in without such guaranty, eloquently appealing to her sister States for the justice of her claim, and that appeal, sir, was magnanimously responded to by New York, Virginia, and the other States whose limits embraced the public lands. New Jersey, sir, at that trying time was peculiarly situated. She extended about as far from the coast as the rays of civilization had then penetrated, whilst all beyond was shrouded in one vast wilderness, in which she had no part or lot; other States had more or less wild land to pledge for the redemption of their heavy debts, or to stimulate, in bounties, their quota of troops. New Jersey, sir, had none, and yet she never was behind in her supplies, either of money or soldiers; nor did her brave and hardy sons who composed the Jersey brigade ever shrink from duty, although their native State could point them to no bounty land whither they might repair when victory was achieved, or which might be a home for their widows or orphans; and yet, sir, they won by their valor the high eulogium from the commander-in-chief, that in the hour of danger the Jersey brigade might always be relied on. Sir, the brave spirits that composed that brigade have crumbled to dust, but their sons and descendants still live, and they now ask, through their Representatives on this floor, to participate in the rich inheritance obtained by the blood and the bravery of their fathers.

PRE-EMPTION TO SETTLERS.

REMARKS OF MR. YELL,

OF ARKANSAS,

In the House of Representatives, June 14, 1838—On the bill granting Pre-emption Rights.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would not now trespass on the already nearly exhausted patience of the House, were I not disposed to place myself in a correct attitude before the people of my State. Sir, I represent a people who are tenacious of their rights; who at all times hold their representatives responsible for their acts; and as I am ever ready to acknowledge myself bound to obey their wishes, whilst I consult the good of my country, I should be guilty of gross injustice to myself, and of neglect towards them, if I should see this bill pass, and not, on my part, make a solitary effort to inform them how I stand in relation to it.

The importance of this measure is not fully understood by gentlemen from the old States, or by those sections of the Union where the vexed question of the rightful mode of the disposition of the public domain has been but little agitated. Whilst I do not intend to cast any censure on gentlemen coming from the sections of the Union to which I have made reference, and whilst it is far from my design to accuse them of supineness or neglect of duty, I must be permitted to say that, if they had studied the subject, fully and elaborately, or visited the West, they would not now be found arraying themselves against a proposition that is founded in right, and must ever be attained by the immutable principles of justice.

In making these remarks, I shall be justified in exempting from their application the example set by one of the most distinguished sons of New England. The gentleman to whom I refer is, as his political life will show, a friend to the settler and the West. Sir, that statesman, some ten or twelve months since, for the purpose of making himself familiar with the wants of the West, her resources, her lawful desires and legitimate rights, visited that region of the country, and from his own personal observation obtained that information which taught him the correctness of the doctrine of pre-emptions, and strengthened him in advocating the rights of that class of Western Americans who have been, and now are, reproachfully denominated squatters.

Mr. Speaker, you did me the honor, at the commencement of this session of Congress, to place me on the Committee of Public Lands; and, in the hands of that body, this bill, with all its defects, (if any it have,) received its sanction. I voted for it in committee, and I am ready to sustain it in its pilgrimage through this House. If I had kept my seat, and suffered the bill to march its "lonely way" in silence, I might be accused, and probably with some propriety, with being indifferent about its passage. To escape the possibility of such an accusation, I take my stand in favor of the bill; and, whilst I shall occupy the floor for a brief period only, I shall respectfully ask your attention and indulgence.

Mr. Speaker, it has pleased an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] a gentleman who, notwithstanding his ardent opposition to all my political predilections, I esteem for the soundness of his head and nobleness of his heart, to introduce an amendment to the bill, which, in my opinion, is decidedly and directly destructive of all the objects and designs of the advocates of pre-emption rights.

Sir, I am not at all disposed to say aught that can justly be ascribed to an offensive and querulous disposition towards the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I trust that he will exercise that liberality of sentiment which should characterize us all in our conduct in life.

And what is the amendment that the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes? Here it is:

"Insert in the 26th line, after the words 'United States,' and upon the third proviso, in said bill, the following words:

"Nor shall the benefit of this act extend to any person who has before availed himself of a pre-emptive right to the entry of any of the public lands, and acquired a title thereto by reason of such entry."

As I am not disposed to do the gentleman from Massachusetts an act of injustice, I must, in the exercise of that charity which I hope I shall always practise, maintain the opinion that that gentleman, at the time he conceived his amendment, was not fully aware of the baleful operation it would have on the bill, and on the people of the West, if, by any untoward providence, it were adopted. The gentleman cannot and has not advanced a solitary plausible reason to support the hypothesis he has assigned.

The amendment of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to exclude from all participation in the benefits of this bill all who have heretofore received the benefits of the pre-emption laws which have existed and expired. Sir, this proposition is an attempt to restrict the liberal and legitimate provisions of this bill; and if it should be sustained, it would operate with great hardship and severity, not to say oppression and injustice, on my constituents—on the whole united West.

A simple statement of the facts connected with this bill, and with the objects it contemplates, will, I hope, satisfy this House of the injustice of the gentleman's amendment, and prevent its adoption.

Previous to the year 1830, the year of the passage of the first general pre-emption law, Arkansas was but sparsely settled; and what settlements she could boast of were confined principally to a comparatively few counties. In the years 1831 and 1832, and since those periods, the tide of emigration has been rapidly setting to the West; carrying with it a body of emigrants, men of nerve, of correct and industrious habits, who are now, and ever will be, ready to fight your battles and defend your rights. Some of them, probably thousands, have received the benefits arising out of the act of 1830. Some of them obtained their pre-emptive rights whilst they were residents of Alabama, Mississippi, Illinois, and Missouri. The country in which they were originally located, and whilst residents of which they obtained pre-emptive rights, was found uncongenial with their habits, their wishes, their wants, or was not calculated to realize their hopes and anticipations. They had prejudices to gratify, they had families which looked up to them for support, and the realization of better days; they resolved that they would emigrate to the new wilds of the still further West, and there, amid luxuriant regions, abounding with fertile plains and prairies, and pellucid lakes, and those other allurements which have lived in the fancy of the poet, or been blazoned on the speaking canvass of the painter, if they have been traversed by the enterprising trader, to establish their homes, rear their offspring, and transfer the forest into cultivated fields. Their examples are entitled to all commendation. But because they happened to have received, through the indulgence and wisdom of the pre-emptive laws, a little bounty, a miserable stipend, under the act of 1830, and the acts subsequent to it, and made use of it, in carrying civilization, and human enterprise, and justice, and law, still further West, would you issue the law of proscription against them, and cut them off from all participation of the act now before us, which is, in fact, and will be found in its operation, not a bill to encourage the gambling speculator, but an act for the benefit of the Western emigrant—for him who toils, and who is yet destined to toil, for the promotion of the wealth of the nation!

Sir, I am not prepared to believe, even for a moment, that this House can be capable of adopting the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts. He professes, sir, the kindest feelings for the West, I honor him for it; and let me say that, by withdrawing his amendment, and giving to this bill his cordial support, he will give indisputable evidence of the sincerity of his professions to, and friendship for, the West. I regret his hostility to this bill, because of his high standing in this House and the country.

Mr. Speaker, whilst I am making my acknowledgments to my esteemed friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] suffer me to tender to the able and distinguised gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. POPE,] in behalf of my constituents, their and my hearty thanks for the able and impartial cooperation he has lent all the friends of this measure, and for the repeated manifestations he has made of his devotion to his former friends and neighbors in Arkansas. The people of my State know him well: for a number of years he was their chief Executive; and, whilst with them, he not only contributed much to their happiness, but, by a course of unceasing kindness and manliness, softened many of the asperities which at one time existed among them, and, by the display of that wisdom and sound judgment which were always predominating qualities of his heart, led them on to a just appreciation of that form of civil Government which now distinguishes this from all other people. The people of Arkansas will long acknowledge their indebtedness to the gentleman from Kentucky; and, in justice to that gentleman, I could not say less than I have already uttered. His knowledge of my people, of their industry and devotion to the best interests of the country, has won for them an able advocate on this floor; one who has been of infinite service to them, by placing properly before this House their claims to the benefits of the bill now under consideration. And, sir, I feel assured that if my friend from Massachusetts had seen the condition of the settlers of the West, as well as my friend from Kentucky, he would have been equally just and liberal.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee by which this bill was reported, I feel called upon to answer some of the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. RICE GARLAND,] why he prefers his amendment to the bill. Sir, those objections are founded in a misapprehension of the ground assumed by the friends and defenders of the bill. The gentleman says that he prefers his amendment, because he has more effectually provided against those frauds which are practised on the country by those who make settlements by PROXY; that his amendment declares all such settlements fraudulent, and all transfers or conveyances previous to the issuing of the patent null and void. That protection which he desires to afford, by his amendment, I conceive is amply provided for in the bill now under consideration. It revives the act of 1830, which expressly declares all transfers, sales, or conveyances, previous to the issuing of the patent, to be null and void.

[Here Mr. GARLAND said the Commissioner of the General Land Office had given a different construction, as he understood it, founded on the opinion of the Attorney General, to which he referred. That opinion was, that the act of 1834 revived the act of 1830; and, as the act of 1832 was a supplement to the act of 1830, it also revived that act, leaving them all in force at the same time; and by the revival of the act of 1832, its provisions repealed, expressly, the prohibitory clause in the act of 1830, and authorizes the transfer of certificates, and even the issue of patents, to the assignee.]

Mr. YELL resumed the floor. Sir, I admit every word of the gentleman's explanation, and stand ready to still further admit that the facts he states are true; but I doubt the application of them to the present bill. The fact, sir, of the revival of the bill of 1830 does not, therefore, necessarily revive the subsequent acts; and if it does not revive the act of 1832, which contains the repealing clause of the act of 1830, then the act of 1830 is left in full force, with this prohibitory clause, which will prevent all frauds which may be attempted to be perpetrated. In this opinion, however, I may be mistaken, as the authority upon which the gentleman from Louisiana relies is entitled to great weight and respectful consideration. If correct, it still can be provided for by an amendment to this bill. The balance of the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] is substantially the same as the bill, with one or two exceptions, which, in my view, are not as liberal as the bill. One objection to the amendment I have is to be found in the prohibiting any one receiving the benefit of this act who has one hundred and sixty acres of land in the same land district, and who has abandoned it and has settled upon public land; and that objection, it appears to me, is neither founded in reason or public policy, and therefore I object to it.

Again: By the provisions of the gentleman's amendment, this act will not apply to public lands which have been offered for sale. The bill is more liberal, and extends to ALL PUBLIC LANDS. I therefore greatly prefer the bill to the amendment. The bill is sufficiently guarded; its provisions are well understood by the department and the country; and every man in the new States will be able to understand what is necessary for him to do to bring himself within the provisions of the act. Having attempted to remove some of the objections to the bill, I will add but a word upon its general principles—a topic that has been ably discussed, on all sides, with singular ability and address.

I should be guilty of an act of injustice to my colleague of the Committee on Public Lands, (Mr. CASEY, of Illinois,) if I were to neglect to bear witness to the zeal and fidelity and intelligence that have, at all times, been displayed by him, in connection with the subject of the public lands, and particularly in relation to this bill, during its progress in committee and since its introduction before the House. His aid is felt and acknowledged here by all, and will be appreciated by his constituents and the people of the West.

Mr. Speaker, I will trouble the House but a short time upon the merits of the bill. It is not denied by me, although others may differ, that the public domain of the United States belongs to the whole People. It became common property at the close of the Revolution, and was then set apart to aid in defraying the expenses of the war. That object has been accomplished, it having yielded the sum of $106,000,000, leaving upwards of 240,000,000 acres still to be disposed of, as will be seen by reference to public document No 80, page 8, to which I respectfully refer the attention of the gentlemen who take an interest in this subject.

Exhibit of the estimated quantity of public land in each State and Territory; the quantity surveyed; the quantity offered at public sale; with the quantity sold, and the amount received therefor, from the earliest period of the sales to the 30th September, 1837.

(a) The lands ceded by the Chickasaws are not taken into the account in any of these amounts; also, the lands in Ohio, to be sold for the benefit of the Indians, have been excluded. (b) Estimated on Searcy's map. In calculating the unsurveyed lands, one-third was deducted for water and swamps. (c) Six townships of land, offered for sale in October, 1837, are included in this quantity.

Whilst I am on this branch of the subject-matter now under discussion, I may as well reply statistically to those gentlemen who oppose this bill on the ground that if no other evil would result from it, it would lessen the amount of money received from sales of public lands, which is now so much needed. In assuming that position, gentlemen err, and err grossly, as will be seen by an examination of the following tables. I will take the two years of the existence of the acts granting pre-emptions, that of the 9th of June, 1834, and compare it with the years 1833 and 1837, when there was no pre-emption in force.

Mr. Speaker, as one of the material objects had in view, by those who conceived the scheme which was not long since adopted for the regulation and management of our public land system, has been attained, it is now our duty to adopt a policy that will mete common justice to every portion of the Union, and produce the greatest good to the greatest number; and if that be attempted, benefits may result from our legislation, and, in the end, we may be enabled to see that he who contends that the public domain is the common property of the whole people effects the mode best calculated to promote the best interests of the country.

And, besides all this sir, who that contemplates the subject, who that has contemplated it, can doubt the correctness of the position, so often defended when defence was not necessary, and so often neglected when defence was needed, that it is the duty of statesmen to legislate in that way which shall effect the greatest good for the greatest number? Sir, for one, I cannot, although I am not disposed to deny that the minority has rights that should not be disregarded, or the soundness of the views which have elicited these incidental observations.

The public domain is on of the principal sources of the wealth of a nation. As such, it is regarded on all sides, and the man is yet to be found who is so unsound in mind, and impolitic in action, as to dream of placing it, either in mass or in parcel, in the hands of speculators, or at the disposal of monopolizing corporations, at the same rates of price which are received at the hands of the hardy yeomanry. If this proposition be admitted, (and it is not doubted,) there can be no better mode adopted or conceived for the disposition of the public lands than that which is embraced in the bill now before the House; nor, sir, do I presume that the policy of the bill, as is contended by some, will be to throw the whole public domain at once into the market: a result that would, and should, be deprecated at once by every practical statesman, as it would be attended by two evils, at least: first, your land would be immediately monopolized beyond a doubt, and the injurious consequences of such an issue must be obvious to all; and the fact is so palpable, that it cannot be necessary to spend a word in discussing the proposition; secondly, it would create a redundancy in your public coffers, which would end in a scramble and quarrel for its distribution. Again: the spirit of the times does not require, nor would it sanction, so large a surplus, and the rejection of the proposition would be sustained by the most able and unanswerable arguments. The interests of the country generally, but more particularly the manufacturing community, would not desire to see this branch of the revenue supply the whole demand for the support of the Government. Sir, I need not say to this House that the tariff would be seriously affected by such a policy; yes, sir, it might be destroyed: the consequences I will neither anticipate nor mention.

Then, sir, upon the principles on which I conceive this Government should legislate, we should endeavor to regulate our tariff in such a way as would impose impost duties, in addition to the receipts for the sale of the public lands, precisely to an amount that might be demanded by the actual wants of the Government. We should have a tariff based on just and equitable principles, equal to the administration of the Government, without giving to it the least aspect of protection for one branch of national industry, to the neglect and exclusion of the other, and yet so modeling it as to do no justice to that valuable class of our citizens who are now engaged in manufacturing pursuits. It would be as unjust to the new States to bring into market an over portion of the public lands as it would be to the manufacturers to repeal the whole system of duties on imports at the instant, without advisal, and without affording timely notice of the impending act. Upon every principle of justice, the branches of national wealth should receive equally and alike a kind and generous support. It has now become not only a matter of policy, but of duty, not to disappoint the expectations of the people when they have been raised by the active and evident determination to gratify their hopes.

It will be seen, by the table, that we have already have a large portion of the public domain which has been in the market for twenty years, and which is so unproductive as not to induce the speculator to enter it at the Government price. If this policy, therefore, should be found not to produce a revenue from the public lands, you would be compelled to bring into market the new land, which is considered more valuable for all the purposes of cultivation. The only prudent and judicious course to pursue in relation to these poor lands would be, to reduce the price of them, and to secure to those who have settled them the preference over all others; and as much as this they are entitled to, from every consideration of justice and sound policy.

Mr. Speaker, the two hundred and forty millions of acres of public lands now under the control of the Government belong to the whole people; they are as much mine and my constituents as they are yours. They have been taken possession of, a small portion of them, for they belonged to us all, as tenants in common; and, by thus entering on them, your constituents and mine did but exercise a common, if not a legal right, which came into existence with your pre-emptive system of the years 1807, 1814, 1824, and 1830. In the last named year a general bill was passed, giving to actual settlers on all the public lands the privilege of entering one hundred and sixty acres at the Government price, which is within a fraction as much as your speculators give. For further information on this subject I beg leave to refer the House to document No. 80, page 3.

That amount may be properly considered a protection as far as it goes, and no more. I now call on our Eastern friends to say whether they will be satisfied with that protection for their manufactures; and, if not, (and I am sure that they will not) I shall ask them if they are prepared to do unto others as they would have others to do unto them? Are you not willing to give the pioneer, who has buffeted the storm, struggled arm to arm, and breast to breast, in bloody conflict with the savage foe; who has opened your roads, and improved your whole domain, a preference over the grasping speculator, who has rendered no service to your country? Are you prepared to say by your legislation that the poor settler, who has made his little improvement, erected his log cabin, amid all the hardships and dangers incident to the settlement of a new country, shall be at the mercy of the moneyed power? that such a man shall not have one farthing for his labor? Can you, will you, throw his improvement into the market, to be purchased by some remorseless speculator, at one dollar and twenty-five cents the acre?

Sir, this House is not prepared for any such act of cruelty and injustice. It is not ripe enough in perfidy to aid in a scheme calculated to rob the pioneers of the West of their legitimate rights. As well, sir, might the Government, or the purchaser of the settlement of the pioneer, divest him of his horse, his sheep, and his cattle, and sell them, and put the avails of them in the coffers of the Government, or the pockets of the speculator, as to take away the property he had acquired by his industry. Sir, I am sure that my Government is not prepared for the commission of any such acts of outrage; nor will I believe it capable of any such baseness and madness till I am compelled to acknowledge the mortifying fact by those evidences which can only be believed when they fall within the range of our personal observation.

I have already trespassed too long upon the kind indulgence of the House, and will close with begging the friends of this bill to reject all amendments that may finally endanger its passage. It is not the best we could desire, but it will afford relief to thousands, and make glad the hearts of many of your most worthy and industrious citizens, who feel that their little all depends upon the liberality of this House, to save them from the iron grasp of the merciless speculator. I am now done; after returning my acknowledgments to the House for their patience and attention.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

SPEECH OF MR. RHETT,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, June 25, 1838—On the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. PRENTISS,] in the exordium of his speech, delivered a few days since, thought proper freely to descanted on the course and position of that portion of the State Rights party, to which I profess to belong. He taunted us with our "new allies," associated on the great measure before the committee, with a corrupt Administration," to which we had been most bitterly opposed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] has given an individual direction to these charges, by speaking of my "new zeal" as a convert—"the joys of the honey-moon"—and many of those interesting flights of fancy in oratory, on which his reputation for statesmanship so justly and entirely depends. In simple language, the charge is—a change in our political associations and conduct, without sufficient reasons to justify it; and the charge will be just or groundless, according to the strength of the reasons. They have been repeatedly assigned before; but error can sometimes only be refuted by continual refutation.

Now, sir, so far as I am personally concerned I might deny any change in my political associations or conduct, and leave all accusers to make out, if they can, the truth of their charges. I came here allied to no party—knowing nothing of the course the new Administration was about to pursue—deeply distrustful of its policy, but prepared to support it in every measure it should propose to the country consistent with those great political and constitutional principles which I have ever maintained. In this spirit of distrust, I voted for the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr.

BELL] as Speaker of this House—a vote which I have never regretted, and under similar circumstances, would with cheerfulness give it again; not doubting that he would preside over our deliberations with dignity and impartiality to this body, and honor to himself. The President's message came, and I saw in its general principles my own principles reflected; and in the financial policy it recommended, the very measure my own judgment, after mature deliberation at home, had approved. I hesitated not a moment. My course was open before me. But I am aware, sir, that it would be egregious self-exaggeration to suppose that these charges of political tergiversation are designed for me alone. They were begun in the other wing of the Capitol; and are carried on here to affect others far more worthy of public consideration than I can presume to be; and to break down that moral influence which a faithful adherence to principles must ever command. I propose very briefly to show that the measure before you, separating the Government from all connection with the banks or the capital of the country, is a State Rights measure; and that the State Rights party, unless they were prepared to abandon their principles, could not have acted otherwise than they have done—support it.

At the commencement of this Government, two great parties rose, as to the policy of its administration—the Federal and Republican parties. The one, fearing that it was too weak—the other, that it was too strong. The one, striving by construction, to add to its powers—the other, insisting that it should be kept within the powers plainly granted by the Constitution. The one, endeavoring to build up and strengthen the Federal head—the other, leaning to the support of the reserved rights of the States. The one, claiming jurisdiction over sectional interests—the other, limiting its legislation to those interests common and general to the whole confederacy. Now, sir, if the measure before you, is not a Republican State Rights measure, according to these great principles, I am prepared to abandon it.

In the first place, is the bill on your table, proposing to collect eventually the revenues of this Government in the constitutional currency, by its own agents, plainly constitutional, without the aid of construction to support it? This is admitted by all. It is opposed only on grounds of expediency. But how is it with the alternative to this bill—a United States Bank? Is that measure plainly constitutional, without the aid of construction to support it? Why, it lives by construction alone; formerly, from the revenue power; and latterly, from the commercial power. When first proposed by Alexander Hamilton, in 1792, it was opposed by Mr. Jefferson, and the whole Republican party of that day, expressly on the ground of its unconstitutionality. In fact, it was the first great measure on which the Federal and Republican parties divided. It has been vetoed by two Presidents on constitutional grounds; and, although sanctioned by Mr. Madison and the Republican party in 1816, it was not a Republican, but a Federal measure, supported solely on the ground of necessity, from the peculiar situation of the country, deranged, embarrassed, and exhausted by the late war. In the second place, will the bill tend to strengthen this Government, the Federal head? I shall not attempt to refute what is of course irrefutable, the wild declamation on this subject, against the increased power, it is affirmed, the bill will give to the Executive authority. This bill proposes but nine additional officers; and unless gentlemen can show that hundreds have the political weight of millions, and that individuals are as powerful as banks, it is useless to declaim upon the subject. It is the result of an ignorance of official details, to suppose that the control of the President over the money in the Treasury will be greater when the money is kept by officers of the Treasury, than when it is deposited with banks. In either case, the money can only be drawn by a warrant of the Comptroller, countersigned by the Secretary of the Treasury, on which the check of the Treasurer issues, and which could as easily be obtained, if these officers are corrupt, when the money is deposited with banks, as in the hands of officers. The depository, in either case, will only look to the authenticity of the draft, and will know nothing and care nothing of the application of the funds. But compare the bill in this respect, with its alternative—a United States Bank, of fifty millions of dollars, stationed at the centre place of commerce, with branches in every State of the Union. Who shall measure the political power of such an institution, associated with the Executive of this Government? When the late President of the United States Bank was asked by the committee of this House, whether, by the power of that institution, he could crush any of the State banks in the Union, he answered in the affirmative. And what better proof do we need of the truth of this opinion than the power that bank has displayed in its late contest with this Government, which no influence could have resisted, but that of the late President of the United States, with a popularity unsurpassed in the history of this Government, and an energy of will but rarely equalled in the history of men? The fate of that bank will be a lesson to any future institution you may establish, which will not be in vain. Banks and capital are the natural allies of Government. Hereafter, they will move on harmoniously together under this Government; the one strengthening the other, in all their projects of aggrandizement; and if the liberties of the country shall susvive their coalition a few years, it will not be because they cannot be annihilated. In the last place, what is the sectional operation of this bill? It proposes, by collecting the revenues of the Government in the constitutional currency, to leave all the sections of the Union to the full enjoyment of their natural advantages, under the operation of the general laws of commerce. Will this be so, under the operation of a United States Bank? Such a bank will be able to control the exchanges all over the Union; and by appreciating or depreciating them, force the tide of commerce into those channels it shall desire to favor. Wherever it is located will be the centre place of credit; and by the superior means of commercial accommodation it will afford, from its own great resources, and the credit of the Government, it will tend to centralize the whole commerce of the Union, and destroy that of the weaker sections. Thus, sir, if I am correct in my views of the political and commercial tendency of this bill, it is strictly a State Rights measure. It is clearly constitutional, without the aid of construction to support it. It does not tend to strengthen the Federal Government at the expense of the States. It does not operate partially on the different sections of the Union.

But there is another reason, Mr. Chairman, why the State Rights party should support this bill, which, to every candid mind, ought to shield them from the least imputation of change in purposes, or abandonment of principles. It is emphatically their measure. When, in 1836, the employment of the State banks to carry on the fiscal operations of the Government, was proposed as a substitute for the United States Bank, the State Rights party, brought forward as their msasure, Mr. Gordon's bill, which provided for a separation of the Government from the banks, and the collection of its revenues in the constitutional currency. The Administration party was then opposed to the measure—they now support it. Can gentlemen suppose us so lost to all sense of duty and propriety, as to act upon the mere principle of stupid party hatred, and oppose our own measures and principles, because others agree with them? I put it to every honorable man who hears me, how could we have done otherwise than support this bill? Suppose that it did throw us, as the gentleman from Mississippi says, in alliance with a "corrupt Administration,"—what then? Do our principles depend on the corruption of others? Have he and his associates ever esteemed us so low, as to suppose that we would oppose any Administration of this Government, whether its measures were good or bad, without any regard to the welfare of the people or the principles of the Constitution? And what does he mean by a "corrupt Administration?" Does he mean the useless and extravagant sectional appropriations made on this floor? Why, his Northern allies are always the chief instruments in all such legislation. Does he mean any thing more than a party distribution of the offices of the Government—the spoils? And is it for so poor and contemptible a purpose, to divert the spoils into another (if you please, a better) channel, or to enjoy them, that any man worthy of the confidence of the people, would be justified, in the peculiar position in which the South is placed, in paltering with his principles, or in abandoning hers? Since the gentleman rebukes us for our "allies," he will surely pardon the inquiry, who are his? A State Rights Southern man himself, he co-operates with those who are mortally opposed to every political or constitutional principle which the South deems necessary to her interests and safety. There stand by his side all the consolidationists and Federalists from the whole Union—the Bank, the Tariff, Internal Improvement, high taxes, profuse expenditure, surplus revenue, advocates; and close to his shoulder, the Spartan phalanx of the Whigs—the fraternal South loving sixty-four, who maintain the new doctrine of the right of petition, by which jurisdiction over our domestic institutions is attempted to be usurped; and the still more affectionate thirty-six, who but day before yesterday voted that the SPEAKER had no right to call the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] to order, for maintaining and arguing on this floor, that Congress had a right to receive and act upon petitions from our own slaves against their masters. Sir, if I was to choose my allies, without any regard to political principles, I tell the gentleman from Mississippi I should be sorry to find myself in his position. I know that he is no Abolitionist; and that a large portion of the Whig party are no Abolitionists. To make such a charge against them, would be a great wrong to them, and a still greater to myself: but the Abolitionists are unquestionably his allies,* as is shown not only by the votes on your journals to which I have adverted, but by the late legislative proceedings of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut, in relation to slavery. The Whigs voted en masse for the resolutions passed on that subject, by the Legislatures of these States, and the supporters of the Administration, to a man, I understand, voted against them. It may be that but little is to be obtained for the South from this Administration, as the gentleman from Mississippi strongly prophesies; but what can the South possibly gain from the gentleman's allies? And when he shall have succeeded in bringing them into power, with all their principles and policy, by which the jurisdiction and powers of this Government shall be enlarged, and all those barriers of the Constitution, upon which the South relies for protection, short of revolution, shall be thrown down—on him, and the other Southern gentlemen who shall aid in the achievement, will rest the responsibility of evil to the South. I prefer, sir, my position—co-operating on the great measure before you with those who uphold the Administration, amongst whom alone I find any congeniality with my political principles. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] perceives this; and therefore a few days since denounced the President of the United States as a Northern man with Southern principles.† For this reason he opposes—he detests the Administration. Is it for the same reason that Southern gentlemen co-operate with him for its overthrow? The gentleman from Massachusetts surely thinks so, and hence his endless invectives every morning against Texas and slavery, for the special gratification and encouragement of his Southern associates. Sir, I prefer my position—identified with neither the Whig nor the Administration party, but prepared to act zealously with either, whenever they support those measures and principles upon which I believe

*See the address of the Republican party in Congress, lately put forth by the members of Congress.

†The following are Mr. ADAMS's words as contained in his speech published in the Intelligencer, speaking of the admission of Texas into the Union: "Now that this is a question between the free and the slave States, I believe no one can have any doubt at all. That it is a question peculiarly interesting to the present Administration, which is understood avowedly, boastingly, and openly, to be the Administration of a Northern man with Southern principles, there can be no doubt. This is the combination of the committee, a sectional combination of interests of the slaveholding against the free States, and an Administration combination of a Northern Administration with Southern principles."

the prosperity of the South and the peace of the Union depends.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi commenced his argument on the bill, by defining what was money. He maintains that bank notes are as much money, according to the Constitution, as gold and silver coin; that the Constitution did not determine what was money, but only designed to fix a standard of money, like the yard stick or pound weight, in weights and measures; and that bank notes being equal to the standard, were money. His deduction that, therefore, the Government had no right to refuse to receive bank notes in payment of its dues, is certainly good, if his premises are correct. Has the Constitution failed to provide what should alone be money? In the 8th section it says: "Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures?" Now, if a standard of money was all that was designed by this clause, why was not the coinage power put in the same category with "the standard of weights and measures?" Why does the clause not stop at the power to "regulate the value thereof," but superadds the power "to coin money?" What is it "to coin money?" It is, "to stamp metal and convert it into money." Before gold or silver is stamped by Government authority, it is bullion or plate; when stamped, it is money. But the 10th section of the Constitution is the best commentary on this clause, and leaves no room for argument: "No State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, or make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." To make money or a paper substitute, is thus entirely taken from the States. Now, is it reasonable to suppose that the Constitution intended to take away from the States the power of making money, or any legal substitute, and yet to recognise as money the paper of private banking corporations established by the States. Can that be money which no authority in this country, neither the States nor the General Government, can make a tender in payment of debts to a single man within the jurisdiction of either? What is a bank note? It does not on its face pretend to be money, but is a mere promise to pay money. It differs in no respect from the promissory note of an individual; excepting that it is in general a better, although it is sometimes a worse, security for money. But admit the position of the gentleman, that coin is only the standard of money: are bank notes as infallibly equal to coin, their standard, as the yard stick or the pound weight to theirs? If they are, whether the Constitution has made them money or not, is but of little consequence, and I may admit that they ought to be received in payment of the public dues. But what bank in this country or in any other is able always infallibly to redeem its notes with specie, dollar for dollar? By their charters, they are generally authorized to issue notes to three times the amount of their capital; and even the Bank of England, the soundest bank in the world, supposes its duty to the public performed by retaining in its vaults specie or bullion to the amount of one-third of its issues. The truth is, no bank notes in this country represent specie. They are issued upon the faith of the paper of individuals, which the banks receive for their notes; and if this paper was all to fail, every bank in the country would immediately be ruined. Bank notes, then, do not represent specie, and are not equal to the standard of specie. They represent credit, and constitute a part of the currency, but are not the money, of the country.

Having shown, at least to his own satisfaction, that bank notes are money, the next step, in the course of the gentleman's argument, was to identify the interests of the people with them. The banks, he maintains, are the people, and the Government being opposed to a connection with the banks, therefore separates itself from the people, and, in fact, is waging hostilities against them. It is thus that a false issue is attempted to be made, which places the Government against the people, instead of stating the matter as, I trust, I shall show it really is—a contest between the banks and the Government, between the capitalists and the people; in which the banks and the capitalists are the aggressors. The whole strength of the cause the gentleman and his associates advocate, however disguised by sophistries and clouded by declamation, rests on the false issue they have thus artfully made and imposed upon the people. Let the true nature of the controversy be once understood, and their spell of power will be gone. Are the banks the people?

The banks are not the people, on account of the capital invested in them. The banking capital of the United States, authorized by law, exclusive of deposites, I find stated at two hundred and fifty-one millions of dollars. The whole of this capital is not in active operation. In Mississippi I understand that the bank capital is from forty to fifty millions; but not more than fifteen or twenty millions are paid in. In South Carolina, out of about twenty-four millions authorized by law, fourteen have not been subscribed for. But, admitting that the whole bank capital in the United States, authorized by law, is in active operation, what proportion does it bear to the whole capital of the United States? The difference can hardly be compared. Billions, not millions, must enter into the calculation.

Are the banks the people, on account of the number of individual proprietors of their stock? Take the banking capital already stated; put the shares at one hundred dollars each, and five shares to each stockholder, and we have about half a million individuals stockholders in these institutions. I am satisfied that this is far beyond the truth; for, of the twenty-two millions of stock said to be owned by Europeans in the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, there are not probably more than one hundred individuals to whom it belongs. Supposing, however, that a half million of individuals are immediately interested as stockholders in the banks, and that all of them are citizens of the United States, they will constitute about one-thirtieth part of the population of the United States.

[Mr. PRENTISS rose and said, that when he maintained that the banks were the people, he did not mean that they were so on account of the number immediately interested in them as stockholders, or the amount of capital invested in their stock; but because their currency was in the hands of the people, and thus their interests became the interests of the people.]

I am going on, Mr. Chairman, with my analysis, and will, in due time, come to the gentleman's main reason for his position. I wish to remove every stone out of our way as we advance. If the banks had continued to fulfil their engagements to the country, no one would have been found so hardy as to set up in their behalf this more than monarchical pretension of being the people. Although endowed with many powerful privileges by the people, they would hardly have thought it expedient or politic to claim, on account of them, a mastery of the Government, and an equality and identity with the people themselves. But the failure of the banks to redeem their promises, has given them a power that their honest fulfilment of them could never have bestowed. When they failed, there were two classes of individuals connected with them—their creditors and debtors; those to whom they owed, and those who owed them. The latter class were comparatively few; generally capitalists, who borrowed of them, under the expectation of an easy indulgence; but compelled, by their inordinate expansion of paper, suddenly to contract their issues and call in their debts, the banks crippled or crushed their debtors, by their unexpected and ruinous demands for payment. This operation, I presume, will not go far in establishing their title of being the people. The former class, however—those to whom they owed—the people who had received their notes on the faith of their convertibility into money, constituted by far the most numerous in interest. By issuing their notes they had either driven from the country, or retained in their vaults, all the coin which would have been in circulation; and their debts, substituted for it, became the currency of the country. Hence every body became their debtors, and interested in their solvency. They failed; and then their wrong became their prerogative and right. From being moneyed corporations to advance the gain of individuals, they rose up to be the people. Their indebtedness gave them power, and their capacity to injure the country produced this most arrogant pretension. In ancient times, the debtor was made the slave of his creditor; but here, the matter is reversed, and the creditor is to be made the slave of the debtor. Because the banks owe the people, they are the people. This is the plain affirmation and argument. It is upon such grounds as these that we are called on to lay the Government and the people beneath the feet of the banks and capitalists.

Mr. Chairman, in seeking the co-operation and control of the Government, the banks but follow the uniform law of all capital. Gain is their principle. It was this, not any design to injure others or defraud or oppress the country, which occasioned them to issue paper which they were unable to redeem, and afterwards to refuse to pay. Acting on this principle, each pursuing its own profit, ignorant of the expansions of the other banks, and incapable of controlling if it knew them, they bloated the circulation with their notes beyond the wants of commerce, or their ability to redeem them in specie. Even in England, where the Government has borrowed the whole capital of bank, and therefore supports it by all its credit, it is conceded by all the directors and bankers examined before the Committee of Parliament in 1833, that the Bank of England cannot restrain the issues of the country banks; and that there is no principle in the present system of banking, by which convulsions and explosions in the currency can be prevented. The banks failed from following out too eagerly their great principle—gain, and the inherent weakness of the whole banking system of the country; and when they failed, the same principle which occasioned the disaster, induced them to rush into the arms of that party, which claimed for them the support of Government as their right, and magnified them into the people. To strengthen this Government by associating with it the money power of the country, and establishing their own party ascendancy, is the object of the one—their safety and emolument is the object of the other. But they are not the people.

There is another ground, Mr. Chairman, of far deeper and more delicate consideration, on which the gentleman from Mississippi has contended that the banks are the people. He affirms, as it has also been maintained with great ability in the other wing of this building—that labor is capital, and capital labor; and that the interests of all capital, therefore, whether in banks or in any other form of investment, are the interests of labor and the people. If these positions be true, then, sir, the policy contended for, of associating the Government with the banks and capital of the country, may be proper and necessary. Indeed, all capital, in every department of industry or speculation, should then be taken into the arms of Government. This has not been hitherto the received theory, at least of our free institutions. With us, that the least government is the best, I had supposed had become a maxim, whose truth, philosophy, and experience had alike united to establish. And why should this be so? Because, sir, there are different and opposing interests in society, and especially between those two great elements of industry—capital and labor—which the interference of Government invariably injuries by partiality. Hence non-interference—to leave capital free and labor free, without partial legislation or connection with Government, has been the policy of our free institutions. Whether the interests of labor and capital conflict, or are always identical in interest, is a question, then, lying deep at the very foundation of all Government; and is especially important under our free systems, established confessedly for the benefit of the many.

I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi, in his general views on this great subject. In the first stages of society, labor and capital may move on harmoniously together. Capital is indeed the production of labor; and is generally increased by employing labor; but it does not follow, that on this account, no collision of interest can occur. So long as the means of subsistence are abundant, labor may make terms with capital. If wages are not as high as the profits of capital render fair, labor can leave the employment of capital in that particular pursuit, and turn for subsistence to some other occupation. But there is a great principle in continual operation in society, to which the gentleman from Mississippi has not adverted, which sooner or later takes away all option from labor. It is a proposition, which the whole history of our race demonstrates to be true—that population increases faster than production. The one gains continually upon the other, until at length, not accumulation, but bread, is the sole object of labor. Hence, as population increases wages invariable decline, until the minimum which can support life, is attained. At this stage, and long before this stage, a contest of interest arises between capital and labor. The question, how much of any production shall go to wages, and how much to capital, arises necessarily from their cooperation; and in determining the share to be received by each, capital has the advantage. Suppose one hundred dollars produced by the joint operation of capital and labor—who is to determine the just proportion to which the capitalist and laborer is entitled? Why, generally speaking, the capitalist, who sells the commodity and receives the profits. He is far more intelligent and independent than the laborer, and has the option to employ the laborer or not. If he ceases to employ labor, capital may lose its profits, but if labor is not employed, the laborer may starve. There can be no equality in competition under such circumstances, and with such motives in operation. The love of life is stronger than the love of gain. In power, in intelligence, in the necessities of each, the capitalist clearly has the advantage of the laborer; and when population becomes dense, and the means of subsistence scarce, the wages of labor will then be determined by competition with itself, and not according to the profits of capital. Hence capital and pauperism may go on increasing rapidly together. Where there is the most capital there may be the most want, as the situation of the most civilized nations in the world proclaims. When a man has to work, as in England, eighteen hours a day for bread, and is worn out in eight years, and it is forbidden by statute, that children shall be worked beyond ten hours a day, it is vain to talk of labor competing with capital. Capital is its master; and the profits of capital will be no criterion of wages. The laborer will obtain only the average price of wages, without regard to the profits of capital.

The great principle relied on by political economists, to place labor on an equality of competition with capital, is the one to which I have already alluded—the competition of capital with capital. But, if population increases faster than capital, it is clear that the competition of labor with labor must be more intense than that of capital with capital. But there are other circumstances which tend to lessen the competition of capital, which do not exist in favor of labor, always unceasing in its pressure. The profits of capital are generally concealed, until glaring prosperity points to their source. It is some time, also, before capital vested in other pursuits can be changed into a more lucrative employment. Hence fortunes are always made, before competition from capital can lessen profits in any new pursuit of gain; and labor, during these intervals of exemption from competition by capital, will be employed only at the average price of labor in other occupations. Combinations of capitalists to keep down wages, are also more easy than those of labor to advance them; and, in all such efforts, the laborer must fail, because he must live. Capital cannot starve. Nor can the statute of distribution, on which the gentleman from Mississippi has so much relied for equalizing the competition of labor and capital, at all effect such a result. Suppose capital vested in any particular pursuit—in manufactures, for instance—and it is necessary to distribute it amongst heirs, how will this be done? The factory will be sold, and another proprietor will own it. Capital will only change positions. It will probably be transferred from stocks or merchandise to an investment in the factory; and from the factory to stocks. The factory will still go on as before, and the capital it employs bear the same relation to labor. And what effect can the statute have, when operating immediately on the laborer? Where there is property, the statute can divide it; but of what avail is it to him who works for bread, and not for accumulation, and who can give nothing to his children but life? The statute of distribution cannot touch the question. If there is any relief to labor, from its unequal competition with capital, and its fearful competition with itself, it must be found elsewhere. Is there any relief? Excepting that mightiest and most constant alleviative of suffering and competition in labor—death—I know but two remedies, by which labor can escape from the inevitable effect of population overtaking the means of subsistence; and those are the moral restraint and emigration. The former influence has unfortunately been but feeble hitherto in its effects. Instead of men abstaining from marriage, until means are accumulated which will enable them to support and raise families, deliberate licentiousness has been resorted to to prevent population. This is the experience in European factories; and it is only what might have been anticipated from the course of things. To practice such restraints, requires the higher virtues to be possessed in no ordinary degree. But how can these be expected, when the immediate wants of nature leave no time for mental or moral cultivation? What can the poor child, who works from ten to twelve hours a day, learn of duty or religion? His heart is too much filled with the fear of want, to admit even the fear of God. He works and sleeps; he lives and dies. Want will not allow him to think of duties. He has no time to learn any thing, excepting the art of supplying the first great necessity of nature, to live. To talk to such an one of liberty, is bitter and insulting mockery. He is the born slave of that most relentless of all masters, necessity, which regards neither childhood nor age, sickness nor strength, in its merciless exactions. Hence the laborer growing up to manhood, possessed of neither moral nor intellectual discipline, turns to the only means of gratification in his power,—that which the senses afford; and soon runs round the brief but fatal circle of misery and guilt to an early grave.

The other method of relief from the effects of a superabundant population—emigration, has been far more successful. It is this, labor flying from its own competition, which crowds our shores with paupers and emigrants from the old world. It is this which has populated the West from the Atlantic States, especially those of New England. Whenever labor has found itself straitened by population exceeding the ready means of subsistence, it has found a safe and abundant refuge in the mighty wilds of the West. So long as this resource exists, the free systems of Government in the Northern States may endure. It is the accident of our situation alone, having a continent to people, which has enabled us so long to maintain them. But the time will come,—is rapidly approaching, when the way to the West will be blocked up. Population will increase there too, and diminish the price of labor; and the intermediate States, becoming more crowded, will be more difficult to penetrate. The laborer will be degraded as want presses; until, at length, he will neither have the means nor the enterprise to go away. He will stay and propagate. What, then, will become of the Republican forms of Government in the Northern States, with the privilege of universal suffrage in the hands of the laborer? Will he submit to the fate of the European laborer, and exhaust life in a few years, or starve, when abundance and wealth are all around him, and the power of reaching them, by the Government, is within his grasp? It is clear, that no people on earth, where competition in labor is great, can now sustain our systems of Government. Can they be sustained at all under such circumstances?

There is but one state of society in the world, where labor and capital are identical in interest; and that is where domestic slavery exists; and under this form of society alone, have Republics hitherto ever been maintained. Labor, there, is capital, and capital is labor; because capital is invested in labor. The great principle of capital—gain, will there compel it not to destroy, but to regard, protect, and preserve labor. Unless capital forgets its instinct, overworking, starvation, and cold, and worse than all these, the heart-sickening fears of their horrors, which often make life one long agony, cannot be the fate of the laborer. An enlightened self-interest will even dictate, that all the virtues which lead to happiness and contentment, should be cultivated. In such a form of society, there is no collision between capital and labor, and a free Government may exist so long as the intelligence and virtue of the most enlightened and cultivated portion of the population will permit.

I trust now, Mr. Chairman, that I have shown to this committee, that capital and labor are not always identical in interests; but, on the contrary, in all the advanced stages of society, where domestic slavery does not exist, that there is a continual contest between them. Amongst the various means resorted to by capital, to increase its profits without regard to the interests of labor, Government has been the most common and effectual. In every country in the world, capital has seized on the legislation of the country, and perverted it to its aggrandizement. Look to the statute books of all civilized nations, and mark the monopolies and privileges, under the pretext of the general good, conferred on its employment, in almost every department of production. Instead of labor and capital being left free to compete with each other, (a competition unequal under any circumstances,) and to seek those occupations which are most lucrative in the situation in which they are placed by nature, legislation has been used to force capital into unnatural channels, and thus deprive labor of its natural and more profitable employment. What are all the laws for "protecting" industry, as they are called, but schemes for oppressing it, by which the profits of capital in certain departments of production, are increased at the expense of the many? The importance of capital as an ally in Government, was early perceived by those who have ever been in favor of a strong consolidated Government in the United States. Hence in the commencement of this Government, the funding system and the old Bank, and latterly the tariff policy. These were all efforts on the part of capital, aided by those who desire its support for political purposes, to use the Government for its emolument. And so, sir, now, with the bank rage in the country. What is it but a struggle on the part of capital, in association with their old allies, to appropriate the Government, and use it for its benefit? The capitalists require that this Government shall be connected with them, either through the State banks, or by the establishment of a United States Bank; and although the immediate interests of the capital which may be invested in these two projects, may be opposed to each other, they join together in establishing their supremacy over the Constitution and Government of the country.

Of all the devices invented for giving capital the ascendancy over labor, the banking system, as generally existing, is the most subtle and complete. The interests of labor require a certain, steady, and limited currency. Fluctuations in the currency, by which the rewards of labor become gambling and speculative, are ruinous to sober industry. Let the proportion of means to their ends be certain, and labor then adapts its efforts and expenditures to its object, and honest industry is certain of its reward. The currency, to effect this end, should be limited—rather below than above the wants of the community. It is a common delusion to suppose that the wealth of a country is increased by enlarging its currency. Suppose a thousand dollars, used to interchange the productive labor of a community, and suddenly, without any increase in the production, a thousand dollars more, in the shape of bank notes, is added to the circulation: what will be the effect? Why, in the first place, the issuer of the bank notes will certainly have it in his power to appropriate to himself a large portion of the productions of the community; but not a dollar will be added to its wealth. Every thing will be immediately doubled in price, and two dollars will be used where one was used before, to interchange the same productions of labor. Nomi nally, every one will be richer, because every thing will be doubled in price; but, in reality, the relative price of things will be exactly the same to each other, and the wealth of the community the same, excepting, indeed, that portion of it abstracted by the note issuer to himself, for which the community have his printed paper. Labor clearly gains nothing by such an enlargement of the circulation. On the contrary, independently of the injury it will sustain in other respects, its direct loss will be immense, if its industry is to compete with the industry of other communities at home and abroad. By the inflation of the currency, all the productions of industry will be run up to a high price; and, of course, to be reimbursed, the producer must sell at a high price. The effect is inevitable in competing with the foreign producer, whose currency abroad is not so inflated—the home producer must be undersold at home and abroad, and be ruined. Tariff laws for protection may thus be rendered vain through the mere operation of the currency, and the legislation of the country be defeated by the banks. In this view not only labor, but capital in all other pursuits, is sacrificed to that vested in banks. Fortunately for us, free of debt and at peace with the whole world, the United States have the ability which few nations possess of reducing their currency to a safe and limited standard. England, our great rival, dare not do it. From the late contractions in the currency by the Bank of England, the revenue of the Government has fallen off upwards of two millions of pounds. Increased taxation is, therefore, the necessary result of any permanent contraction in her currency, which her over-burdened people cannot bear. Not only the interests of labor, but of capital also, require in the United States a limited and stable currency.

The gentleman from Mississippi, in the course of his argument on this point, observed that labor could not point to the Constitution, and charge it with partiality or hostility to its interests. I agree with the gentleman in this opinion; but it is because I can see in its provisions no authority for the policy he proposes. There is not a word in that instrument which justifies the connection of the Government with the capital of the country. When the preposition was made in the convention which framed the Constitution to give to this Government the power of chartering corporations, it was denied. And why? Because by corporations peculiar privileges are conferred on capital, and it was not designed to connect the Government with the capital of the country, but to leave labor and capital without any partial aid from the action of this Government, free to compete with each other, under the supervision of the States. But if the plain history and language of the Constitution is to be perverted by construction, and this Government is to be connected with the capital of the country, and its legislation used to increase its profits or enhance its power in the shape of needless debt—tariffs for protection and banks—the impartiality of the Constitution is gone. Labor can point to the Constitution and denounce it for its hostility and injustice. The contest between labor and capital is already sufficiently unequal, without the aid of Government, designed for the common benefit of all, being used to increase it. Labor cannot be interested in building up here a despotism, which this unholy alliance will tend to produce. Labor cannot be interested in bank expansions and contractions, by which the relation between creditor and debtor is continually changed, and property is unsettled. Labor cannot be benefitted by an inflated currency, by which its productions are rendered too dear for competition with the labor of foreign nations. By keeping clear of any connection with the banks, these evils, through the operation of this Government, will at least not be aggravated, whilst they may be greatly lessened. Above all, it is the interest of the people, that this Government should be independent in discharging its function. And how can it be indedendent, so long as its revenues are controlled by the banks and capitalists of the country? How can it be independent at all, if connected with the banking system at all, as it now exists in the world? The banking system of America has no power within itself, whilst it is liable to be controlled by the banks of foreign nations. By the mighty element of steam, New York is now about to be brought as near London, as Charleston used to be to New York; and every movement in the banking system of England will immediately act on this country. We are the weaker party, and therefore most easily affected. A few gentlemen sitting in the parlor of the Bank of England, can, at any moment, send a panic throughout the commercial world, and prostrate the banks of America. If the Government is connected with the banks, such an operation may be a part of the operations of war, in case of collision between the two countries, by which the Government may be deprived of its resources. But without any design, the same results may be produced, from the inherent weakness of the whole banking system. Fluctuations in the currency—contractions and expansions, entirely beyond the power of the Bank of England to control, it is admitted, is its fate. Sir, in my opinion, duty and patriotism, the interests of the Government and the interests of the people, all require that this Government should be separated from the capital and banking institutions of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the effect of this bill on the commerce of the Union has been elaborately considered during the debate. My colleague [Mr. PICKENS] has argued, as I understood him, rather from the disabilities the bill will remove, than from any positive benefit it will confer; that it would be beneficial to the independence of Southern commerce from Northern control. For uttering this opinion, the gentleman from Mississippi has taken him to task. He says, that the tendency of the bill, in consequence of this effect, is to dissolve the Union; although he labored hard to prove that no such benefit to the South would be its result. If his argument is good, why declaim about the Union? The argument against my colleague is, that if the South conducts her own commerce, her dependency and intercourse will not be as great with the Northern States as when the North controls and directs it for her; and therefore, any effort to weaken this dependency or interrupt the intercourse, is a plot against the Union. Sir, if any Representative from the Northern States had made such an objection to the bill, I should have deemed it illiberal, although it would not have surprised me. But that a Southern man, in the peculiar situation in which the South is placed, should rise in his seat, and upon such reasons, denounce the independence of Southern commerce, and those who advocate it, is to me matter of most profound amazement. Why, is it come to this, that we dare not maintain that it is expedient that we should use those natural advantages which Providence has given us; that we should export our own productions, and import our own consumption, but we are to be told that we are seeking a dissolution of the Union? What is this but declaring that the legitimate object and effect of the Union is to render the South dependent on the North, and, to advocate her independence, is to advocate disunion? What is this but boldly saying that we are properly colonies under the legislation of this Government, and that dependency is our natural situation? The North carries on her own commerce, exports her own productions, and imports all her consumption; there is no disunion in that. The thunders of eloquence sleep under an enormity so atrocious. But if the South presumes to do the same thing, it is a plot against the Union. Sir, let me tell the gentleman from Mississippi, that if he desires to bring the Union into discredit and contempt amongst the proud freemen of the South, with whom the lofty characteristic of independence is more prevalent than among any people upon earth, let him carry to them such denunciations loud and deep. Let them understand from his lips that dependency and vassalage is their proper situation in this Confederacy, and if they dare struggle to carry on their own commerce they counteract the spirit and design of the Union. Sir, I am as willing as the gentleman from Mississippi can be, that the North should keep and enjoy all the advantages the Constitution and the Union bestow, for conducting the commerce of the South. They are immense under the most impartial administration of this Government. Let her have them. I want no tariff, no impediments in trade to bar out their enterprise in reaching the commerce of the South. The laws of capital and trade, with the free intercourse between the sections guarantied by the Constitution, is their best security for managing and engrossing the commerce of the Union. Let them have it, and keep it, if they can, by these laws, in their free, untrammelled operation. But I will not consent that this Government shall be used, by its fiscal operations or by its connection with the banks, or by the fraudulent machinery of a United States Bank, to give to one section of the Confederacy commercial advantages over the rest of the Union. All we expect this bill to accomplish is to leave each section free to its natural advantages, and free to the competition of the capital and enterprise all over the Union. We want no favors from this Government. We require only that it shall not be used against us; and, if left to our own resources, we are not without hope that we may be able to retain some portion of our own commerce. And is there any thing unreasonable or extravagant in such expectations? Yes, says the gentleman from Mississippi. To keep any of your commerce is most unreasonable. A direct trade between Europe and the South is most unnatural. All direct trade is unnatural. Natural trade is always circuitous. Look to Holland, England, &c. conducting the commerce of the whole world. Sir, when the gentleman argues from the past state of commerce to its nature, he commits the old error of looking to facts without regard to principles. The fact is undoubtedly as he states, that the commerce of the world has generally been circuitous; but is that the result of the nature of things, or the artificial effect of Government intervention in the affairs of commerce? Where is commerce free in the world, that it might flow, like the beneficent rains of heaven, in its natural channels? Is it here, where freedom in all its attribute is our proud, but empty, boast? Why, by the mere trick of paper money and the fiscal operations of this Government, in four years after the Union was formed, the foreign commerce of Virginia (exceeding, before the Revolution, that of New York and the whole of New England together) was taken from her and transferred to these more favored regions. Look at your enormous tonnage duties, your tariff, your whole banking system, by which every spring of commerce can be controlled and perverted from its natural operation. What is the whole history of commerce but a history of restraints, and burdens, and follies, by which trade has been forced into circuitous and more expensive channels? Yet the gentleman, looking to these effects, and not to their causes, maintains that it is natural for commerce to be circuitous, and unnatural for it to be direct. By the same process of reasoning, from abuses, he may argue liberty itself out of the world. Tyranny and oppression has been, and is now, the usual order of things. Freedom is the exception, and ought, therefore, to be unnatural, and be denounced by all good patriots. I go, sir, for freedom in commerce, as in Government.

My colleague, alluding to the struggle now going on between the banks and the Government, ventured to use some expressions of warning; they might be crushed in the contest, if they should fail in subduing the Government. Immediately the gentleman from Mississippi construes it into a threat from another source of danger and alarm to the South; and the old note is again sounded. It "is almost treason on this floor!" He "sees ill-omened birds upon the wind, and they croak disunion!" Sir, why is it that the gentleman, on this great subject of agitation, turns his face to the South? Are his constituents, or mine, the agressors, and seeking to dissolve the Union? Let the insults that he and I daily receive upon this floor answer. Why does he not turn his face to the North, from whence the aggression comes, and mark upon the horizon the black cloud of harpies, who are winging hither their heavy flight, and whetting their beaks for their feast of blood? Some have already entered your doors and defiled your table, and polluted the seats on which they sit. Are they the gentleman's allies, that he can see no deformity in their hideous lineaments? Do they not "croak disunion?"

[Mr. PRENTISS said that he intended his observations for all who in any way jeopardized the Union; and that he would be as staunch as any one in resisting the designs of the Abolitionists.]

Sir, I doubt not the gentleman's professions; but why talk about disunion at all to the South, standing entirely on the defensive, requiring only to be let alone? Upon whom does she aggress? What interests, or what section, has she assailed, through the instrumentality of this Government, from the first dawn of the Confederacy to the present hour? Is he prepared to submit for ever to the degrading position we occupy in this hall? And when we shall resist, will it be from the lips of southern men that we are to hear the imputation of faithlessness to the Union? Yes, sir, from southern men, now as heretofore, on this subject, as on all others, the frenzy of party will pour forth its loudest denunciations. Do we resist the tariff system, by which the South is made tributary to the industry of other sections of the Union, the wrong is not in the aggressor, but in those who resist aggression. They are the disunionists. Do we object to an alliance between the Government and the capital of the country, by which the Government is to be fearfully strengthened, and the whole commerce of the country can be controlled—we are the disunionists. Do we say that we cannot, that we dare not, submit to the hostile aggressions daily practised here, and systematically carried on all over the Union, against our domestic institutions—still we are the "disunionists," and it "is almost treason on this floor." For myself, I will tell the gentleman that hard names have but few terrors for me. My hair will not stand on end at the appellation of 'disunionist" or "traitor." I was born, sir, of disunionists and traitors. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] represented me as referring, on a former occasion, to my ancestors. Not so, Mr. Chairman. I shall never call up the virtues of the dead, to shroud my weaknesses. I spoke of our ancestors: the ancestors of the American people, who achieved the Revolution of '76; an ancestry more glorious than the longest line of titled fools or crowned oppressors can ever give. It reminds us of all those noble virtues and principles which dignify and adorn our nature, and bid us emulate and practise them; courage and constancy and truth, struggling in that conflict, which must be eternal, for liberty and justice against tyranny and wrong. But, sir, if I had referred to my ancestors, as inferior as they may have been to those of the gentleman from New York in their public services, they have left me nothing for which I need be ashamed or dread a sneer. Through three revolutions they have dared to be "rebels" and "traitors" in defence of the rights of the people against armed oppression. They were in that struggle which ended in bringing the first Charles to the block. They were foremost in the revolution of 1720, by which the province of Carolina was rescued from the capricious and petit tyrannies of the Lords Proprietors; and in the revolution of '76, they were again true to their lineage, and to those great principles of liberty for which they have ever braved all the terrors of the gibbet and the sword. Why, sir, every vein in my body swells with the proud blood of denounced and persecuted "rebels" and "traitors." But, thank God! they have ever been so, in the maintenance of the undying and holy cause of truth and justice and liberty? Will the gentleman now expect me to tremble at his epithets? Let him carry them to the ears of crouching subjects and slaves. They will hardly frighten freemen.

The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KENNEDY,] taking up the same strain about disunion, proclaims, with becoming pathos, that that man will be the most miserable on earth, who shall rise of a morning and find himself a citizen of the Republic of South Carolina!! Really, sir, I am afraid that I have not been as melancholy as I ought to be, under this terrible enunciation of sublimated Federalism. I hardly think that the gentleman himself has realized, in all its horrors, his own situation under its formidable truth. I fear that he is very like that man who had been talking prose all his life without knowing it. Mayland might be a Republic; and, if so, then the gentleman's tragedy of wo has begun, and we may look out for a denouement worthy of such a catastrophe. The gentleman, I understand, has served his native State in several official stations; and, turning to the constitution of Maryland, I find that he must repeatedly have taken the following oath. "I, A B, do swear, that I do not hold myself bound in allegiance to the King of Great Britain, and that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to the State of Maryland." Now, sir, here is a declaration of allegiance to this State; and we all know that allegiance is the duty of a citizen or subject to a sovereign. If this State is his sovereign, she must be, according to the old division, I suppose, a monarchy, an aristocracy, or a republic. I have heard of no King reigning there, and if the gentleman has not been a citizen of a Republic all his life without knowing it, then Maryland is an aristocracy; and as he is one of the exalted ones, and manifests such a decided horror of a Republic, I suppose he must be an aristocrat of the first diamond water. For my part, sir, although at first somewhat stunned by the miserable consequence of my situation, which the gentleman has foretold, I have gathered up courage enough to face my fate, and must stand confessed a humble, although, I trust, a devoted citizen of the Republic of South Carolina. Thus it is, sir, that the doctrines of consolidation sweep on. Men now begin to speak out in plain language what their doctrines long since declared—that the States, bearing the same relation to the Federal head which districts or counties do to the States, have ceased to exist as independent, sovereign, political bodies. They are no longer Republics—no longer States—but mere corporations, belonging to one great consolidated despotism.

Anticipating, with certainty, the triumph of the Whig party to which he belongs, the gentleman from Mississippi announces, as their first great measure of policy, when mounted to power, that the supplies to the Government will be stopped. The committee will recollect, that when the Treasury note bill was under consideration, intimations of the same course were thrown out in debate. I then ventured to warn gentlemen of the consequences of such a measure; and, sir, in spite of denunciations or aspersions here or elsewhere, I will again repeat the warning. I tell gentlemen, that such a course will inevitably lead to revolution, with all its lawlessness and dangers. In England, if the supplies are stopped, the crown can change the ministry, and the Government again moves on. But who is to expel the President of the United States and his cabinet out of their offices? And in what way can stopping the supplies effect this end? The only effect of stopping the supplies, will be, that your army and navy, your civil, diplomatic, and military officers will be unpaid, and, therefore, must cease their services; and thus the whole machinery of this Government will be suspended, and anarchy and revolution will have begun. We are thus fairly notified that the first step by which the ascendancy of the great Whig or Federal party is to be signalized, will be to begin a revolution. Where it is to end, or what will be our situation during its continuance, the gentleman has not ventured to prophesy; for even his adventurous spirit cannot penetrate its thick gloom. Impassioned lovers of the laws, they will uphold their supremacy by placing them aside. Sole supporters and admirers of the Union, they will perpetuate it forever, by dissolving it. Devout haters of popular violence and anarchy, they will suppress them entirely, by the wholesome process of revolution:—and because I dared arraign a policy so desperate and dangerous, and warn gentlemen of the consequences which may ensue, not only to the country generally, but to the banks and capitalists who are hastening on their hostility to the Government of the country, to such fearful extremities—I was charged, with all due solemnity charged, with producing the very result I deprecated, and inciting the people to lawlessness and outrage. The gentleman from New York, whom I do not see in his place, [Mr. HOFFMAN,] even seemed to intimate that such was my design; but he has personally disclaimed to me intending any such imputation: and if there be another gentleman on this floor, who, in spite of my disclaimers at the time, and of my course in advocating the supplies on that occasion, has thought proper to make any such imputations on my motives—all I will say, sir, is, that I cannot follow his example. It requires neither genius, nor patriotism, nor honor, to make such imputations, and I cannot imitate him. There is not an oyster-cellar or pot-house in the blind alleys of our cities, but can afford the gentleman examples fully worthy of his elevated course. It requires only a very little respect for others, and still less for ourslves, to go down in aspersions—"facilis descensus averni," just as low as our tastes permit. Forget that we are men, and although erring often, still possessed of a noble nature, which it should be our pride, as it is our duty to maintain, in its most elevated state. Forget, that as we would regard our own honor, we should be tender with the sensibilities of others; and that when we deal in imputations on the motives of our associates, we lay bare our own to doubt and suspicion. Forget, that we represent fifty thousand, and stand in the gaze of fifteen millions of freemen; and are bound, in the transaction of their business, to observe all those rules of forbearance and charity, which are so essential to the peace, happiness, and liberty of a christian and enlightened people. Sir, we may forget all these things; but what, then, will become of the dignity of this House, and the reputation of its members? We cannot act here, even towards each other, for ourselves alone. Standing on the elevated stage we occupy, every example, for good or for evil, passes down throughout all the avenues of society, and affects, with a fearful responsibility, the public morals and public liberty. Gentlemen, in such a situation, may deal, if they please, in needless imputations, and fierce aspersions on the motives of others, and gather all the dazzling honors they are so well calculated to confer; but my sense of duty forbids me to touch or approach them.

Overlooking the revolutionary tendency of the measures they threaten, and arguing from the supposed insurrectionary tendency of my remonstrances against them, gentlemen have passed over me to the State I represent, and have descanted freely on the lawlessness of South Carolina, in defying all law, and jeopardizing the Union itself. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that gentlemen allude to the late contest of that State with the General Government, with respect to the tariff laws. Sir, that struggle has gone down to history; and we are content to leave it there, satisfied that gentlemen will in vain endeavor to affix their running commentaries to its impartial record. We seek not to bring up past subjects of discord; but when our native State is needlessly assailed, and charged with lawlessness, and the glove, in discussing her conduct and character, is cast down on this floor, in her name we will take it up. In what respect was South Carolina, on that occasion, lawless in her course?

Were your tariff laws, for the encouragement of domestic manufactures, constitutional or not? The whole question of lawlessness hangs upon that issue. If these laws were unconstitutional, they were no laws at all. They were mere arbitrary enactments, carrying no obligation to obey them, and, of course, there could be no lawlessness in resisting them. The lawlessness would rather be in those who attempted to enforce, not in those who resisted, such illegal enactments. Now, whether we were right or wrong in our opinion of the unconstitutionality of your tariff enactments, we certainly had very high authority in our support, being no less than that of our opponents themselves. It was from the people of Massachusetts—from Mr. Webster, the sense and conscience-keeper of this disinterested and affectionate people—that we were taught, from the cradle of liberty itself, that your tariff laws for the encouragement of domestic manufactures were unconstitutional. Mr. Webster, as the chairman of the committee, reported, in Faneuil Hall, the resolutions in which this proposition was first announced; and they were adopted by the people of Boston. Yet, sir, but a few years afterwards, when we ventured to believe and practice their teachings, these men—these statesmen, whose enlarged patriotism regards only the good of all, these brethren, whose sympathies enclose the whole Union in their fraternal embraces, were prepared to dip their hands in our blood—if possible, to strangle truth by guilt. We were told to go for relief to the courts of the United States to test the constitutionality of these laws; but with the meanness of conscious oppressors, a falsehood was retained on the face of the bill, by which we were excluded from them. The bill purported to be passed for revenue; and when Colonel Drayton, a Representative from South Carolina, moved that its true title should be given to it, in order that its constitutionality should be tried, you refused to do it. Nevertheless, to exhaust the remedy you proposed to us, we did go to the courts of the United States, and knocked at its doors for admittance to try our rights; but they were shut in our faces by the fraud of your legislation. We determined to resist your lawlessness—your unconstitutional oppsession—not for any local, selfish interest, but for a cause as broad as the Union itself; not in a time of war and trouble—for then, as heretofore, our State motto would have blazoned on the shield of the Union, "animis opibus que parati;" not in a time of debt and pecuniary embarrassment—for your national debt was nearly paid, and your Treasury was overflowing; not in an era of Executive imbecility—but when the Executive authority threatened to absorb all others, and the most popular man and efficient soldier, since the days of Washington, held the baton of Executive command. The State interposed for the protection of her citizens, against the lawless aggressions of this Government; in that form, and by that authority, which had been practised before, and maintained to be constitutional, from the commencement of the Union. Was South Carolina "lawless" in her resistance? If she was, I tell gentlemen, it is just such "lawlessness" as they may expect to encounter, so long as this Government presides over the destinies of a free and enlightened people. Oppression submitted to, soon becomes habit; and the spirt of liberty expires beneath its influence. According to our conscientious convictions, justice and honor, the cause of the Constitution and of the Union itself, required us to resist. Shallow bigotry may rail and denounce, but it will neither convince nor intimidate. You gave way. You proposed a compromise, far more advantageous than that proposed for your acceptance in the Senate, by a Carolina Senator,* but two years before. And why, sir, did you yield? Was it because the resistance of the State was so very contemptible as to be likened to a company of boys with cornstalks, marching against fifty thousand grenadiers six feet high? If the resistance of the State was so very insignificant, it is impossible to account for the compromise bill of 1833, upon any principles worthy gentlemen and statesmen. Causeless cowardice, or a deliberate betrayal of the tariff interests by its friends, must have produced it. It is only upon the supposition, that the resistance of the State was formidable; that the peace of the country, the existence of the Union, and the tariff policy itself was endangered, that we can find any of those elevated motives, which, I doubt not, actuated those who originated and passed this bill. Sir, the "lawlessness" of South Carolina will not have been in vain, if it has brought to light that great truth, which lies at the foundation of our Union—that this is a Government of opinion, and not of force, and ought therefore to be so administered, as to conciliate the affections of all, by superintending the general interests of all, without infringing upon the sectional interests of any portion of the confederacy. By such a course alone, can the Union be preserved, or be worth preserving.

*General Hayne proposed that the tariff bill should be reduced in ten years to twenty-five per cent. The compromise bill reduces it to twenty per cent. in

SPEECH OF MR. WHITE,
OF TENNESSEE.

In Senate of the United States, March 24, 1838—Upon the bill reported from the Committee on Finance, commonly called the Sub-Treasury bill:

The motion of Mr. CUTHBERT, to strike out the 23d section, being under consideration,—

Mr. WHITE rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I address you under circumstances of peculiar disadvantage. The subject is one of the greatest importance. It has been long discussed, ably discussed, by those of most distinguished talents. Their highest efforts have been made on both sides to present its advantages and disadvantages in every view the human mind can take of it.

The crowded audience has become wearied, and even many Senators themselves can hardly give respectful attention to our most interesting debates.

Up to the termination of the last address of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts who sits nearest to me, (Mr. WEBSTER,) I was not satisfied whether it would be my duty to do more than listen respectfully to others, and then say yea or nay to the different questions presented to the Senate.

At the close of his animated, able, and interesting speech, he recurred to a scrap of the history of my own State, fifty years ago. Instantly my mind settled down in the conviction that my constituents had a right to expect more of a son of one of the actors in that scene than a bare vote.

I premise those who may favor me with their attention, that if what I say should not be interesting, it shall not be tedious.

The advocates of this bill expect to accomplish two objects by its passage:

1st. To designate the only species of funds which shall be received in payment of any dues to the Government.

2d. To designate the persons by whom, and the places where, those moneys shall be kept, between the time of their collection and disbursement.

The provisions, as to the first, are, that after the lapse of six years nothing shall be received but gold and silver, and such paper as shall be issued by or under the authority of the Federal Government; and, in the mean time, that certain proportions may be received in the notes of specie-paying banks.

1st. My first objection to this plan is, that it sets out with a distinction in favor of those who are in the employment of the Federal Government, or have any money to receive from it, and those who are in the employ of the State Governments, as well as the mass of the people. The distinction is odious, and ought not to be sanctioned.

Senators who support this bill say these are mere catchwords, (one kind of money for the Government and another for the People,) of which all here have become ashamed, and that latterly they have been driven out of the Senate.

To this I reply, the gentlemen are mistaken; this distinction is made on the very face of the bill, in terms too plain to be misunderstood.

If all the money mentioned is of equal value, why mention gold and silver, Treasury notes, notes of specie-paying banks, &c.? The whole argument in favor of the bill rests on the supposition that gold and silver are the best, and that, as far as it goes, is to be used for Federal officers and those who have Federal contracts, leaving to others to get what they can, and how they can.

2d. The bill itself contemplates a paper medium, emanating from the Federal Government. To this I object: Because we have no power to issue it. As a currency, they are bills of credit, unconstitutional; more clearly so than to incorporate a bank. Because, if we can issue such a medium, we ought never to do it. It will lead to the most wasteful and extravagant expenditures. It will be used moderately at first, until the people become reconciled to it, and then gradually extended in place of borrowing money, so as to meet all the calls of an extravagant Administration, and must end in a large national debt, or depreciate like your continental money.

Many, with great reason, have believed that no Government can long be economical upon even a system of indirect taxation; that under such a system the people generally are not conscious of the burdens they bear. They pay their taxes when they buy their clothes, or other articles, on which duties are imposed, without reflecting that any part of the money they thus expend comes into the Treasury; they therefore cease to be watchful over the manner in which the public moneys are expended; and, whenever they cease to keep strict watch, their agents commence useless and wasteful expenditures. But when the taxes are direct, every man knows how much he pays and when he pays, and will carefully watch how the moneys are expended; and if the expenditures are wasteful or extravagant, a suitable corrective will be immediately applied. Our whole system of Federal taxation is in the general indirect; and if we once commence a system of supplying deficiencies in the Treasury by an issue of paper to be used as currency, the country may be ruined.

At the special session we were obliged to add ten millions of dollars to our means. This we did not do by a direct loan, which every man could understand, but by authorizing an issue of Treasury notes. When that bill was before the Senate, the Senator from Missouri, and, if I mistake not, the Senator from Pennsylvania, both friends of the Administration, placed these notes on the ground of making a loan; that they, as they were to bear an interest, not exceeding five per cent., would be disposed of for money, and with the money thus procured our our creditors could be paid; and in this view I voted for the bill. In the House the amount of the notes was reduced one-half, and I soon perceived that the Administration intended to use them not to procure a loan, but as a currency; and when the bill was returned to us, I took the earliest opportunity to record my vote against it. The notes issued under that bill have in fact been used as a currency, and at various rates of interest, some as low as one mill per year.

This year our revenue is again to be deficient. We will need, in addition to our means in the Treasury, ten, fifteen, or twenty millions of dollars; and this addition will be made by new issues. This paper currency seems to cost nothing; and, as our wants increase, the issues will be increased until the paper depreciates; and then, for the first time, the people will seriously look into the manner in which not only their money, but their credit, has been squandered.

The provisions of this bill for Treasury notes, bills, or other securities, issued by the Federal Government, or under its authority, if sanctioned by Congress, will settle a principle which, if carried into practice, must seal the fate of this nation. Office-holders and office-hunters can all be accommodated by the Executive at the public expense, and the people will not be aware of it until too late. In short, it will take off almost the only restraint which yet remains to our extravagant expenditures

This view of the subject has alarmed me. Do we not all see and know that those in office are pressing to have their salaries increased? That those who are not, desire the number of offices increased that they may get in? We are teazed to increase the number of land districts; and if we do, offices are multiplied. When all offices among the whites are filled, then we have among our red brethren, exploring parties, visiting parties, commissioners and agents, by construction, at Executive discretion, and compensated as he pleases.

With the facilities of paper money, to be created for the trouble of making, importunities for offices, jobs, contracts, and increase of salary, will be multiplied, and the President will not have the heart to resist them when artfully pressed by noisy and worthless partisans. I have been forcibly struck with some of the remarks made upon the subject of this Government paper currency. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) thinks it will not depreciate, and if it does, it will not make any difference, as the Government must always receive it at par, and therefore sustain the whole loss.

Mr. President, if the honorable Senator will take a moment to think upon this subject, I am convinced he will perceive the error. No paper currency, not convertible into specie at the will of the holder, ever did or ever will long retain its nominal value.

If a man has a note of any kind, and has confidence that he can get the amount of it in specie at any time he pleases, most generally he would rather have the note than specie, because more convenient; but the moment he doubts, then he wants the specie presently. In the issue of Treasury notes, that moment the amount issued much exceeds the revenue to be paid into the Treasury, and the purchase of public lands, they must and will depreciate, unless provision is made that they shall be paid when presented at the Treasury. When they do depreciate, the whole loss will not fall on the Treasury, but will fall likewise on those through whose hands they have passed. The very case put by the Senator proves it. A Treasury note issues for fifteen dollars. It depreciates until it can be purchased in market for ten. Some person who owes the Treasury fifteen dollars goes and purchases it at ten, and pays his debt of fifteen dollars. Now does not every one perceive that the profit of five dollars, made by the man who paid the note into the Treasury, must have been a loss of the same amount to the man from whom he purchased, or to some other person, through whose hands it has passed? In all such cases, profit and loss are correlative terms, and that which is one man's gain must have been a loss to some other.

As you increase expenditures you increase Executive power, already too great. The President, or those acting under his orders, must necessarily select the recipients, who, it will always be understood, can only be those who conform to his wishes in elections. These objections are independent of the consideration whether this bill will establish a bank or not. It will certainly sanction the issuing a paper medium of circulation. Those who advocate this provision think as I do, that the country must and always will have bank credits, or paper of some kind, to use as a substitute for the precious metals. The business of the country can never be done without it. A support of the State banks is the only shield which can be presented against Federal bills of credit, and a Federal incorporated bank.

I hold both these last unconstitutional, and the first of them infinitely the most dangerous to the liberties of the people. In 1834, I heard of this plan of separating Government from all banks as depositories, and thought well of it. Indeed, I would then have gone for it, if political friends had agreed upon it. Then there was no idea of issuing paper money by Government. Then State banks were paying specie, and their notes would have continued a circulating medium. Then I had confidence in the Administration, and believed that none would ever dare to interfere with the elective franchise, or to refuse to have the Executive patronage limited and curtailed by law. Now all these things are changed. The Administration want paper money, issued by Government, substituted for loans. The State banks are not paying specie, and this bill forbids the receipt of their notes.

The Executive is disposed to hunt down any and every man who wishes to limit his power. He openly interferes in elections, both State and Federal, and uses all his powers to have them carried according to his will! Under these circumstances, in my judgment, I would be a traitor to civil liberty, were I to sanction the idea that we will make Federal paper the circulating medium.

What has become of our bills, five or six in number, to limit Executive patronage, reported in the days of the younger Adams? They sleep the sleep of death. The honorable chairman of the committee who originally reported them, felt it his duty to endeavor to revive them under the Administration of the late President, and received so little countenance from old friends that he ceased his struggle with them.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina, who never thinks any load too heavy, took up one of them, and made one of his powerful efforts, and it passed this body. But how many old friends voted with it? Sir, all had been whistled or ordered off, except the Senator from Missouri and one or two others.

I have been honored with a seat here for the thirteen or fourteen last sessions, and believe I have never once recurred to the journals to see how any gentleman had voted; but there are some things I find it impossible to forget.

When that bill was before the Senate, believing that I could give the Senator from South Carolina something more than my vote, I made a speech in its favor; and that speech sealed my fate with the great Democratic party. I respectfully ask the Senator from Missouri, whether any of the former friends of that measure, the Jackson democrats, voted for it, except he and myself?

It went to the other House, and as they were more fresh from the people than we, better understood what is meant by modern democracy, they put this aristocratic banking to sleep; and we have never heard a cry or even a whimper from it since. Since then, executive power and patronage have put forth their branches in every direction, and no man dare raise his voice against them on pain of political death.

Shall we then put this rich bed of manure to the root of this dangerous power, that the crops of executive influence may be increased in our elections? Nay; God forbid!

I have been zealous for pulling down the Bank of the United States, and for maintaining a sound metallic currency, and, to do this, believe we ought to sustain, as far as we could, State banks; prevailing on them, by all incidental means in our power, to cease the use of small notes, and had hoped we could have succeeded: but specie payments have been suspended, and the advocates of this bill say we must try some other experiment.

Divorce, divorce a vinculo matrimonii, is the watchword wherever you find a modern democrat.

That there is a divorce, a mensa et thoro, existing, I admit, but am of opinion it has been produced by violent temper and want of due care on the part of the Federal head, and too yielding and complying a disposition on the part of the banks, and that the whole might yet be reconciled, at all events to the advantage of the family.

I have heard of cases where a dashing libertine had married a wife, attached to, and every way worthy of him; that he, upon looking farther into the world, concluded if he were freed from his first love, he could be better suited upon a second experiment; and, with a view to obtain a divorce, threw temptations in his wife's way, which she had not stern virtue enough to resist; she sinned, and then he applied for a divorce. And what have courts of conscience said in such cases? Depart hence! you contributed to your wife's transgression, and shall not profit by your own iniquity.

Apply these principles to this case. When the Executive wooed and won the State banks, they were pure and unsullied. Their utmost exertions were necessary to aid in prostrating the Bank of the United States; they were coaxed, almost commanded, to extend their loans. They did so, to imprudent lengths. The Executive saw and knew this. Were they admonished to diminish their discounts? Never! So far as I know, on the contrary, they were eulogized up to July, 1836; then came the Executive denunciations, and they have never since ceased.

The Executive is to blame, so are the banks; but, on account of their quarrel, the great American family ought not to be sacrificed.

If none were to be injured but themselves, I certainly should feel no inclination to interfere; but I do think it nothing but just that both parties should bear their due proportion of blame, and that a separation ought not to be permitted, under circumstances by which an unoffending community must be the sufferers.

But again: I think if it is ever proper to establish this system, and to have this divorce, now is not the proper time.

The banks are State institutions; society have a deep interest in their maintaining a sound currency; this can only be done by resuming specie payments; this they never can do until their credit is re-established; while the whole weight of a popular Administration is against them, they can never resume with a hope of continuing specie payments. You separate now, and why? Because, say the whole Administration and its friends, and if we pass this bill we join in the cry, they are unworthy of credit! Every man who believes this statement, and has a claim against them, would apply for his money, and they would be compelled immediately to stop again.

Take the weight of the Federal Government off them, it is now pressing them into the dust, and while it is upon them, you might as well order a man whose legs had been cut off, to jump to his feet and walk, as to require them to resume, with a hope that they can do so. Let their credit be again restored, and if we must seperate, they could better then, than now, sustain the shock.

The Federal Government obtained the use of them when their credit was good; it should be restored, and then, if ever, they ought to be returned, in equally good credit, to the exclusive use of the States.

Suppose we pass this bill, and then the banks resume, five-sixths of the revenue must be taken in their notes; in a very short time, enough would be received to enable your depositaries to withdraw so much of their specie as to compel them to suspend. And if they do not resume, their paper depreciates, and specie becomes an article of merchandise, and thus the Federal servant will receive better money than the State officers, or the masters of both—the mass of the people.

The State banks never can resume with a hope of doing a profitable business.

Suppose the system in complete operation. Then all the revenue is received in specie; your average surplus in the Treasury will be at least seven or eight millions of dollars. This, if left in the banks, would furnish a specie basis upon which safely to issue three for one. Hence, by this process, you abstract and lock up twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars of the circulating medium, which is of no more use to the Government or individuals than if sunk in the ocean.

Banks go to excess occasionally, and there is temporary suffering; so of every thing else—we have nothing good but what produces evil when carried to excess. Banks issue too much paper, but that is no reason they should all be destroyed. Over-issues produce individual suffering, but even this is productive of some benefits. It makes roads and canals, and improves plantations. Although all these change owners when a curtailment takes place, yet the improvements remain for the benefit of the people at large.

What do gentlemen mean? Do they mean to put us back to the year eleven hundred, when they say banks commenced? Are we to quit our ordinary business, and commence wading branches in search of golden pebbles, to add to the stock of precious metals? Are we to give up the earnings of our families, our porringers, and our spoons, to this Aaron of democracy, that he may melt them, and, with his graving tools, make us our own metallic god to worship? The more free a country is, the more prone are its people to run into excess, and none so much as our own. What was Great Britain before the establishment of her bank? Like other nations who are destitute of every thing but a specie circulation, poor, unthrifty, anti-commercial. And what is she now?

We need a larger circulation than any country upon the earth of the same population, because we are freer than any other. The circulation ought always to bear a due proportion to all saleable or exchangeable commodities. In some of the States every thing is of that description. Entails are destroyed; all property, real and personal, is unfettered and for sale whenever a man thinks he can better himself by selling in an old and purchasing in a new State. In many States so much is land unfettered that it can be sold in fee simple upon a writ of fieri facias.

In our country, a man's capital, in many instances, is his character for integrity, his capacity for business, and his business habits. These give him credit with banks. With the aid of bank accommodations, in many instances, he makes himself wealthy in a few years, and every man who adds to his own stock of wealth enriches the country.

Give me wealthy people and a poor Treasury, and then the country is rich, and its liberty safe.

Destroy banks, and you throw every man again into the hands of capitalists, Jews, money-lenders, where few can borrow who cannot mortgage land to secure payment. Whereas banks always feel it a favor conferred on them when they can get a good customer.

Although I speak thus freely of the utility of banks, they never have been favorites of mine; but we must have them. The country cannot and will not do without them.

We must have a Treasury bank, a bank incorporated by Congress, or State banks. And I prefer the last. They are the least dangerous, and the States have clearly the power to incorporate them. The States, in granting charters, can, if they choose, guard generally against excesses. If they were to direct all profits over six or eight per cent. per annum to go into the Treasury, as a school-fund, the temptation to shave and to make excessive loans would be taken away. And if they would prohibit standing accommodations, few bad debts would be contracted.

2d. The other object of the bill is to compel our collectors and receivers to cease depositing money in banks, and to compel them to deposite all moneys in the hands of officers appointed by the President, and removable at his pleasure, there to be kept till needed for disbursement. I think this arrangement much worse than to deposite in the banks:

1st. Because the directors and officers of the banks will be more likely to be faithful than officers appointed by us. The stockholders will always intend to select those who will be most likely not to waste their moneys. Our officers for some time have been, and I consider the system is to be continued, selected more with a view to influence in elections than to any qualifications for the particular offices they are to fill. Let me not be misunderstood. I do not mean to say that every officeholder is a mere party tool. I think there are many who are not. But I do mean to state it as my opinion, that now and for some time past, the principal qualification looked for is political influence; and such men, appointed from such motives, I think will generally be unsafe depositaries. Supposing these officers equally faithful, they will not generally have places as safe as those provided by banks.

Again: This plan will occasion a great increase of expense; new officers, clerks, visiters, houses, safes, vaults, &c. There will be no effectual check either upon those officers or upon disbursing officers. It is said there have been, in modern times, but few losses by defalcations of disbursing officers.

One principal if not the sole reason of this is the check upon them, by ordering them, whenever their position will enable them to do so, to keep their moneys in banks, and every week or month an account is furnished the Secretary of the Treasury, by the deposite bank, showing the sums deposited and by whom. This furnishes strong reasons against using or loaning money; immediate detection would be the consequence.

Under the proposed system this check is entirely removed, and the public money will, in many cases, be misused.

I now have in my drawer a document showing what has been done in one case by an officer in whose integrity I once had unlimited confidence. He collected a large claim from one debtor to the Government, and immediately loaned the amount received to some political friends, not only without authority, but contrary to his instructions, and, at this moment, two suits are pending against these new debtors, who have refused to pay their notes as they fell due. If I mistake not, one of the parties to this very transaction has been appointed to, and now holds an office which will make him a sub-Treasurer if this bill should pass.

A bank in my own State has been alluded to in a letter read by the Senator from Missouri, which he has received from the late Chief Magistrate.

A brief review of the history of that bank, and matters connected with it, may be of use to us on the subject under consideration.

The act establishing that bank was passed at a called session, in the year 1820. The charter of the United States Bank was passed in 1816, and the bank went into actual operation the 1st of January, 1817.

It was an Administration measure; and when the bill was before Congress, the Representative from my district sent me a copy of it, with a request that I would give him my opinion of its provisions, which I did, in a pretty lengthy letter. That opinion was very decidedly against the bill, and the opinion I then formed and expressed I have ever since entertained, and still entertain. He, alone, from Tennessee, as I believe, voted against the bill. For this vote he was attacked at home, and I felt in duty bound to maintain him as well as I could. This brought me in direct conflict with the friends of the United States Bank as early as 1816.

Soon after the bank went into operation, it established branches in Kentucky, and, before the fall of 1817, many of the loans first made had fallen due, and payment was exacted. To this the people had not been accustomed; and, as is always the case, although the bank had been popular when making loans, it soon became very unpopular when trying to collect its debts.

Stories of the ruinous operations of the bank in Kentucky soon reached us in Tennessee, and, in the autumn of 1817, with a view to save Tennessee from the like oppression, her Legislature passed an act, as I believe, unanimously, imposing a very heavy tax, say sixty thousand dollars, upon any persons attempting to bank in Tennessee without authority from the State.

A few years since, while the controversy was going on with the Bank of the United States, the Senate created a committee, of which Mr. Tyler, of Virginia, was a member, to examine into its proceedings, and when they made their report, for the first time, I found a letter dated in 1818, now bound up in our documents, soliciting the President of the bank to establish a branch in Nashville, notwithstanding the act of Assembly, informing him that the act was passed by contracted, illiberal men, and, after furnishing a list of names for directors, assuring him that if a branch was established, and directors appointed from the list, he would see that a good account should be given of those who would attempt to enforce the State law.

Mr. Jones, the then president, answered this letter, and, very properly, refused to send a branch into the State, contrary to the expressed will of the Legislature.

Thus the matter rested until 1820, when this same gentleman was a leading member of the Tennessee Legislature; and, not having been able to get a Branch Bank of the United States, he and others determined they would have a paper bank, founded on State funds and the faith of the State. They passed an act creating a bank. There was then in the State a bank in which the State had twenty thousand dollars of the stock. It was called the Bank of the State of Tennessee, and had been so conducted as to give society confidence in it; and, in baptizing this new bank, its authors gave it exactly the same name, and thus we had, at the same time, two banks having the same name, in the same State. The friends of the old would not have hesitated in charging the leaders who established the new with pilfering their name, that they might derive benefit from their credit, had they been other than members of the Assembly.

The plan of this new bank was not to pay specie, and to please the people; it was said it was a bank to relieve the people from pecuniary distress.

At the same session, and to force into circulation paper money not redeemable in specie, laws were passed to prevent levies of execution, unless plaintiffs would agree to receive irredeemable bank paper.

These proceedings met with very decided opposition from the supporters of a sound currency.

They denounced a depreciated paper currency as a curse to the country, and the old State bank would not touch the paper of the new; and, after a long controversy between the directors, under the administration of an enlightened and worthy directory of the new State bank, it was so conducted as to be converted into a specie-paying bank, and I believe it has faithfully redeemed whatever notes it put in circulation.

But, then, what became of the capital and profits? Much of them were wasted. There was a branch or agency in each county. The cashier of the principal bank, a highly worthy, intelligent, and generous man, could not resist the temptation; he permitted importunate and needy friends to draw checks, which he paid when they had no funds in bank. This practice was detected and exposed, and he ruined.

Some of the agents, men of as much integrity as those to be found now, either used, or permitted others to use, the moneys intrusted to their care. Those moneys were in some instances lost, the agents ruined, and the State has been for several years endeavoring to save something from the wreck.

With these examples before me, I cannot, I will not, I dare not, give my sanction to a scheme so demeralizing, and fraught with so many mischiefs.

But, sir, our history stops not here. I think, about the year 1826, a Nashville bank failed, and occasioned much excitement. The Legislature, then in session, repealed our act of 1817, imposing the tax of which I have spoken; a branch of the United States Bank was applied for, and established. It went down with the principal and the other branches, and from that time, until July, 1836, we were State bank men, generally; these banks having a safe specie basis, and always paying specie. During the whole of these arduous conflicts, others have had an advantage over me.

They first wanted a United States Bank, that we might have good currency every where. Next they wanted paper money, and creditors forced to receive it, or to get nothing; then United States Bank notes again; and now, when the monster is slain, and we can all venture to measure the length and breadth of its supposed deformities, nothing will do them but the pure, unadulterated hard money.

Mr. President, these politicians ever have the advantage of me. I never can give up an old opinion, until I am sure I have found better reasons for a new one. They have the full benefit of what is called the march of mind. They march and countermarch so that I cannot keep pace with them. I turn slowly, awkwardly, and these politicians give me the dodge, and are sometimes out of sight before I know they intend to change. But this is of no consequence to me. Such wills-with-the-wisp or jacks-with-the lantern I would not follow, if I could see them. They would only pilot me into some quagmire or swamp, and then leave me, although their dexterity could easily extricate themselves.

For myself, I now am, and ever have been, a hard money man, to every reasonable and constitutional extent. Nothing is, with me, money, within the meaning of the constitution, but the precious metals, and they either coined, and their value fixed by acts of Congress, or foreign coin, whose value is declared in the same way. No Government, either State or Federal, can make any thing else a tender in payment of debts. This kind of money, and this only, is the end of the law, where pecuniary compensation is to be made. It is not only the standard by which the value of other property is to be fixed, but it is itself property, which can be applied to other useful purposes. The Federal Government has no power to incorporate individuals, and bestow upon them banking powers and privileges, to be exercised within the States.

The Federal Government cannot issue, or authorize to be issued, paper to be used as a currency.

The Constitution takes from the States the power to issue bills of credit.

It does not confer upon Congress any such power, and it can exercise no power except that which is expressly given, or is necessary and proper to give effect to some power expressly granted. The framers of the Constitution having taken from the States the power to issue bills of credit, and having refused or omitted to confer such a power on Congress, believed they had secured the country against the issue of a paper currency, by either Government, which individuals could have no means by suit to compel the payment of, and which, if tolerated, would be sure to depreciate.

Before the Constitution of the United States was framed, the States had the power to incorporate individuals, and give them banking powers and privileges; this power was never taken from them, and, therefore, they still possess it.

I have believed, and now do, that in a country so extensive as ours, so highly commercial, and so free, our business cannot be transacted without paper of some kind, which is not money, but credit, the representative of money. These credits will be highly injurious, unless regulated by law. I therefore have maintained State banks, at the same time wishing to put down, by all means in our power, small notes; to have none less than five, ten, twenty, and even higher than that, if a majority wished, so as to furnish a broad specie basis, the better to maintain and support the organized credits, evidenced by bank notes or checks.

It is all idle to tell me that the only mode to have hard money is to put down State banks. Put them down to-morrow, and then we will find it indispensable to have a United States Bank owned by individuals, or a Treasury bank owned by the United States, and governed at the will of the Executive.

Being opposed to both these, and thinking the country must have credits in some shape, I support State banks as the only means of preventing the establishment of some one of the others. I think them both unconstitutional, and the Treasury bank infinitely the most dangerous.

We might as well at once put the whole moneys of the Government at the disposition of the Executive as to pass this bill; because, although some of the officers who are to have charge of it must have the sanction of the Senate in their appointment, yet the President can remove, or have removed at his pleasure, every man of them.

This bill, in truth and in fact, creates a bank with vast powers and extensive capacity.

Suppose Congress to incorporate a number of individuals, and confer upon them powers to do exactly the same things which the officers named in this bill are empowered and required to do, what would gentlemen call their institution? It must and would be a bank; they would have all the usual powers of a bank, except to loan money by discounting notes.

The only use of an act of incorporation is to empower a number of individuals, or some one man, to transact certain business under particular restrictions. Now, if we give to our own officers exactly the same powers which, if given to one or more individuals would denominate the establishment a bank, it is equally so in both cases.

This bill provides places where our whole treasure, hard money, notes of specie-paying banks, Treasury notes, or other paper issued under the authority of the Government, are to be kept.

It authorizes the transfers and retransfers of those moneys from point to point, at the discretion of the Secretary. There is now a bill before the other House authorizing an issue of ten millions of Treasury notes; it will certainly pass for that or a larger sum.

Now, let us consider how these powers may be made to operate.

1st. The capital is the whole treasure of the nation, say any sum we please, not less than twenty-five, nor more than fifty millions of dollars.

This sum can be concentrated at one place, or dispersed to different places, as the Secretary chooses. A merchant of New York owes fifty thousand dollars for duties, and this sum he is to pay to the collector there, who is to deposite it in his vault. He borrows the amount from a specie-paying bank in the notes of the State bank, and pays the debt. Instantly the collector goes to the bank, draws the specie, and returns their notes, and locks the specie up in the vault, where he is to keep it till needed for disbursement; and by pursuing this plan, the whole specie may be withdrawn from the banks, or so much of it as to compel the banks to wind up.

Again: a merchant in Nashville owes fifty thousand dollars for goods purchased in New York; he gets that amount in notes of the Nashville banks, by borrowing or otherwise, but they will not answer to pay his debt in New York; he therefore goes to the sub-Treasurer, who has his proportion of these Treasury notes, and gives him his fifty thousand dollars, and receives a Treasury note, or notes, and perhaps allows one or two per cent. as the difference of exchange, and the sub-Treasurer immediately goes to the State bank, returns its notes, takes the specie, and locks it up in the vaults. When a creditor of the Government applies for payment of his salary, or other dues, he may be paid in Treasury notes, and thus we find this a bank of issues.

It is useless to pursue this subject farther. Every practical man must see this is in substance a Treasury bank, with immense funds as a capital, with unlimited power to draw and redraw, and that it is a bank to issue, not hard money alone, but paper money issued by or under the authority of the United States. That it confers powers and capacities which will enable it to prostrate the State banks, any and every where, at its pleasure.

It will not only control the State banks, and make them subservient to its will, but will also influence all men engaged in commerce, which requires the use of funds at distant places.

Pass this bill, and we put it in the power of the President, through his Secretary of the Treasury, to control the whole pecuniary, active capital of the country. We are to add this tremendous power to a patronage already dangerous in the extreme, and this at a time when we have a Chief Magistrate who is not only unwilling to have his power and patronage curtailed and limited, but is desirous to add to them, even to the extent of encouraging armed voluntary associations to stand ready to carry out his views by force of arms.

In the early and pure days of the Republic, in 1789, the republican doctrine was, that no President would ever dare to remove an officer who held at the will of the President, simply on account of his politics; and, if he did, Mr. Madison said it would be a crime for which he should be impeached.

Mr. Jefferson, upon assuming the reins of Government, prohibited all inferior officers from interfering in elections, further than to vote, on pain of dismissal.

In the canvass which brought the late President into office, we all thought the same way, and that this was the sound democratic or republican doctrine.

Do we not all remember the out-cry against Mr. Adams, because we thought, through a Mr. Slade, a clerk in some of the departments, he had signified to the Vermont Legislature that he preferred the old Senator, Mr. Seymour, to Mr. Van Ness? The newspapers rung with this charge, and if Mr. Adams or his cabinet had avowed that they had a right to endeavor to influence people in elections, it is doubtful how he would have got through even the four years to which he had been elected.

Now the whole course of thinking and acting is changed. During the last Administration it was not only maintained that the President and all under him had a right to interfere, but, for the sake of securing a democratic Administration, it was a duty to aid in electing his successor, members to both Houses of Congress, Governors of States, &c.

The present incumbent improves upon this, and countenances what may be called legions of honor, to maintain him by force in carrying out modern democracy.

I have been surprised that in none of our discussions has any gentleman alluded to a correspondence between an association in Philadelphia and the Chief Magistrate during the past year.

They informed him that they had voluntarily associated together, had armed and equipped themselves, and made a tender of their services to carry out the laws.

In a country as free as ours, where the laws themselves are nothing but the will of a majority of the People, constitutionally expressed, every thing which tends to weaken or diminish our respect for the laws is highly reprehensible. Now what would we reasonably expect as an answer from our Chief Magistrate to such a tender of services?

I looked for grateful acknowledgments for their good feelings towards him, and a request that, as they regarded him and his fame, they would immediately lay aside their warlike implements, and dissolve the association; because, if the country was to remain free, such voluntary associations could never be necessary. Public opinion, and forces, when indispensable, called out under the authority of law, would always be sufficient in the hands of the Executive to give effect to the will of the people, expressed through their acts of Congress.

But I was sorry to find no such sentiments; on the contrary, sincere thanks, and a manifest willingness to countenance the use of such forces if emergency should require their services.

The good sense of society must check this course of thinking, or there is reason to fear that, at no distant day, we may have, through the agency of such means, anarchy first, and then despotism.

The Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) at the close of his reply to the Senator from South Carolina, "for his special benefit," in very good temper, and in a most happy manner, referred to the early history of that portion of my State, now called East Tennessee, once known as the State of Franklin. He read us a part of one of her acts of Assembly, which fixed the salaries of some of her officers, and directed the species of currency in which they were to be paid.

I always feel gratified when I know, or hear, that my State has done any thing which benefits any portion of my fellow-men.

"Blessed are the peace-makers," is the language of Holy Writ. On this occasion the two honorable and distinguished Senators had assumed an attitude so belligerant that I really feared it might end in something worse than words. But no sooner were the labors of my State fifty years ago brought to the notice of this grave body, than we all forgot that any of us had ever been out of temper, and so soon as we could recover composure enough to adjourn, we separated like a band of brothers—no two leaving the chamber in better temper with each other than the two honorable Senators.

But, sir, the Senator knew nothing of the practice under the State law, therefore we have not the full benefit which we ought to derive from his reminiscence. He could have related the whole incidents so much better than I can, that I regret he did not mention this subject to me before he addressed the Senate: if he had, I would have given him the additional facts, that the whole might have been detailed to the Senate in his good tempered and felicitous manner.

It will be remembered that the Governor, Chief Justice, and some other officers were to be paid in deer skins. Other inferior officers were to be paid in rackoon skins. Now, at that day, we were all goods Whigs, although we had some of the notions of the Democrats of the present day.

We thought these taxes might safely remain in the hands of the collectors as sub-treasuries until wanted for disbursement. The taxes were, therefore, fairly collected in the skins and peltry pointed out in the law. But the collectors, as report says, knew that although rackoon skins were plenty, opossum skins were more so, and that they could be procured for little or nothing. They, therefore, procured the requisite numbers of opossum skins, cut the tails off the reckoon skins, sewed them to the opossum skins, paid them into the general or principal treasury, and sold the rackoon skins to the hatters.

The treasurer had been an unlucky appointment, although a worthy man; he was a foreigner, knew nothing of skins or peltry, and was, therefore, easily deceived by his sub-treasurers. Whenever this imposition was discovered, the whole system went down, and we never have had a great fancy for leaving the taxes in the hands of the sub-treasurers or collectors from that day to this.

But, sir, these old proceedings more clearly developed the true character of my State than almost any thing of the present day.

The territory or tract of country called Franklin was composed of four counties of North Carolina, and separated from the body of the State by the great ledge of mountains, called at different places by different names, and from what is now West Tennessee, by the Cumberland Mountains, and a wilderness of two hundred miles.

The revolutionary war had terminated with Great Britain in 1783, but it continued with the powerful tribes of Indians who had been in alliance with her. The depredations of these Indians were so serious that aid to arrest their ravages was desired from North Carolina; that State was not in a situation to furnish protection, and instead thereof, from good motives, no doubt, but without due consideration, passed an act ceding us to the United States. Whenever the news was received, the leading men, who were King's Mountain men—Sevier, the companion of the gallant Campbell and Shelby, at their head, took fire; the discontent ended in a declaration of independence, and the formation of the State called, to perpetuate our whig principles, "Franklin."

North Carolina discovered her error, and, before Congress could act on the subject, repealed her act of cession. But it was too late. We had been disposed of without our consent. Though but a handfull, with a powerful savage enemy infesting our whole frontier, and without a dollar to begin with, we set up for ourselves. We would not brook the indignity, we had begun the fight for liberty, and liberty or death we would have. We continued the controversy till 1789, when an accommodation with our parent State took place; and with our own consent, and upon terms thought just, we, with other portions of territory, were ceded, in 1789, to the United States.

In 1796, we became the State of Tennessee, and how we have since conducted, I willingly leave to the judgment of our sister States.

I confess, instead of feeling humbled by, I am proud of, this ancient reminiscence. I feel proud that my ancestor was one of that unyielding band; that I now find myself associated here with a Sevier and a Tipton; and although I sometimes think two generations back those of their name would have not worked so tamely in party gear, yet every once in a while the blood shows itself, and you can see, that if their home concerns are not attended to here, according to what is just, they break party bandages, and walk abroad in that freedom for which their fathers perilled every thing.

It is true we were not either Whigs, Tories, or Democrats by inheritance, but there is much in blood, much in education. Early lessons from mothers are apt to have an influence upon us through life. What the father says when he first sends his boy to school is hardly ever forgotten.

When that law was passed, and for years afterward, the first morning the son was to start for school, he was sure to receive the father's advice, in emphatic terms, calculated to make a lasting impression, in language like the following: My son, you are now going to school, you must render a willing obedience to your master; he is in my place, obey him if you love me. Be kind to all your schoolfellows, do nothing offensive or unjust to them. Be careful in all you say and do not to give any of them cause of offence, and, if they will quarrel with and abuse you, take care you never come home whipped by any one, if you have the power to prevent it.

Children were taught from infancy the doctrine of equality, that no distinction ought to exist, except that which was produced by vice or virtue.

And as to a circulating medium, this old act contains a volume of instruction for me. At that day, the medium of our exchanges was skins and peltry, or furs. They were the currency in which the people were obliged to transact their business, and my father, when voting for that law, thought it just that our officers, from the Governor to the constable, should be paid in the same kind of currency which the people were compelled to use in their dealings with each other, and so think I now as to our Federal officers. Such, I think, have been the opinions of the majority of my constituents from my youth to this day.

My wish is to carry into effect their will. If I had fortitude enough to venture into an unknown world, I would rather do so now, and upon this spot, than knowingly to give a vote upon a subject so important, which would disappoint the wishes of the companions of my youth, the associates of my maturer years, and those who have ever sustained me against all attacks, at every stage of life.

What I believe to be their will corresponds with my own judgment on this subject; and however much I may and do regret a difference of opinion with enlightened men from other States, yet I acknowledge no responsibility to any human power except to the citizens of my own State, who have so long honored me with their confidence.

TERRITORY OF IOWA.

REMARKS OF MR. C. SHEPARD,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, Tuesday June 5, 1838.—On the bill to erect the new Territory of Iowa, by dividing Wisconsin.

Mr. SHEPARD said that, if the public interest required the passage of this bill, or the real happiness of the people would be promoted by it, no member could be more unwilling than himself to throw any obstacle in its way. The committee from whom it came had not made a report, and the gentlemen who preceded him in the debate had not stated a single grievance to be removed from our constituents, or a single benefit to be conferred. It may be that a fresh and rich field might be opened to those who speculate in the public lands, and a batch of new offices created for such as seek Executive favor; but not perceiving that any sound maxim of national policy was to be followed and enforced, he felt constrained to give the bill his zealous opposition.

It is said that the Territory of Wisconsin is too large; that the people who inhabit the right bank of the Mississippi have no sympathy of interest or feeling with those who cultivate the shores of Lake Michigan; and that the settlements are so distant from each other that judges and other public officers cannot attend to their respective duties. Gentlemen forget that not many months have elapsed since Michigan formed a part of this Northwestern Territory; at that time no complaint of this kind was made, and yet now, when nearly half of the country has become a State and entered the Confederacy, the remainder is too large to be included under one Government, and petitions Congress for a division! If the present judges and marshals find it impossible to perform their duties, let the number of officers be increased, so that every portion of the people may enjoy the protection of the law; thus the evil may be removed by a slight change, without incurring the expense of an additional Government, and all the paraphernalia incidental to a council or Legislature. This Territory, vast as it may seem, is not as large as the State of Virginia; and its interests must be very weighty and conflicting, if the same Governor and the same deliberative Assembly cannot superintend the whole.

But who are these that are dissatisfied with our legislation, and pray for the establishment of a new Territory? Individuals who have left their own homes, and seized on the public land. As soon as Black Hawk and his warriors were driven from their hunting grounds, before the country was surveyed or a land office opened, these men pounced on the choicest spots, cut down the timber, built houses, and cultivated the soil as if it was their own property. An honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POPE] has pronounced a high eulogy on the honesty and patriotism of these people: I am not disposed to question its justice, or to use the epithets applied to them by others, but is certain that, without the authority of law, and in defiance of the Government, they have taken possession of what belongs to the whole nation, and appropriated to a private use that which was intended for the public welfare. These are they who require a governor and council, judges, and marshals, when every act of their lives is contrary to justice, and every petition which they make is an evidence of their guilt and violence. We, who are insulted, whose authority is trampled under foot, are asked for new favors and privileges; the makers and guardians of the law are approached by its open contemners, and begged to erect these modest gentlemen into a dignified Government. The gravity and insolence of this application would excite laughter, if the last ten years had no presented too many instances of a like spirit and character; individuals and masses of people in every part of this favored country begin to look beyond the law, to despise the constituted authorities, to consider their own feelings and passions as the standard of public duty, and too often men in high places have connived at their proceedings. The manner in which new sovereignties are fabricated is amusing and characteristic. These poachers take the public land, and humbly pray for the right of pre-emption; this yielded, they call the Government a step-mother, and demand various grants and immunities; then they force themselves into the Union, without complying with the act of Congress, and, reaching the climax of impudence, they boldly threaten to deprive the old States of all share in the national domain. But we are asked, what must be done? Twenty thousand people are living on the west side of the Mississippi, and the whole army of the United States could not drive them from their settlements. Is it come to this? A private citizen can enforce his rights, by appealing to the courts of justice, and yet the Government which rules and protects all, cannot keep intruders from the public land, and is not able to save the property of the people! If this be so, our fathers labored in vain; if the moral and physical power of our institutions be so weak, they are not worthy of preservation. Mr. S. had not yet lost faith in the virtue and intelligence of the country; the fault was not with the people, but the politicians, who are continually struggling to advance themselves by pandering to every prejudice, and using all means to acquire popularity. The citizen is willing to support his rulers in the maintenance of the law, but he who seeks for place will sacrifice the interests of the nation, and sink the dignity of the Government, to obtain a little favor in the new States.

These outrages are still more inexcusable when it is remembered that there are eighty millions of acres, of every variety of soil and climate, now open to entry, and the plea of necessity will not avail these adventurers. I (said Mr. S.) cannot sanction their conduct; if they would not move peaceably, they should go at the point of the bayonet; if they forget what is due to their country and their distant fellow-citizens, they ought to be punished. The majesty of the laws should be vindicated. But, sir, questions of still graver import are involved in this subject—questions which affect the destiny of this great people, though the din of political warfare and the exciting struggles of personal rivalry may cause other topics for a time to engross public attention. When Virginia ceded the Northwest Territory to the United States, it was agreed that not less than three States should be formed out of it, and that they should be admitted into the Union when their population amounted to sixty thousand souls. This compact has been faithfully observed and nearly fulfilled. The policy of the General Government has been of the mildest and most paternal character. The building up of new empires in the shortest time seemed to have been its object. The richest and most beautiful lands were sold for a trifle; tribe after tribe of natives disappeared, and the white man was on their heels; bounties of immense value were given for schools and internal improvement. Scarcely any request of the settlers was denied, so anxious was the Government to encourage emigration, and to people these vast regions. The effect of this legislation was magical; thousands and tens of thousands left their homes in the East for the fertile valleys of the West. This was not the surplus population, not the overflowings of a redundant community, but the bone and sinew of the land, and in many cases its wealth and intelligence. Thus have arisen those thriving and powerful States, which have already outstripped most of their elder sisters. The same policy has been pursued towards the new States of the Southwest. By the treaty with France we stipulated to extend to the people of the Louisiana Territory all the rights of citizenship. This has been done. Louisiana, Missouri and Arkansas have been successively admitted into the Union, and they have become great and flourishing communities.

The Federal Government having thus complied with all its engagements, the number of States composing the Union having been doubled in fifty years, and our empire being already larger than most of the nations of the earth, shall we continue this policy? shall we go on to extinguish Indian titles? shall we give away the rich inheritance we possess with the same rapidity? If the Territory of Iowa be now established, it will soon become a State; if we now cross the Mississippi, under the bountiful patronage of this Government, the cupidity and enterprise of our people will carry the system still further, and ere long the Rocky Mountains will be scaled, and the valley of the Columbia be embraced in our dominion. This, then, is the time to pause, to gather the results of previous experience, and to consider the influence of this legislation on the character of the people and the durability of our institutions.

The strength of a nation does not consist in the extent of its territory. Population diffused over a great surface is neither as rich nor as powerful as when condensed in narrower limits, and engaged in the various employments of human industry. Cities filled with artisans, and the soil worked by numerous agriculturists, cause the production of more wealth than if the same people were scattered over a wider region. The minds of men, when constantly brought into collision and struggling for pre-eminence, are more active, more fruitful of expedients, and more apt to make those great inventions which increase the comforts of life and exalt the character of a people. If all the land of a country be occupied, new modes of agriculture will be discovered to increase the productive energies of the soil; or those whose labor is not needed in the field will go to the ocean or the workshop, and this natural division of industry will make each class more skilful and richer than if all were confined to the original employment over a larger space.

The resources of a dense population are more available and more easily brought into the service of the Government than those of a scattered people. If taxes be imposed, they are levied with quickness and facility; if physical strength be required, it is concentrated with despatch, and made to operate with vigor; if intellectual qualities be desired, they are quickly found, and directed to the public welfare. To prove the truth of this theory, let England and Russia be compared; one is a mere speck in the ocean, but crowded with thriving and industrious people; the other occupies a portion of two continents, with a population of fifty millions spread over its immense territory. The power of the former is felt in the remotest corners of the earth; the latter is feared by the savage hordes within its own limits, and hangs like a dark cloud over its weaker neighbors. England commands the treasury of the commercial world; Russia, with its rich soil and hidden wealth, is poor, and dependent on the smiles of foreign bankers and capitalists. In an instant the former can buckle on her armor, and strike an enemy before he thinks of preparation; she can fly from point to point with the speed and fury of lightning; the latter is slow in motion, deficient in activity, and, possessing great strength like the elephant, it also partakes of the sluggish qualities of that huge animal.

A country may be too populous; in the progress of time, the means of livelihood become less than the demand for necessary subsistence. The starving operatives, whose haggard faces and decrepit limbs are seen in the manufacturing towns of Europe, and the squalid beings who haunt the crowded marts of commerce, attest the misery of a redundant and confined population. It would be sin and folly to bring into existence such a state of society; no political expediency, no prospect of national grandeur, could justify the sacrifice of individual welfare, and the duty of Government is to provide for the comfort of all the people, and to make them satisfied with their condition by ministering to the wants and necessities of their nature. But we are still very far from the point of pauperism; every where in this favored land industry meets with its due reward, and competency is in the reach of all, except the vicious and unfortunate. If the old world be a criterion on this subject, the twenty-six States of the Union can support a population more than four times as great as that which they now contain; and the true question is, whether the future increase of the people should be kept within our present limits, or stimulated to wander over the vast regions of the West.

If happiness depended entirely on the number of hogs raised, or the quantity of corn gathered, then the citizens should be dispersed, so as to occupy the most fertile spots in our whole territory; but, regarding only physical comfort, we shall find that the luxuries of life are not always at the command of those who have many a broad acre in possession. The productions of foreign climates have become almost indispensable necessaries. The offsprings of the ocean constitute a great source of sensual enjoyment, and articles of manufacture unknown to our fathers are now familiar in household economy—all these are not easily obtained by the emigrant; and though he has ample granaries, yet the sum of comfort is less than if he had remained in his old habitation. To take a higher view of the subject, the social advantages of a compact population preponderate greatly over the coarser benefits of sprinkled settlements. The development of the human mind, which contributes in so extraordinary a degree to the happiness of our race, occurs only in dense communities; the great inventions in the arts have been made when there was a superabundance of labor, and the wonderful discoveries of science, which have displayed the laws of the material world to human vision, have been caused by the necessity of men's turning their attention to other pursuits than those of mere physical exertion. Need I dwell on the humanizing influence of literature, and the graceful refinements of art? These are not confined to the rich and the great, but are felt in the humble dwellings of the poor; they soften the manners, widen the circle of innocent enjoyments, and elevate and strengthen the character. If man be more than an animal, if the qualities of the intellect were bestowed on him for cultivation, it is proper that they should not be choked by the rough tares of mere sensual pleasure.

The people of the old world look on a few acres of inheritance with pious regard. The owner is warmed at the same hearth which gave comfort to his ancestors, and he enjoys the shade of the old trees planted by their care; every thing around connects him with the past, keeps fresh in memory the deeds and virtues of departed generations, and cherishes the most hallowed feelings of the heart. The same dwelling is to be the abode of his own children, and another tie thus links him to the spot; thinking of the past, and looking to the future, feeling that the spirits of the dead are watching over their earthly home, and that the hopes of the living are dependent on his conduct, he is ashamed to disgrace his fathers and to blast the character of his posterity; and thus has a double incentive to honest and generous actions. How different are the circumstances of our own country! The policy of the Government, in constantly exposing to sale new tracts of land, has lessened the value of our soil, and destroyed those sacred ties which should bind us to our early homes. If a man could make fifty dollars by the contract, he would sell his paternal acres with the bones of his ancestors; one place is as dear to him as another, and he feels but little regret in leaving forever the scenes of his childhood, and banishing from the mind their sweet associations. The moral character of our people is also affected. The facility with which persons can emigrate removes from society a check on vice and crime; the fraudulent debtor, the house breaker, and the assassin, not only escape the consequences of guilt, but, with a little impudence and energy, they acquire from the Government valuable possessions. It may be asked, should men be forced to cultivate a poor soil, when the rich valleys of the West can be reached? We must not forget that the lands of the old States were once fertile, in their virgin condition they produced most bountifully, and with proper care would, to this day, have sustained in comfort a numerous population. But where land is given away by the Government, the agriculturist is cruel and mercenary; he taxes its powers to the utmost extent without reparation; and, having drunk its life-blood, he removes to more inviting spots, to practise the same unprofitable husbandry. The Arab of the desert pitches his tent where he finds green herbage and a spring, and, having exhausted these blessings, he flies in search of others; so our citizens seem to have no home, no local attachments, but go where they can get the most for the present time. The consequence is, we have a miserable system of agriculture, and the most profuse habits of any people on the globe. It is almost useless to improve the land, or to ornament it with elegant and substantial buildings, so probable it is that the next generation will leave it to decay. The soil which is now considered the best, will in its turn be worn out, and the tide of emigration will flow to newer regions. Where, then, is the wisdom of a policy which impoverishes one section of the country, and keeps our people in constant motion? I have endeavored to show that it promotes neither the strength of the nation nor the happiness of individuals; that it retards intellectual advancement, and banishes some of the finer feelings of the heart; and if mere temporary convenience be overlooked, and the permanent welfare of the country alone be considered, more evil than good will be found attendant on the present system. The public lands should have been brought into market gradually, and according to the wants of an increasing population. Had this been done, the old States would now have been in the highest condition; the wealth and improvement diffused over a large surface would have been concentrated, and magnificent results would have followed. The people in this extensive country would have been made homogeneous; the surplus of Northern enterprise and industry would have flowed to the South; our institutions would have been strengthened, and more correct principles and feelings would have existed.

But whatever may be the effect of this land policy on the general welfare, it has been deeply injurious to the Southern portion of the Confederacy. An early traveller into North Carolina speaks with wonder of its fertility, and the various fruits which are spontaneously yielded by the earth. Now the soil is worn out, the people are gone, and this young and lovely land is almost in a state of desolation. The same remark is applicable to the whole South; the commerce and manufactures of the Northern States, and accessions to their population from Europe, have saved them from this exhausting process. If all the people born in North Carolina had remained in its limits, our swamps and low grounds would have rivalled the valley of the Nile in production, and our pine barrens would have been flourishing with the vine, the olive, and the mulberry. We have, therefore, reason to complain of the policy of this Government. Let not gentlemen speak of the nation: Those who are continually prating about the good of the whole, and pretend to know no difference between Massachusetts and Virginia, always manage to consider their own interests the general welfare. I, sir, was not sent here to legislate for all mankind; those whom I represent are nearest to my heart, and that land, which gave me birth, and has early honored me, is the first in my consideration. Others may act as it pleases them, but I will never sustain a policy so detrimental to the people with whom I am connected.

If these remarks be unavailing, the patriot should fear for the permanence of the Republic, when he thinks of the enormous extent of its territory. Already have the jarring interests of the different parts created violent contests on this floor, and disseminated through the country the seeds of ill feeling and of future strife. New England contends for the protection of its industry, and the South demands free trade on the ground of policy and justice. The West talks of seizing the public domain, and the East denounces the act as plunder and villany. The representatives of the nation assemble here to provide for the general welfare; but no measure is brought forward, no question is discussed, no law is passed, which affects all portions equally, and which is not supported and opposed according to its bearing on sectional interests. Do gentlemen wish to increase these difficulties? Let us not deceive ourselves with the notion that the charm of our Revolutionary struggles will last forever; the glories of Bunker's Hill, of Yorktown, and of King's Mountain, are the property of the nation, and will be dear to the latest prosterity; but these alone cannot keep us together; they may satisfy enthusiasm, but will not actuate statesmen. We must have the same feelings and the same interests; above all, this Government should abstain from interfering with local affairs, either for good or evil.

The great object of a American patriot should be to strengthen our institutions. Premature growth in the human body, though it excites the wonder of all beholders, is too often the cause of early dissolution; the stature and the limbs exceed the strength, and the bright promise of youth is blasted, while those who gradually ascend from the weakness of childhood will surely attain a sound and healthful maturity. This political fabric reared by our fathers is fair to the sight, and we indulge the hope that it will bear the storms of time, and give protection to future generations; but there is reason to fear that these constant additions will injure the whole structure, and this glorious work of the Revolution tumble into ruins, from inability to sustain its own weight.

A few days ago, when the bill for the removal of the Cherokees was under discussion, we heard the most pathetic lamentations over the condition of the poor Indian. The hoarse croakings of fanaticism, and the dove-like accents of philanthropy, were joined in the solemn chorus, and one would have thought that these gentlemen were anxious to surrender the possessions acquired by the cunning of their pious ancestors. Sir, I voted for that bill, and I felt indignant at the attempt to set aside a treaty sanctioned by all the authorities of this Government; but now I will join these benevolent gentlemen—I will co-operate with the in doing justice to the savage, and in healing the wounds inflicted by our fathers. I understand that all these Indian treaties are tainted with fraud, or the poor natives are forced into compliance with the wishes of our people; let us, therefore, strike at the root of the evil; let us, henceforth, abstain from the purchase of Indian territory; let us keep our citizens from encroaching on their possessions, and we shall have no more wars, no more "expenditure of blood and treasure" on the frontier. What says the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] who has signalized himself in behalf of the Cherokees? Will he accede to this proposition? Is he willing to let the Indians retain the remnant of their property, and to confine the white men in his present borders? Sir, those who groan most piteously over Ross and his associates are eager enough to drive or cajole the savags of the Northwest, and the gentleman himself [Mr. EVERETT] has offered an amendment to this bill, appropriating ten thousand dollars to the laudable purpose of making treaties with the Indians, that is, of cheating them out of their lands. I fear that this modern philanthropy, like the fluid of the thermometer, rises as it approaches the South. The new code of morals recognises a difference between Northern and Southern Indians, and some gentleman may think it politic and sagacious to lay the corner-stone of a friendly nation in the heart of the Southern country. We shall remember their kindness.

It becomes a great people to be just and generous. Our fathers found this continent in the possession of a noble race of freemen and warriors; by a policy, which I need not designate, the natives have melted away from the face of the earth, and to the white man belong the seats of their council-fires, and the graves of their ancestors. Without any sacrifice but that of avarice and ambition, we might now repair the wrongs which two centuries have been accumulating, by collecting the remnants of this ill-fated people, and guarantying to them the country not yet admitted into the Union; by sincerely offering the hand of friendship, and making them acquainted with the blessings of Christian civilization, we might bring into existence a great empire to check the insolence of too much prosperity, and we should certainly shed on our country immortal honor by this act of national justice.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] opposes the bill, because its tendency is to increase the strength of the non-slaveholding States, which are already preponderant in the Confederacy. I regret the introduction of this topic, not that I differ from my honorable friend, for his sentiments bore the impress of truth, but the objections to the measure are so many and powerful, that it is needless to resort to one of an irritating nature. If we oppose the bill on sectional grounds, our enemies will support it for the same reason, and its passage will be quick and certain, as we are already in a minority. I have, therefore, confined myself to general considerations. I have endeavored to discuss the subject in relation to its bearings on the whole country, and I hope that those who have to decide the question will view it in the same spirit of enlarged patriotism.

REMARKS OF MR. RANDOLPH, OF NEW JERSEY.

In the House of Representatives, May 15, 1838—The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the "bill to carry into effect an act approved on the 12th day of October, 1837, to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes"—

Mr. RANDOLPH of New Jersey, rose and said: Mr. CHAIRMAN, being opposed to the present bill, and having voted against the similar one which passed at the special session, I feel it a duty which I owe as well to myself as to those I have the honor of representing, to embrace the present opportunity, the first which severe indisposition and other uncontrollable causes have afforded me, to state my objections as well to the bill now before the committee as to the whole system of which this is a material part. The bill now under consideration purports, by its title, to be intended simply "to carry into effect" the Treasury note law passed in October. That law authorized the issue of ten millions of Treasury notes; and the principal reason urged for the passage of this bill is, that the whole amount has been issued, and, of course, the whole law carried into effect. Why, then, this deceptive title? Is it intended to deceive the people as to the real state of things? Is the Government affraid that the people should know that, having exhausted one loan of ten millions, (for the issue of Treasury notes is but a loan in disguise,) they now ask another ten millions? This measure is pressed upon the House with great zeal, and extraordinary efforts are made to procure its immediate passage. We are now legislating under a mandate from the Executive; a message not simply giving us the information of the bankrupt condition of the Treasury, and asking the Legislature to provide for the exigency, but requiring of us to pass this bill with all expedition, and urging the tyrant's plea of necessity, to preclude deliberation and debate. Sir, when we have sunk so low as to be the mere registers of Executive rescripts, we shall be worthy imitators of a corrupt and degraded Senate of Rome, and no longer be the Representative of a free people. We are urged to the immediate passage of this bill because the Treasury is bankrupt. Sir, are there no other means to raise the nation from disgrace and ruin? May not a loan in name, as well as in fact, be effected, the premium on which would counterbalance the interest? May not the bonds due from the United States Bank be sold; nay, sir, is it not a fact, known to the Executive, that that institution is ready and willing to pay off those bonds, though not due for months to come? Have not the opponents of the Administration, and of this bill in particular, on two several occasions since the commencement of the present discussion, proposed without debate or objection, to authorize a loan or the issuing of a sufficient amount of Treasury notes to meet the present exigency of the Treasury? Why, then, is the condition of the Treasury urged as a reason for immediate action? Is not this used as a mere pretext, a cloak, for other purposes? The Treasury bankrupt! What has reduced it to that condition? But a few months since the people of this great Republic were prosperous and happy, and the national exchequer full to overflowing; now our currency and exchanges are deranged, commerce and manufactures almost annihilated, and thousands reduced from competency to poverty and ruin; and, as a necessary consequence, the Treasury bankrupt, and the "powers that be" compelled to beg a pittance to keep the wheels of Government in motion! Why is this?

I confess, Mr. Chairman, for one, I would most cheerfully waive all discussion of the cause of our embarrassments, and look alone to the remedy proposed; but the glove has been thrown down by our opponents; and on our arrival here in September, fresh from a much injured people, we were met by that cold, calculating message, which evinced no sympathy for their distress, but kindly informed us that the people were their own destroyers, in spite of the paternal care of the Administration. I thought then, and still think, that this was something like adding insult to injury; and that the Representative would be recreant to duty who would not defend his constituents from so foul a charge. At one time we are told, sir, that the cause of our present embarrassment is a mere ordinary revulsion of trade, brought on by our merchants, and extending alike to this country and to Europe; and the mercantile community have come in for a large share of censure; they have been designated on this floor "the most mercenary, if not the most patriotic," and no effort spared to make them the scapegoats of the many sins of the Administration. But I had thought that, from the time John Hancock and the merchants of Philadelphia contributed their millions to the cause of American liberty unto the present hour, they had been the most patriotic and enterprising of our citizens. Who have done more than they to extend the commerce, the wealth, the honor, and the glory of the nation? Whose sails have whitened every sea, whose vessels displayed our country's flag in every port? The same class who, without causing the embarrassment, are its first and most unfortunate victims. Nor is it correct that this revulsion extends to England and other nations of Europe, and arises there, as here, from excessive bank issues. The assertion has often been made, but the proof never adduced, because it was not to be found. Partial embarrassment, doubtless, did exist there; yet even this arose from the American trade, and extended only to the American houses and those connected with them. All our accounts from England and the continent confirm this; and, if further proof were needed, I might refer to the able pamphlet of Mr. Horsley Palmer, lately published in London. Nor is it true, sir, that the embarrassments in Europe arise from an overissue of bank paper. That banking capital, as well as trade in general, has been increasing in England for the last ten years, is not to be denied; but in the year immediately preceding the embarrassments there and here, there was a decrease of bank circulation. According to the statement rendered January 26, 1837, by Count d'Argout, governor of the Bank of France, the circulation of that institution varied, in 1835, from two hundred and seven to two hundred and forty-one millions of francs; whilst in the year 1836, it was from one hundred and ninety-two to two hundred and thirty-one millions of francs; there being an average decrease in the circulation of twelve millions and a half of francs. And in June, 1836, the aggregate amount of the circulation of the Bank of England and the several private and joint stock banks was thirty million one hundred and one thousand pounds; whilst in June, 1837, their circulation amounted to twenty-nine million and seventy-four thousand pounds; showing a decrease of one million and twenty-seven thousand pounds sterling.

At other times it is alleged that our present situation arises from over-banking, speculation, and over-trading. Grant, sir, that these may have been the immediate causes, yet the inquiry still arises, from whence originated thes causes, and how have they operated? I apprehend, sir, that the seeds of our disease are discoverable at a much more remote period than is generally imagined; they were sown before and during the whole of the late Administration, and we are now reaping the abundant harvest. Sir, to promote the election of the late Chief Magistrate, hundreds and thousands were allured by flattering promises of promotion to forsake their honest avocations and turn politicians; and when the old chief was conducted in triumph to the Capitol, this army of mercenaries flocked around him, demanding support. Then, sir, for the first time, it was openly proclaimed, from this Capitol and through the nation, that all offices and honors were the legitimate "spoils of victory," which belonged to the victors; then, too, was forgotten the maxim of the old Democracy: "Is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the Constitution?" and, in its place, devotion to the President and all his measures was made the shibboleth to office. The President, according to the theory of the British Constitution, could do no wrong, and he became the fountain of honor and the dispenser of patronage and power, and the aspirant was taught to look to him and not to the People for promotion; to obey him and disregard the People. And, sir, with the aid and advice of the clique that surrounded him, no man ever flattered or fed his followers better than he; their passions, their prejudices, their interests, their credulity, were all laid in requisition. To them he appealed on every occasion, from the decision of this House, of the Senate, of the Judiciary. He took the responsibility; and his followers, "treading in his footsteps," plead his illustrious example in extenuation of every excess. Sir, the usual current of society was broken up, and men, bankrupt in estate and in reputation, were seen ascending the ladder of fame and fortune. The forms of law and constitution were too slow in their operation, and mob-law and massacre became the order of the day. Men forgot their old modes of living, and a kind of frenzy, the most unnatural and fatal, seemed to have seized the community; and although the wheel of pretended reform, the great Juggernaut of the party, was kept in constant motion, crushing the vanquished by thousands, and providing for the faithful, and other thousands took the law in their own hands, and quartered themselves upon the public domain, yet still other thousands, like swarms of locusts, poured in from the battle field, and demanded, in threatening shouts, their share of the "spoils." They had been taught to live without means; and now they came seeking at the footstool of power for means to live. In this way the public mind became excited with false hopes, and prepared for over-action, or to embark in any extravagance, whenever the means should be presented; and these, sir, were soon provided.

It was hardly to be expected, sir, that an Administration that had sought power in every possible form, descending to offices the most trifling and insignificant, would not aspire to control the vast money power of the country. Accordingly, it soon projected a grand exploring expedition, ostensibly in search of "the better currency," but really to discover and obtain the philosopher's stone, that should transmute to them the golden power of our whole monetary system. In pursuance of this design, the President began his attack on the United States Bank and the currency it furnished. It had long stood the balance-wheel of our monetary system, the regulator of exchanges, the check to excessive banking, over-trading, and speculation; but these its virtues were evils in the eyes of those who sought its overthrow. Attack succeeded attack, until at length "the monster" tottered and fell. One of the means used for its destruction was the removal of the deposites, in violation of law and in disregard of the National Legislature; and these, as part of the "spoils," were distributed amongst some ninety banks, which were urged by the Secretary, and by the President himself, to increase their discounts and circulation on the faith of the public deposites, and thus prevent any difficulties that might arise from the necessary contraction of the United States Bank. And it is alleged, on the authority of Mr. Gallatin, that when the New York deposite banks deemed it prudent to stop further issues, they were directed by the Secretary to continue their expansion, or yield up the deposites to more obedient institutions. Thus, sir, commenced the business of over-banking, one of the alleged causes of our present condition. But not only were the deposite banks required to extend their circulation, but the States were incited to erect institutions that should take the place of the National Bank. Whoever will take the trouble to examine the columns of the Globe, and other leading journals of that period, will find that the different State Legislatures, a majority of whose members, in nearly every State in the Union, were of the party, were constantly and earnestly urged, and almost commanded, to attend to what the Globe called "the business of creating State banks." From January, 1830, to December, 1836, the number of banks was increased from 330, with a capital of $145,192,268, to 677, with 146 branches, and a capital of $376,421,168. During the same period the Administration Legislature of New Jersey chartered some fifteen or sixteen banks, increasing the banking capital of the State from a little over two to near eleven millions. Several of these banks were created by party votes for party purposes; but candor requires me to add, that in this State, as doubtless was the case in others, some of the opponents of the Administration too willingly followed the recommendation of the Globe, and joined in aiding the great increase of bank paper, and in the delusive schemes of speculation which this expansion engendered; they doubtless contributed to the evil, though they had not the power, as had their adversaries, to prevent it.

Thus, sir, the measures of the Administration first prepare the men and the public mind in general for over-action and speculation, and the means by which they may be conducted; the means and the end stimulate each other, speculation increases, and this increases the demand for bank facilities, and this demand is further satisfied by the passage of the gold bill, and the large importations of specie. The former, by depreciating our coin, and thus rendering the comparative value of gold about two and a half per cent. more in this country than in Europe, caused a large amount of the precious metal to be imported; and to this amount the hard-money mania of the Administration added, to the injury of the claimants, the French and Neapolitan indemnities. So that in the years 1834, '5, and '6, the importations of specie amounted to $43,209,451—more than double the usual amount; then was first erected that golden idol, which is now mingled in our cup of affliction, of which the people are drinking the very dregs. All would certainly desire to see an increase of specie upon proper principles; but even gold may be bought too dear, and is so bought when its influx disarranges trade and unsettles a quiet state of affairs. But a small amount of this large specie importation was seen "flowing up the Mississippi," or "glittering through the interstices of the long silken purses," as had been promised. Being too valuable for circulation, it was conveyed as merchandise to the vaults of the banks, there to become the basis of from three to ten times its amount in paper money. Thus speculation was excited to the highest possible pitch; towns and cities were laid out, which will not be built up in a thousand years; millions of acres of the public domain were bought and sold, which will not be peopled for ages; all dabbled in the bright schemes of the day, from the highest Government officers down to the humblest individuals. City vied with city, town with town, and man with man, in the extent of their delusive daring; splendid fortunes were made in a day, and, as it had long before been predicted, an unnatural state of society and the extreme of extravagance succeeded, which was fed by immense importations—the over-trading complained of as the cause of the present evil. The country, to a casual observer, appeared to be enjoying unexampled prosperity; and the people were taught so to believe, and to ascribe unmeasured glory to the Administration.

Having shown, Mr. Chairman, what were and what were not the causes of our embarrassment, let us next inquir into the operation and effect of those causes. Overtrading created a heavy debt in Europe, which was increased by the importation of specie and the operation of the gold bill, in depreciating the coin; and in changing our standard from silver to gold, the same as that of England. The specie imported from England alone during the years 1834, '5, and '6, amounted to $8,954,131—more than four times as much as had been imported in the preceding twelve years; and from March to November, 1836, the bullion of the Bank of England was reduced three million eighty-one thousand pounds sterling, nearly one-half its whole amount, and leaving much less in its vaults than had been there in many years. England and the bank became alarmed, panic-struck, and the American merchants there were refused the usual accommodations, required to pay up former advances; they were consequently compelled to suspend business, and press their debtors in this country for immediate payment. In this critical state of things, I cannot forbear noticing, Mr. Chairman, the insidious efforts made in England, and by American citizens, too, (we are told, in imitation of the Administration press here and its leading supporters,) to impair the credit of our merchants and institutions there, and thus to increase the panic and distress; nor will I forbear, sir, adding my humble commendation of the noble effort made in London to disabuse the public mind, by a gallant officer of the navy, a citizen and resident of the State I have the honor in part to represent. This state of things in England materially lessened the demand for American produce, and of course its price, except as to such articles as, owing to a failure of crops, we were unsupplied with. Cotton alone, ordinarily amounting to one-half of our exports, depreciated in price more than fifty per cent.; making a loss on that single article of from twenty to thirty millions of dollars. Another result was the rise of foreign exchange, and consequently the price, and exportation of specie to pay off our foreign debt. Domestic exchange of course soon became deranged, and this derangement was increased by the unskilful mode of distributing the surplus amongst the States, and the incapacity of the deposite banks to regulate exchanges. The foreign demand for exchange and specie became excessive; exchange on London rose to twenty-two per cent. and specie to twelve per cent. premium; and this demand was met by the operation of the specie-circular, issued and still continued in disregard of Congress and the people, and of every sound principle, which carried coin westward, when the course of trade called for it eastward. Thus was created a double run for specie on the Atlantic banks, which, in order to save themselves and the country, were compelled to suspend specie payments. And thus, sir, the bubble burst, and spread bankruptcy and ruin throughout the country; and the golden dreams of the Administration and its deluded victims vanished, like some beautiful mirage, leaving only the arid plains or turbid waves behind.

The suspension and non-resumption of specie payments by the banks have drawn upon them much odium and censure, and some effort has been made to excite popular indignation against them, although the suspension is now acknowledged by all intelligent and candid men to have been a prudent and necessary measure. Sir, I have not now, and never have had, the smallest interest in any bank whatever; I never asked of them a favor or owed them a dollar or a sympathy, beyond what justice and the best interest of my country required. Yet, sir, I will not stand by and see them assailed for political effect, without attempting to do them justice. Sir, the war upon the currency, and the proceedings which flowed out of it, compelled the banks either to suspend, or curtail all accommodations, and require immediate payment, in specie, of all dues. The golden rule only required of them to pay the same kind of currency that they received or demanded, and it is like manner required the people to pay the same kind which they demanded. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, makes the loans, circulation, and deposites of the several banks in the United States, prior and subsequent to the suspension, as follows, viz.

1837.	Loans.	Circulation.	Circulation and deposite.
January 1,	$522,891,461	$151,308,120	$380,971,216
July 1,	502,557,093	117,764,759	211,521,236
Decrease,	$20,334,368	$33,543,361	$69,449,980

This statement shows that, since the suspension, the banks have paid off about one-fourth of their debts, consisting of circulation and deposites, whilst the people have only paid to the banks about one-eleventh of their debts; since the 1st of July there has been a considerable decrease on both sides. A shallow effort has been made to show that, whilst those to whom the banks are indebted are the people, those who owe the banks are not the people. The fact is, the large dealer who owes a bank has the amount due him from smaller dealers, and they expect to receive their amounts in the small sums due them from all classes of the community. The banks, since the suspension, have been prudent, and contracted their circulation; whereas, during the suspension of 1816, the circulation was greatly expanded, and of course became depreciated. The statement also evinces that the banks are perfectly sound, and that it would be to their interest to resume at the earliest possible period that it could be safely and permanently done. They have no motive to favor a National Bank, which it is said might crush any of them; but their interests are adverse, and arise principally from the extent of their circulation. It is not to be presumed that they are entirely guiltless of the over-banking; having no check, and being unduly stimulated, then too blindly followed the ignis fatuus of the Administration, and have become the victims of their credulity. If, instead of suspending specie payments, the banks had attempted to sustain themselves by curtailing their discounts, and calling in their debts in specie, how much greater would have been the distress throughout the community; and yet their efforts must have eventuated in a suspension.

Why do they not resume, then? Because the Government, so far from aiding them, impairs public confidence in them. Whether they resume or not, Government will not take their paper; the people would rationally conclude that, if Government refuse their paper, there must be something wrong about them, and they, too, would refuse to take, or at least to retain, their paper; and a resumption, under this state of feeling, would be followed by constant demands for specie, until their last dollar was gone, or they be compelled again to suspend. In 1816, the Secretary of the Treasury issued a general circular, proposing to receive in payment of public dues the notes of such banks as should resume by a stated period; and although the banks were then in a much worse condition than now, by this open confidence of the Government they were enabled to resume; and had the Secretary pursued a similar course in the present exigency, the suspension might long since have terminated. The Secretary understands this perfectly well; and in his private letters, to influence the New York bank convention, acted upon the principle for which I contend. If his private letters would, in his opinion, induce the New York banks to resume, what would not, according to the same opinion, a public circular have effected? Why, then, this private tender of confidence to a few, instead of an open, manly course to all? If, instead of passing the Treasury note bill, in October, a loan had been effected, and a general circular similar to that of 1816 issued, the former would have reduced the foreign exchanges and specie to par, the latter restored confidence, and the banks might very probably have resumed before Christmas. Have we not then, sir, a right to conclude that the Government, to forward some sinister design, perhaps the establishment of a Treasury bank, are opposed in fact to a resumption? Sir, in your search for a better currency, you have rooted out the old principles of Government, doubled our expenses, deranged our currency, overthrown our trade, broken up the exchanges, and upturned the very condition of society; and when the people complain, they are treated with scorn; and, when they answer at the ballot-box, are taunted with bank influence; from that cordon of banks, too, whose potency contributed not a little to the elevation of him who taunts. Sir, it was ungrateful thus

"——to turn his back upon them, Scorning the base degrees by which he did ascend."

Sir, the measures of the Administration having brought us to what we are, we have pressed upon us an untried experiment, of which the bill before us is a material part. A divorce is demanded from all banks. Sir, you wooed them and won them; and, before you ask a divorce, restore them to their purity, and the country to what you found it.

The remedy proposed is a hard money system, aided by Treasury notes, the revenue to be receivable in these only, and kept by the officers of Government, instead of being deposited. I am opposed, sir, to the system, and to every part of it, and to this bill in particular, without which, in my humble judgment, it cannot be sustained. I will vote for any loans or supplies that may be necessary, and I do not desire to embarrass the Government; but the sooner it is brought upon a level with the people, and compelled to take the same kind of money they take, the sooner will it aid the people and the banks in resuming confidence and specie payments; and so long as the Government can obtain Treasury notes it will continue its plan, hostile to the banking and credit system of the country. We had an instance of this, sir, in the call for the special session; the people represented their grievances, and petitioned in vain for such call; but when the Government became reduced to the same condition as the people, the President issued his proclamation. A loan could only be obtained in the currency of the country; and if compelled to resort to this, instead of Treasury notes, the Government would of necessity add their influence and energy to the efforts of the banks and the people to cause a general resumption of specie payments, and a restoration of the community to their former vigor and prosperity. Sir, the Government and the people are one, subject to the same destiny, and must have the same currency: two can no more exist at the same time, than opposite streams or currents of air in the same space. The Government must come down to the system of credit and confidence of the people, or the people must be laced up to the scanty hard money system of the Government. The controversy is between the Government and its system, and the people and their system. Sir, we neither have nor can retain in the country a sufficient amount of specie to carry out the Government plan. The report of the Secretary shows about thirty-five millions in bank; and, as there is but little in circulation, there is probably not over fifty or sixty millions now in the country, instead of seventy or eighty millions, as has been represented. Forty millions has heretofore been the usual amount estimated to be in the country. Suppose, however, we can in future average fifty millions; the Government, its agents, add brokers, will require at least twenty; as much more will be necessary for change and circulation, and you leave only about ten millions as the basis for all bank issues; consequently, you contract our whole circulation to some fifty or sixty millions—about a third or a fourth of its usual and necessary amount; and if you take, as a part of this scheme, the proposition to prohibit the issue of bank bills under the denomination of twenty dollars, you contract the circulation still more.

Gentlemen surely cannot see the evil that would arise from such a measure; they are led away with the minimum five pound and hundred franc notes of the Banks of England and France. Such a measure, if generally adopted, would compel every country bank in the nation to wind up its business; for it is a fact well known, that, whilst the profits of the city banks arise, in a great degree, from their deposites, the country banks look for that object to the extent of their circulation; and if they are not permitted to issue bills of less denomination than twenty dollars, their bills, instead of entering into the general circulation of the community, will go at once into the hands of the large dealers, from them to the city banks, and from them back to the issuers, so that they will be unable to retain a circulation of sufficient amount to be profitable. The people of this country, their habits, and circumstances, are very different from those of England and France, and require a much larger proportion of small money or change; here all have money constantly on hand, to a large or small amount; there millions are always penniless. Besides, England and France are old and rich, possessing an immense amount of solid capital; the wealth of the Indies and the world has been for centuries pouring into their bosom; whilst ours is but a new country, whose capital is her credit, whose wealth the enterprise and intelligence of her sons. Nor is it correct, sir, as has been argued, that the amount of specie as a currency may be increased by our increasing want of the article. Specie is either used as a currency or as an article of merchandise. Its quantum as a currency depends on the laws of trade and commerce, as merchandise on the principle of demand and supply. Increase your demand, that is, pay more for it than it is worth for circulation, and you increase the article as merchandise, but, at the same time, you decrease even the present supply as a currency. You may dam the Mississippi, and thus increase the quantity of water above, but, in so doing, you obstruct the current, and render comparatively useless that increased quantity; and this has been the great and fatal error of the late Administration, in forcing specie into this country to a greater amount than by the laws of trade we are entitled to or could retain. Sir, I desire to see our specie basis enlarged, but upon proper principles, or it becomes as useless as the gold of Midas.

One important effect of the scheme of the Government would be to weaken and eventually to destroy our credit and banking system. By collecting the dues of the Government in specie and Treasury notes only, they become more valuable than paper; and the fact of the Government refusing to take bank notes creates a distrust of their soundness in the public mind; and the people, as far as practicable, will pursue the course of the Government, and refuse them also; or, if they are received, they are paid away as soon as possible, whilst specie is hoarded. Thus the operation of the scheme will be to lessen the issue of bank notes, to return them in bank the sooner, to withdraw from the banks and circulation large amounts of specie, and thus greatly reduce the total amount of currency, and of course materially impair, if not entirely destroy, our whole credit and banking system. Sir, this system is of old standing, and associated with the dearest interests of our country. When the pilgrim fathers sought a refuge here, they brought with them but little gold and silver, and they needed but little; their own right arms supplied their wants; but these wants increased much faster than their means of supplying them, until at length they were compelled to resort to the credit, and eventually to the banking system. And this system, sir, has made us what we are. It sustained our fathers through their colonial dependence and the trying scenes of the Revolution; it raised the Government from bankruptcy and distress to wealth and happiness, cemented the Union, projected and completed our great works of internal improvement, and erected our seminaries of learning and science; and this, sir, is the system which is to be crushed by the proposed experiment. Sir, our whole system, social and political, is one of mutual confidence and credit; and I would warn gentlemen to beware, lest when they wrest from its base a main pillar of that fair fabric, they do not commence an operation that will crumble the whole edifice to ruins, and reduce a free people to a state of barbarism; when all confidence in wealth, or virtue, or human right, will rest in bolts and bars, and all law and order be superseded by the unbridled sway of the sword. Look at the effect of this scheme, sir, upon property; reduce the currency to a third or a fourth, and property and labor are reduced in the same proportion; he who is now in debt but for a third or fourth of his farm will be a bankrupt; and the poor man who now earns a competence, must labor for a shilling; and whilst you thus decrease the value of property and labor, you add three or four fold to the means of the broker, the note shaver, and the man of ready money, and enable them, through forced sales, to become the great landholders of the country—not the powerless rag barons, but the potent hard money barons of the day. You thus make the rich richer and the poor poorer, cramp our currency, paralise our enterprise, impede the march of mind and wither the prosperity of the country; you place the people, as it were, under an exhausted receiver, and then bid them live and flourish. The inconsistent projects of the Government, in first causing an excessive expansion of the currency, and then a contraction to almost nothing, remind one of those theologians who believe that the pains of futurity will consist in being compelled to inhabit some comet, where at one moment the sufferer will be burnt to a cinder in the sun, and at the next frozen to an icicle in the rayless regions of space.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that, with some improvements as to the specie basis, and to prevent the frauds of directors, our credit and banking system is the best that has yet been devised for a free and enterprising people. It is better than the plan of Amsterdam, which has all the evils of a paper money, without any of its benefits; better than the Scotch land-security system, which affords only an irredeemable paper currency. It is no monopoly, for all may become stockholders. Nor do the banks, in fact, trade on the Government money, as has been alleged; it is but a mere exchange of credit and confidence—the banks taking the credits which the Government has, and giving their own credit in place of them; and whether the Government credits consist of paper or specie, it makes but little difference; for, after all, it must rest upon mere confidence somewhere. You cannot individualize the Government, and suppose it to hold its revenue in its right hand; it must place it in bank, or individual deposite, and receive in lieu of it only the credit or confidence in him who takes the deposite. And the objection of an excess of paper money comes with ill grace from those who now propose, by this bill, to add to that excess ten millions of Government paper. Nor does the constitutional objection to the creation or receiving a national currency come with better grace from the friends of this bill. If the Government has the constitutional power to authorize A B (its Treasurer) to issue paper money, it has also the power to authorize A. B and Co. to do the same thing; for if the Constitution gives a power, the mode of its execution is a mere question of expediency. Having, however, no doubts in my own mind on this subject, I leave the parallel cases to those ——"who can a hair divide, Between its north and northwest side."

It is not to be denied, sir, that Government has the abstract right or power to collect its revenue in specie. It may be "well to have a giant's strength, but tyrannous to use it like a giant." I deny the moral right of the Government to abstract from circulation so much specie as will derange the currency. There is a general and a special property in specie, as in the air we breathe, or the stream that irrigates our meadows, or turns our machinery; and the Government, like its citizens, is morally bound by that principle which requires us so to use our own rights as not to impair the rights of others. Unquestionable as the abstract right of the Government is to select its kind of currency, and the mode of its custody, it is not more so than the rights of States, corporations, and individuals, over the same subject: and suppose they, too, were to adopt the Government plan, and receive nothing but specie or their own notes; establish their own independent treasuries, with their vaults, and safes, and iron chests; what a beautiful system of things we should soon have! Every department of society bound up and paralyzed by our own folly, and the whole political and social machine entirely stopped by the forcing of an absurd and antagonistic principle into its every wheel and motion! Why, the mere private deposites alone, according to the late report of the Secretary, amount to $127,397,185; about double our whole amount of specie; and if the depositors were to adopt the Government scheme, and attempt to withdraw this sum from the banks, and place it in their own iron chests, their own independent treasuries, what would become of the golden currency and golden dreams of the Government? And in comparison with the thousands of millions required for the business of the People, what is the twenty or thirty millions of Government revenue, that the former should be deranged to give a security to the latter? A security! No, sir; the most unsafe system for the public revenue ever devised; a system exposed to loss from defaulters, from accident, from robbery, elopement, and from every possible source; and the President but mocks the People with his taunts about the comparative safety of the public vaults, and the security arising from the fact of the whole revenue amounting to only thirty thousand dollars to each receiver and collector; as if the safety of the revenue consisted in the bars and bolts that confined it, and not in the confidence in those who possessed the means to unlock and dissipate the unsunned treasure; or as if a mere arithmetical division, without one in fact, of the public money, would add to its security in New York and other places, where it is amassed in millions!

One objection more, Mr. Chairman, and I have done. The proposed scheme will add immensely to the expense and power of the Federal Government. What may be the object of the Administration is not for me to say; it may be pure and patriotic; but, if so, why keep aloof from the banks and business of the people? Why not lend them your countenance in an open and manly form? Why not repeal the Specie Circular? Why not adopt, at once, the resolutions which have been offered in this House and in the Senate for these objects? Why vote them down by party votes? If the object of the original hostility against the banks and currency was to obtain power, may we not conclude that that is still the object? and that, by lying like an incubus upon the business of the country, and discrediting bank paper, you may crush the State banks, and substitute a grand Treasury bank? And thus, by acquiring the expanding, and contracting, and controlling power of the currency, you have in your hands the entire money power, with all its evils. The bill of October authorized the issue of Treasury notes; this, in effect, authorizes the reissue; but one step more, and you have a regular Treasury bank of issue; and another small supplement, to carry these acts "into effect," and you have the whole—a bank of discount and deposite. Sir, it is idle to tell us that the banking power must be subject to the Government, to prevent the Government being subject to it; such an absurdity was never heard of until the late strife between the Government and the banks. No, sir, let there be a divorce—a divorce of the Government and the money power. So fearful were the statesmen who formed the Constitution on this point, that they prohibited the Senate from originating a money bill, because it exercised a part of the Executive power; but so much have we degenerated, that we now willingly place the whole money power, not with the Senate, but with the President alone; in the hands of one man, whose subaltern officer, daring to be honest, may, according to the doctrine of the day, be stricken down at the moment, and superseded by one who "Will crook the pliant hinges of the knee,

Where thrift will follow fawning."

Sir, the Democracy in which I was nurtured taught me to guard against the consolidation of power in the Federal Government; but the late and present Administrations have, by the spoils of office, the public patronage, the purse and the press, by the prostration of the Senate, the Judiciary, and the people, done more to overthrow the rights of the States, and consolidate all power in the hands of one man, than all other Administrations combined; and yet they claim to be the exclusive Democracy! Sir, our political institutions, I fear, are verging to a fatal crisis; the premonitory symptoms of disease have long been upon us; the collapsed state is fast approaching; the life blood of the Republic is concentrating here, whilst the extremities are languishing, dying. The wheels of Government may still continue in motion, the different departments may seem to perform their proper functions, and we sit here and legislate under the cold forms of the Constitution, and beneath the ample folds of that broad banner which is now floating above us; but virtually the spirit of the Constitution will have departed, the broad stripes and bright stars be blotted out, and but a single gem, the fit emblem of a consolidated Government, emit its dazzling ray to a deluded and degraded people.

REMARKS OF MR. SHIELDS, OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, June 6, 1838—On the bill from the Senate to divide the Territory of Wisconsin, and to establish the Territorial Government of Iowa.

Mr. SHIELDS said that it had formed no part of his expectation whatever to address the House on the subject of this bill, nor did he then intend to attempt any thing like a speech; but being incidentally entitled to the floor,* he would take the occasion to express briefly a few of the reasons that would induse him to vote for the bill on its passage.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. S. provides for the division of Wisconsin Territory, and for the establishment of a separate Territorial Government in Iowa. The object of the bill, he said, was in strict accordance with "safe precedents," and necessary to the welfare of the people in that portion of Wisconsin which lies west of the Mississippi river; and he did not consider the question as to the annexation of Texas, that had been raised on yesterday by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON] at all involved in the success or defeat of this measure, or in any of its provisions. He found, on examination, that as early as the year 1800 the Northwestern Territory (which then comprised all that section of country northwest of the river Ohio, east of the Mississippi, and west of the States of Pennsylvania and New York, to our northern boundary) was divided into two separate Territories. The newly constituted Territory carved out of the then Northwestern Territory was, as is well known, called the Territory of Indiana. (Land Laws, p. 451, sec. 1.) This Territorial Government of Indiana was to go into operation, says the act constituting that Territory, so soon as "satisfactory evidence should be given to the Governor thereof that such was the wish of a majority of the freeholders, notwithstanding there might not be therein five thousand free male inhabitants of the age of twenty-one years and upwards." Here were two Territorial Governments existing at the same time in the same district of country, divided only by an imaginary line, one of them having a population of less than five thousand free males of and above the age of twenty-one years. The Northwestern Territory still continued under a Territorial Government until it was erected into a State in 1803, three years after the division had taken place. (Land Laws, p. 474.) The Indiana Territory was divided, and the Territory of Michigan formed therefrom in 1805. And in 1809 Indiana was again divided, and the separate Territory of Illinois constituted, while Indiana herself was not admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the other States until December, 1816; there being thus two Territorial Governments contiguous to each other for four years, and three of those Governments, under the guardianship of the General Government, in the same relation to each other for the term of seven years. (Land Laws, pp. 514 and 718.) Mr. S. also said it was well known that Wisconsin enjoyed the benefit of a separate Territorial Government for some time before the State of Michigan was admitted into the Union; and the delegate from Wisconsin had his seat here while Michigan was still a Territory. This much he had thought proper to observe in reply to the allegation so frequently made yesterday, that it had not been usual to constitute separate Territorial Governments contiguous to each other in the same section of country; and that few instances had occurred, it had been said, of dividing a Territory, except for the purpose of forming and admitting a State into the Union. The reverse he found to be true. As far as the authority of precedents could go to establish the propriety of the course sought to be pursued by the Government in the proposed measure, he thought it sufficiently ample. The action of the General Government in like cases had been uniform. Whenever it had appeared to be necessary for the happiness, welfare, and convenience of any portion of our citizens residing in distant parts of our Territories, it has been the benign policy of the Federal Government to extend to them the benefits, blessings, and protection of civil government. Indeed, it was necessary for the safety and protection of our right to and possession of the soil itself.

Surely, said Mr. S. a good case had been made out in the present instance. The Territory of Wisconsin embraced one of the most extensive, rich, and fertile sections of country within the limits of the United States, with a population of more than fifty thousand souls. It was something like a thousand miles in length from east to west, and eight hundred in width, comprehending an area equal in extent to that of some three or four of the largest States in the Union. Two-thirds of its inhabitants and the greater portion of its territory lay west of the Mississippi, which was to be the boundary when the proposed division should take place between the new Territory of Iowa and Wisconsin. This river, and the great distance to be travelled over in traversing this country, formed a very considerable barrier to the intercourse of the citizens, and particularly to their association together under one local Government. Much greater were these embarrassments to the citizens of Wisconsin than those of a similar kind which had been encountered in any of the instances he had cited. And the population which was embraced in the proposed Territory was more than triple in numbers to that required in the formation of other Territorial Governments. For his part he did not see how the protection asked for could be withheld without doing manifest injustice to a very considerable and meritorious portion of our fellow-citizens. The chief boast of our Government was, he said, that it meted out even-handed justice to all. As to the objection that it would lead to the more speedy erection of a new State, he did not consider that now properly open to discussion, at least if it be applied to the formation of a State east of the Mississippi. This bill, however, did not propose to change the government in any part of the Wisconsin Territory, or to provide any form for its future government after it shall cease to be under a Territorial Government; it merely gave additional facilities and conveniences to her citizens under the form of Government that now exists there. Every question which is now open will still be open, notwithstanding this bill shall become a law. He conceived the question as to the erection of a State east of the Mississippi out of that part of this Territory which was once included in the Northwestern Territory, as settled, and, indeed, not open for controversy. By the cession act of Virginia, it was conditioned expressly, that the territory so ceded, of which this is a part, should be laid out and formed into States containing a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances would admit; and that the States so formed should be distinct Republican States, &c. (Land Laws, p. 98.) On the 30th December, 1788, the Legislature of Virginia, on the recommendation of Congress, revised their act of cession so far as to empower Congress to make such a division of the said Territory into distinct and Republican States, not more than five nor less than three in number, as the situation of the country and future circumstances might require, and, at the same time, recognising and confirming, as far as their act could do so, the ordinance of Congress of the 13th July, 1787, for the government of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio. (Land Laws, p. 101.) It was also stipulated in the ordinance of Congress, and the act of Virginia above cited, that whenever any of the States (to be formed out of the Northwestern Territory) should have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State should be admitted by its delegates into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and should be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State Government. (Land Laws p. 101.)

These stipulated regulations, he believed, had so far been adhered to. Four States had already been formed out of that Territory, and there was yet remaining a quantity of territory sufficient for another State. It would be time enough to consider the obligations that Congress may be under to admit a new State in that quarter into the Union, when its inhabitants shall present a republican form of government, and show that they have the requisite number of inhabitants. Some of the institutions in the States heretofore formed out of the territory of which he had been speaking, differed very materially from institutions in the South, to which he was more particularly attached. But that question was not involved in the passage of this bill. He considered the people west and east of the Mississippi river, in the Territory of Wisconsin, as standing on a very different footing with regard to this question, which was an argument in favor of the division. So far as the great rights of the people of the different sections of this Union were concerned, he would adhere to the solemn compacts which had been entered into, and plant himself for the defence of those rights on constitutional guaranties. When the people west of the Mississippi shall ask to be admitted into the Union, and a State is to be erected, then the question mooted by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] on yesterday would be proper and open fairly for discussion. Until then, the people of the Territory enjoyed the same rights properly, that we of the South do on that subject. He thought it would be a subject of choice with those interested in the two Governments at the time the State shall seek to be admitted into the Union. He should so regard it. The other question also mooted by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. T.] did not come properly within the scope of this discussion. He meant the question of the annexation of Texas to the Federal Union. He allowed no man to surpass him in zeal, in advocating the propriety of the annexation of that Republic to the United States. He thought we were morally, socially and politically bound to extend the benefits and blessings of our form of government to that gallant people. And the time, he said, was not distant when the refusal to admit that State into the Union would be regarded by all parties, throughout this wide-spread Confederacy, as THE GREAT ERROR of the American people. He would not, however, include this subject into the discussion, but satisfy himself by saying, he was the advocate of the proposed annexation on all suitable occasions.

It seemed to him the provisions of the bill presented strong claims to our favorable consideration, in what point of view soever it might be examined: the vast extent of territory embraced—capable of being framed into several States—exceedingly fertile, with a rapidly increasing population; its population suffering by an almost total destitution of law and order, without which civil society could not safely or long exist. As far as the force of precedent can be recognised in any case, the authority was ample and abundant in the case before us. We were bound by such authority, unless some valid exception were shown to intervene; and as to the other questions to which allusions had been made, they were reserved questions, subject to be decided whenever the question for the admission of any new State into the Union, west of the Mississippi, shall come up for the decision of this House. The act which we were then called on to perform would not alter existing relations, except as to the convenience, safety, and accommodation of a greater number of the people.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

REMARKS OF MR. WILLIAMS,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, Thursday, June 28, 1838—
On the bill to increase the Army.

I am not, said Mr. WILLIAMS, disposed to vote for the bill sent to us by the Senate, proposing to increase the army; nor shall I vote, according to present impressions, for that reported by the committee of the House, unless it is amended in some of its essential features.

In support of this scheme for an augmentation of the army, we have heard doctrines advanced and principles avowed, which, in my judgment, are utterly repugnant to the very nature of our political system. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BRONSON,] in his remarks on yesterday, entirely discredited the services of the militia in war as well as in peace. He stated that the militia could not be relied on at any time; that experience had proved them to be totally useless; and, therefore, it was necessary to supersede the service of the militia by an increase of the regular army.

From these doctrines in regard to the militia, said Mr. W. I beg leave to dissent radically and thoroughly. I deny that the militia are liable to the objections which have been urged; and, in the next place, if the objections are well-founded, it is not the proper way to remove them by an increase of the regular army.

[Here Mr. BRONSON explained, and said "he had not stated any thing to discredit the militia, or to supersede their service by the employment of regular troops," &c.]

Mr. W. said he was sorry to have misunderstood the gentleman from New York; but he still believed that the inference he had drawn was justified by the remarks of the gentleman. That gentleman had said that the militia of New York on the Canada frontier had become infected with the spirit prevalent in that region, and could not be relied on for the enforcement of our neutral duties, and the consequent preservation of peace between the United States and the Government of Great Britain. If the militia are not to be called upon to perform this duty, it was difficult, said Mr. W. to perceive what kind of service they ever could perform. They must be superseded, they must be entirely dispensed with in all future operations of the country, if deemed inadequate to engage in that particular kind of service to which the gentleman has referred, and for which he has said regular troops are especially needed at the present moment. While, therefore, the gentleman from New York has disavowed any intention of discrediting the militia, or superseding them by the employment of regular troops, yet, said Mr. W. the doctrines maintained by the gentleman necessarily lead to such a result; for, if not to be engaged in the service designated by him, they could not possibly be employed in any service whatever.

Now, sir, were these the doctrines and opinions avowed by the founders of the Republican creed in former periods of our history? Most assuredly not. On the contrary, the opinions and precepts of that political school, to which some gentlemen now profess especially to belong, are directly the reverse of what we have heard on the present occasion. Let me read to the committee [said Mr. W.] the sentiments of Mr. Jefferson on this subject; they ought to be commended particularly to the attention of gentlemen who now claim to be his exclusive disciples.

In the inaugural address delivered by Mr. Jefferson on the 4th of March, 1801, he called the attention of the American people to certain leading objects to which the policy of his Administration would be directed. Among these, he stated that "A well disciplined militia was our best reliance in peace, and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority," &c.

On the 8th of December following, in the first annual message to Congress, he says:

"A statement has been formed by the Secretary of War, on mature consideration, of all the posts and stations where garrisons will be expedient, and of the number of men requisite for each garrison. The whole amount is considerably short of the present military establishment. For the surplus no particular use can be pointed out. For defence against invasion their number is as nothing; nor is it conceived needful or safe that a standing army should be kept up in time of peace for that purpose. Uncertain as we must ever be of the particular point in our circumference where an enemy may choose to invade us, the only force which can be ready at every point, and competent to oppose them, is the body of neighboring citizens, as formed into a militia. On these, collected from the parts most convenient, in numbers proportioned to the invading force, it is best to rely, not only to meet the first attack, but, if it threatens to be permanent, to maintain the defence until regulars may be engaged to relieve them."

Such, Mr. Chairman, were the sentiments entertained by that body of men known formerly as the Republican party. To the especial attention, therefore, of the gentleman from New York, and those associated with him, I would commend these doctrines of Mr. Jefferson, as being eminently useful at this time; for they will indicate, as I think, most clearly the course which ought to be pursued by the House in regard to the proposition now before us. If we yield, as we should do, to the influence of the principles which formerly governed the country, we must vote against all projects for increasing the regular army, unless it is absolutely and indispensably necessary to do so.

Now, what, let me ask, said Mr. WILLIAMS, is the necessity for this increase of the army? Are we not in profound peace with all the world, or, at least, with all the civilized world? Nothing appears to the contrary. We are not advised by the Executive that any danger exists of a collision with the Government of Great Britain, on the Canada frontier, or the frontier of the State of Maine. All points respecting the boundary question are to be the subjects of future and further negotiation between the two Governments. A disposition is thus manifested, by both parties, to treat peaceably for the settlement of these matters rather than go to war.

On the Canada frontier there is no more danger of collision than there is on the Northeastern border. There may occasionally be some unlawful and violent movements of individuals in that quarter, but none to involve the two Governments. Indeed, said Mr. W. it may be stated as an incontrovertible truth, that no two nations ever went to war for the licentious and unlawful conduct of their citizens or subjects towards each other, unless the nations were predisposed to engage in hostilities. Whenever the two Governments had exerted themselves to preserve peace, they had been successful; they had always been able to prevent war, and maintain between them the most amicable relations. He took it for granted that the United States had no disposition to go to war with England; on the other hand, England has no disposition to go to war with the United States. Her commercial interest is greatly promoted by trading with this country, and that alone would check any inclination to go to war. But if this consideration should fail, there were other motives which would restrain her. She ought to know, and she will have sagacity enough to perceive, that the first cannon fired in a national war between the two countries will effectually seal the independence of all her Provinces on this continent. The troubles already existing in Canada are sufficiently vexatious and embarrassing to her, without adding to them the weight and the consequence of a war with the United States. In the absence, then, of all other motives, this, of itself, would induce Great Britain to maintain peace with the United States, and not unnecessarily to provoke war, by commencing hostilities on account of the unauthorized and licentious acts of our citizens. These acts will be promptly disavowed by our Government, and the aggressors signally punished, according to the provisions of the law which has lately been passed for enforcing the observance of our neutral duties. Let the courts of justice, the marshals, let all the peace officers, from the President down to the lowest functionary, do their duty, and, my word for it, there will not be the least necessity for a military force of any kind.

But the gentleman from New York has told us that the people of the United States on the borders of Canada are disaffected, and will not yield submission to the laws of their own country; that they were irresistibly inclined to engage in the insurrectionary contest now going on in the neighboring territory, and therefore we must have a military force to restrain our own citizens.

It was difficult for him to believe, said Mr. W. that such evils existed to the extent stated by the gentleman from New York. He could not believe that our citizens were thus disloyal and disaffected towards their own country. Exceptions, no doubt, were to be found of evil-disposed persons who would violate the laws regulating our neutral conduct, in the same manner as they would violate any other law. But these, he must think, were exceptions to the general rule; and while they were to be found, there was, nevertheless, a large majority of the people who were well disposed and peaceable, and who would be determined, at all hazards, to support the laws of their country. Let the offenders, therefore, be arrested, and brought before the courts; let them be tried and punished as the law directs.

I protest, said Mr. W. against this plan of executing the laws at the point of the bayonet. Sir, the laws prescribing and defining our neutral duties have all been passed by the civil authority of the Government, and of course must be executed by the same authority. The military power must never be permitted to interpose for the execution of our laws in the first instance. If the military power should be called upon to execute the laws regulating our neutral duties on the Canada frontier, it may, with the same propriety, be required to execute any other law. If all our laws are to be executed by the military power, then the whole country will be converted into one camp, and martial law will prevail universally throughout the land. Are Gentlemen prepared for this? Are they willing to thus supersede the civil authority altogether, and to introduce in its stead the military power? I hope not. But yet the doctrines relied upon for the support of this bill go to that length. Mr. Jefferson, in his inaugural address from which I have read, lays it down as a fundamental maxim of his political creed, as a tenet of the Republicanism of that day, that "the supremacy of the civil over the military power" was always to be maintained. In the case before us, however, the civil is to be always subordinate to the military power. Not only so, but it is to be entirely superseded by it, and the citizens of the country are to be made the subjects of a military police, which is to act upon and control them in all their operations. No, sir, said Mr. W. I will never assent to these doctrines, nor will my vote ever be given to establish them in practice.

Admitting, for the sake of argument, that some military force is necessary to be employed on the Canada border, the question then arises, what kind of force ought it to be? I answer that it should be the militia, and not the regular army. For this service the militia is the description of force peculiarly fitted and pointed out by the Constitution, by the nature of our Government, and the habits of our people.

The gentleman from New York says the militia on the Canada frontier partake of the spirit which is to be suppressed, and cannot be relied on. But can you not order out the militia from the adjoining States, or from remote parts of the same State? What did General Washington do when it was necessary to put down the whiskey insurrection in Pennsylvania, and the neighboring militia of that State were so disaffected that they could not be relied on? Did he call on Congress for an increase of the regular army, as a substitute for the militia force which could not, or would not, be employed? No, sir. He called out the militia of Virginia and Maryland, and they answered every purpose. Why cannot the same be done now? If the militia of New York cannot be trusted to perform this duty, make a call for the militia of the adjoining States—of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, or of the Eastern States. They, no doubt, will be prompt to obey any call and to execute any duty which may be required of them for preserving the peace of the country. So that, in this aspect of the case, the proposed increase of the army is not necessary. If a military force is to be employed at all, it should be a militia force, and not of regular troops.

We thus see that on the Northern border it is not necessary to employ regular troops. Neither is it necessary on the North-eastern frontier. All the points in controversy respecting the true boundary line of the State of Maine, we are informed, will be the subject of further negotiation between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain. If further negotiation is to be relied on for the settlement of this boundary question, and the removal of all the difficulties growing out of it, every body must admit that it would not only be unnecessary, but impolitic, to station additional troops on the frontier at this time. The proposed increase of the army cannot, therefore, be required on account of the points in controversy respecting the boundary of the State of Maine. Nor is the increase required by any exigencies of the public service on the seaboard. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] told us yesterday, with his characteristic candor and truth, that his part of the seaboard did not want such military defence as is proposed in this bill; that only a few men were required to preserve the forts from decay, and the guns from rusting; and that if, at any time, a greater force was needed for this purpose than regularly stationed there, a few additional laborers might be temporarily engaged, &c. In this way the constant employment of a greater force than was needed might be avoided, and every interest of the public service duly promoted. Now, we all know this view of the subject to be correct, and I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for having submitted it, because he must be regarded by the House as being better able to give evidence on this precise point than any other member. What is true in relation to that part of the seacoast of Massachusetts, is equally true in relation to all other points of our maritime frontier.

The conclusion, then, to which I come, is this: that a large military force is no where wanted to defend and protect our borders, except in Arkansas and Missouri; and, perhaps, in Iowa Territory. There, I admit, from present appearances, it would be prudent to station some regular troops. The Florida war is at an end, or nearly so, and no additional force will be wanted in that Territory. The greater part of the army can be withdrawn from other quarters, and placed in the West, Southwest, and Northwest, to be ready, if occasion should require, to defend Missouri, Arkansas, and Iowa Territory. For this purpose, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. YELL] has estimated that five thousand troops will be required. The army at present is about eight thousand strong; and on the supposition that the estimate of the gentleman from Arkansas is correct, there will still remain three thousand to be disposed of as the exigencies of the service may demand. From these views, it is evident that our army, at this time, is adequate to all the purposes for which an army, in time of peace, can be wanted; that there is not the least necessity for the increase contemplated by the bill before the House.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRONSON] has said that militia are more expensive than regular troops; and therefore, on the score of economy, if nothing else, we should depend upon the latter, and dispense with the services of the former. To this reasoning Mr. W. said he was by no means prepared to subscribe. In the first place, if we are to abolish the militia service because it costs more than the service of regular troops, we should not stop there, but go much deeper into our political system, and object altogether to free Government, because it is more expensive than monarchy. No doubt, Mr. Chairman, you could engage a man to rule over this country, as a monarch of absolute and uncontrolled power, for an expense infinitely less than is required to support our Republican institutions, with all their checks and balances, ordained for the purpose of preserving and perpetuating the liberties of the people. A monarchy or despotism is a very simple kind of Government, and, in this view of the case, very cheap in its Administration. For one or two hundred thousand dollars, or for a much less sum, we might stipulate with many men to govern us absolutely, and thus avoid all expense of supporting a Congress, an Executive Department, with its various branches, and a Judiciary, which every year cost us so many thousands or perhaps millions of money. In this condition, too, we should be freed from all the cares and troubles, and sometimes vexations, which attend us when exercising the rights of self-government. But should we, on this account, abolish our present matchless system of free Government, and substitute a monarchy, because it is not so expensive and is less complicated? I hope not. I do not believe the gentleman from New York intended this; but still his reasoning goes to that extent. The framers of our Constitution doubtless knew what they were doing. They foresaw that the Government which they were constructing would be expensive in its administration; but, notwithstanding this, they were determined to establish it, because in no other way could the liberties of a free people be preserved.

Now, I would no more dispense with the militia because they are expensive, than I would change the Government because it is more expensive than a monarchy. The reason in one case, it seems to me, is just as good as it is in the other. The Constitution itself has given to the militia a certain rank in the Government; it has pointed out certain duties for them to perform; it has declared that these duties belong appropriately to the militia; that it is more safe for a free people to rely upon them than to trust to regular troops, &c. Under these circumstances, it does not become us at the present day to pretend that we have more wisdom than our ancestors, and to declare that all their fears of the danger of standing armies were unfounded and imaginary.

If it should be proved beyond all doubt that the militia were more expensive than regular troops, (Mr. W. said,) he would not be willing to dispense with them, and rely solely on the latter. He would still adhere to the maxims of wisdom promulgated by our ancestors, and maintain that standing armies in time of peace were dangerous to the liberties of a free people, and ought not to be allowed; on the contrary, he should maintain that the militia at all times were the great bulwark and the best defence of any people disposed to preserve and perpetuate their liberties.

But (said Mr. W.) I am unwilling to admit the fact, as stated by the gentleman from New York, to wit: that regular troops are cheaper than the militia. Their services may cost less for the time they are employed, but that is not a correct view of the case; for the regulars, whether employed in active service or not, whether engaged in actual campaigns against an enemy or lying at their ease in garrisons, cost the Government about the same amount of money; whereas the militia, when not in actual service, are discharged, and cost nothing for the time they are at home. Take, for example, a period of five years, during one half or two-thirds of which it is necessary to employ either the militia or regular troops. If you rely upon the latter, you are obliged to engage them for the whole period of five years; but if you rely upon the militia, you may employ them only when their services are wanted, and be relieved from the expense of supporting them at any other time. In this view of the case, it must be evident (said Mr. W.) that the militia are less expensive than the regular army, and therefore the Government ought to depend on the former, and reject the latter, in every series of legislative acts.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BRONSON] had introduced to the notice of the House yesterday an account rendered against the Government by some of the militia lately engaged in the service in the State of Alabama. Mr. W. said he could not tell why this account was exhibited to the view of the House, if it was not for the purpose of discrediting the militia, of throwing upon them some odium, and fortifying the idea that it was cheaper to engage regular troops for our defence and protection. But this account, it appeared, was only a solitary instance, and should not be taken as reflecting any discredit on the general character of the militia. The great question in regard to it which ought to be asked by the House is, "whether the account was paid by the officers at the Treasury, &c. If it was paid, the balance attaches chiefly to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, who had power to arrest it, and by that means to stop the abuse. If the account was rejected at the Treasury, then no harm was done to the public, except as to the example of rendering an improper account against the Government. The officers who rendered or made out the account against the United States might have thought themselves perfectly right and justifiable in doing so; with them it might have been merely an error of judgment, for which they are no more censurable than any other persons who thought they had a claim to payment which they could not legally receive.

But if errors of this kind, whether accidental or designed, are to operate to the prejudice of the militia, the regular army would not be exempt from the same prejudice. With accounts made out against the Government by officers of the regular army, [Mr. W. said,] he had been once very familiar; and, if not more mistaken than he ever was, accounts equally objectionable had been exhibited by those officers against the Government repeatedly. Yet no objection was derived from that fact against the army in general. In the estimation of the friends of the military establishment, such instances were excused, were looked upon as errors of the head, as exceptions to the general rule, and not to be taken as furnishing the basis of a valid objection to the whole army. Mr. W. said he was certain, if the militia are to be condemned in consequence of the exhibition of such accounts, the regular army would be equally condemned, if the accounts they exhibit from time to time could be rigidly scrutinized.

Mr. W. said he had not intended to engage in the discussion of this bill, nor would he have departed from that intention if the gentleman from New York had not avowed doctrines and opinions in support of the measure which he thought required some reply. He had been as brief as he could in stating his reasons for dissenting from the arguments of the gentleman from New York, and he hoped he had not trespassed upon the time or attention of the House. He would conclude by expressing the wish that the bill might be rejected, unless it should be so amended as to remove most, if not all, the well-founded objections to it.

REMARKS OF MR. ROBERTSON, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, Thursday, June 28, 1838—On the bill to Increase the Army.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he would detain the committee but a few moments. He was opposed to the contemplated increase of the army, and still more to the principles upon which that increase was openly advocated. He saw no necessity, indeed, for any augmentation whatever at this time. The Florida war, as it was called, might be considered as at an end. Our relations with Great Britain were essentially pacific. It is true, we had an unsettled question in relation to the Maine boundary; but negotiations were pending, and no one had ventured to place the necessity of augmenting our military force on the ground of an apprehended rupture with Great Britain. Such a ground would not be likely to have the best effect in bringing our negotiations to an amicable close. We are, in truth, sir, (said Mr. R) at peace with the world; and a proposition is now suddenly made to double our military establishment. So far as any addition may be shown to be necessary to protect the Indian frontier, none would hesitate to grant it; but our present establishment, if completed, would comprise probably between seven and eight thousand men, and there is no employment for them any where except on the Indian frontier. Ordinary laborers, or, at most, a few soldiers, are quite sufficient to keep the forts in a state of preservation. Let the whole force, then, except what may be required for that purpose, be withdrawn for the defence of the frontier settlements, so long as there may be indications of hostility in that quarter. This force would be more than sufficient to awe or repel the Indians. The gentleman from Arkansas himself, [Mr. YELL,] does not, if I correctly understood him, ask for more than five thousand troops.

But, sir, we are told of disturbances on the Canada borders, also; and that is the true secret, or rather the avowed ground, on which the increase of the army is urged. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BRONSON] gives us to understand that we are in need of a military police. Yes, sir, we want an army, not to contend with foreign enemies, but to quell the rebellious spirit of our own citizens on the borders of Canada. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] tells us the civil authority cannot or will not restrain the lawless individuals who seem disposed to take part in the Canadian revolt. The civil officers will not arrest, courts and juries will not convict and punish. We must have a standing army, then, in a state of peace, to enforce the execution of our laws against our own citizens. Sir, I look upon this as a dangerous and alarming doctrine, which should be met at the threshold. It seems as if we have forgotten the very elementary principles of free government, and are resolved to break down every barrier erected by our ancestors against despotism. I do not mean to say that the liberty of the country is seriously endangered by the addition now proposed to be made to our military establishment. The danger is in the principle on which that increase is demanded: the precedent of raising and keeping up a standing army in time of peace to enforce the civil authority. Establish this precedent, and you will find yourselves, at no distant day, and before perhaps you suspect your danger, under the dominion of a military despot. The principle itself is the principle of military despotism. In the earlier periods of our history, the States were jealous of standing armies; now, sir, they are petitioners, it seems, for the boon.

The State of New York, with between two and three millions of inhabitants, cannot, it seems, execute the laws without the aid of a military force furnished by the Federal Government. And what, sir, is your army to do? Make war upon those whom, we are told, the courts and juries refuse to punish? No one will go the length of suggesting so monstrous a proposition. Gentlemen say it is wanted for the purpose of arresting those who would violate our neutrality. What, sir, if they fly or resist? Shoot them down; there is no other alternative but to do that, or suffer them to escape. But say they yield, or are captured. What then? Are they to be dragged for trial before a military court? No; they are to be turned over, we are told, to the civil authority. Why, sir, the very pretext for calling in the military is the alleged refusal of the civil authority to act against the offenders. Of what avail is it to bring to trial before a civil tribunal those whom it will instantly discharge? Or will you surround your halls of justice with Prætorian bands, and compel your juries and judges to condemn at the point of the bayonet? Sir, I am unwilling to believe that the great State of New York is unable, by constitutional means, to prevent her citizens from violating the neutrality it becomes us to observe. If, however, she should fail, I admit it is the duty of this Government to interpose. But how, sir? Not by a standing army. The framers of the Constitution contemplated no such recourse. They expressly gave to Congress the power of providing for calling out the militia for the purpose of executing the laws of the Union; and desperate must be the condition of the country when no dependance can be placed either upon the civil authority or the great body of the militia. But the militia now, sir, is the theme of derision, as, indeed, is the Constitution itself. Standing armies only, it seems, can be relied on; and, upon the same principle that they are now required on the borders of Canada, we shall have them, no doubt, in case any discontent shall be manifested at the proceedings of this Government, stationed hereafter upon the borders, or in the interior of the States, to awe them into submission. Sir, disguise it as you will, this attempt to enforce obedience to the civil authority, in time of peace, by means of a standing army; this scheme of what the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BRONSON,] in soft phrase, terms a military police, is a dangerous innovation—a striking and most alarming proof of the rapid decline of Republican principles.

One other question, sir, and I am done. The proposed augmentation of the regular force has been estimated by a gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Bell) as likely to cost three millions of dollars per annum. Is this a time to add this heavy amount to the enormous and extravagant expenditures already authorized, and which greatly, it is thought, exceed our revenue for the current year? Leave out of view the odious purpose which, in part, is avowed as the object of the measure, and the force, I repeat, already authorized under existing laws, is fully adequate to protect the Indian frontier. Sir, if a humane policy be adopted towards the Indians, there will be no occasion for making war them. If they meditate an attack upon our settlements, they are driven on by the irresistible impulse of hunger. We have diminished their hunting grounds, and deprived them, in a measure, of the means of subsistence. The period has arrived, or is at hand, when they can no longer draw the temporary supplies furnished by the Government of the United States. I am authorized, upon high authority to say, that the condition of many of the tribes is such that they must probably perish unless further relief be extended to them. The Governor of Arkansas, from whom I derive my information, is now probably within this Hall; and I feel justified in saying that it is his opinion this relief should be afforded. It is the want of food which makes them restless. It is not in human nature, or at least in that of the untutored savage, to submit patiently to starvation. We have been, perhaps, mainly the cause of their suffering; and I submit it to the consideration of the committee, whether, instead of voting three millions to cut their throats, it it would not be more economical, more just, and more humane, to expend a sixth of the amount in giving them bread. Let us adopt this policy, and then our existing military establishment will be amply sufficient. These are my reasons, sir, for opposing at this time the great and unnecessary augmentation now proposed. So far as respects any anticipated attack by the Indians, or foreign aggressions from any quarter, I believe it to be wholly uncalled for; and I will never consent to raise a single man for the purpose, suggested by the gentleman from New York, of creating what is called a military police, or, more properly speaking, of laying the foundation of a military despotism.

REMARKS OF MR. MARVIN, OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, Thursday, July 5, 1838—

On the bill making appropriations for new harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. MARVIN said he had made several efforts to obtain the floor for the purpose of submitting to the committee some remarks upon the subject now under consideration. I am aware, (said he,) Mr. Chairman, that there is now little time left for debate. Our existence here as a legislative body is drawing rapidly to a close, and we have many important measures yet to act upon. I should not feel myself justifiable now in occupying the time of the committee, were it not for the violent and persevering opposition which has been manifested towards this bill and the bill which passed in this body yesterday, making appropriations for the continuance of the public works on those harbors, &c. already begun. I now promise the committee that I will be brief, while I feel that I have a right to ask their attention to the facts which it is my purpose to adduce. During the debate of yesterday and this evening, almost all the speaking has been in opposition to the bills, and a torrent of eloquence has been expended against the system of harbor and river improvements; and gentlemen have indulged in fancy sketches of the prodigal and wasteful expenditure of the public money in removing obstructions from the mouths of all the little creeks which empty into the lakes. It has been stated here, in debate, that large sums have been expended to remove obstructions from creeks which might be crossed at one step; and I have noticed, during the debate, that the remarks of gentlemen have been mainly directed to the harbors on the lakes; and any one who should listen to the remarks made here would naturally suppose, if he had no previous knowledge on the subject, that untold millions had been expended on these lakes, and that a harbor was in the process of construction at the mouth of every river, creek, streamlet, and inlet which discharges into the lakes, and that these improvements are made, not so much for the benefit, security, and protection of commerce, as for the benefit of speculators. I represent a district, sir, which borders upon the lakes—a constituency deeply interested in the commerce of the upper lakes; and I should be faithless to the trust they have reposed in me, and faithless to my own feelings, were I to remain longer silent, when so great injustice, as I believe, is done to that system, which aims to render safe the navigation of these great inland seas. No gentleman, in these debates upon the bills denominated the "harbor bills," has given the committee an account or statement of the amount of business doing on the lakes; all the remarks which have been made in favor of the bills have been of a general character. And gentlemen may not be aware of the true state of the case, and of the great importance to the country at large of having safe and commodious harbors upon these waters. As to the propriety of the appropriations for the rivers, harbors, and breakwaters along the seacoast and at the South, I profess to have little knowledge. I confine my remarks to the public works on the lakes.

And now, Mr. Chairman, after all you have heard, how many harbors do you suppose there are upon which the United States have expended money, beginning with Lake Champlain, and ending with Lake Michigan, a coast of nearly or quite twenty-five hundred miles? Why, sir, the bill which passed this House yesterday shows the whole number to be twenty-five. It must be borned in mind that there are but very few natural harbors on any of these lakes. Does this look, sir, like building a harbor at the mouth of every little creek? Here is a coast of twenty-five hundred miles in extent, and upon all these lakes a commerce already large and rapidly increasing, and which, but for these artificial harbors, could not be carried on. But, sir, we have heard much of the enormous expense of these harbors. Do gentlemen know that the expense has been? how much the Government has ever expended upon these important national works? Why, sir, we talk here in round numbers, and it seems to be much easier to pronounce millions than thousands; perhaps this is owing to the fact that most of our appropriations are counted in millions instead of thousands, and especially appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities, for the ratification of Indian treaties, the support of the army and navy, &c. But to return to my question, how much has the Government ever expended on the harbors of the lakes? I like to be a little particular when there is so much violent opposition to the "harbor bill," to the system of internal improvement, as many gentlemen choose to call it. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HALL,] who has just taken his seat, has made up his mind to vote against this bill, and he has read to us a statement of the sums expended, within a few years past, on works denominated internal improvements, in which these harbors are included; and, if I understood him correctly, it was over ten millions; but he does not tell us what portion of this amount has been used in the construction of harbors on the Northern and Northwestern lakes. It has occurred to me that these bills have an improper title, or rather an unfortunate title for the poor lake harbors—"an act to provide for certain harbors," &c. Thus the harbors are placed in the fore ground; they are the van guard; and whatever other appropriations the bill may contain, the harbors receive the whole fire of the enemy, and stand the shock of battle, which is waged with so much skill and spirit by our Southern friends, whose mode of warfare, if victory were to perch upon their banner, would forever deprive the noble steamer, the bold ship, schooner, and brig, of a harbor of safety, and leave them and their rich freight, with the thousands of American citizens who have trusted themselves and their fortunes on board, to the mercy of the waves and the winds of a fickle and unsteady climate. They leave no constitutional ground for the harbors to rest upon. All these appropriations, in their estimation, are unconstitutional. I shall not now stop to debate the constitutionality of these appropriations. I have remarked that it is unfortunate for the harbors that the bills containing appropriations for them should be called "the harbor bills," for these bills frequently appropriate large sums for other purposes. And we hear gentlemen continually referring to the "harbor bill" as containing an appropriation of a million and a half; and when these bills are under discussion, our ears are continually dinned with harbor! harbor! harbor! on the little fresh water ponds of the North and Northwest! And all the peals and changes are rung upon the word of which it is susceptible. Under these circumstances, I am unwilling that the impression should go abroad that large sums have been improperly expended in constructing harbors on the lakes. And if I can help it, they shall not bear all the odium which some gentlemen attach to all the appropriations contained in what is called the "harbor bill."

I have taken the trouble, sir, to ascertain from an official source the exact amount which has ever been expended in the construction of harbors upon all the Northern and Northwestern lakes, and the whole amount is only a fraction over one million six hundred thousand dollars. Sir, I will not institute a comparison between the sums expended on this extensive Northern and Northwestern frontier and other sections of the Union. The commercial power of this country is under the control of this Government. One of the most important duties imposed upon the Government of the United States is the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; and this power to regulate commerce is coextensive with the jurisdiction of the entire Union, and I maintain that the obligation on the part of the United States to protect the commerce of Ohio, of Michigan, or Illinois, is as strong as it is to protect the commerce of any of the Atlantic States. By undertaking to institute a comparison of expenditures, for the purpose of ascertaining in what section of the country, or in what State, the largest appropriations have been made, without regarding the wants of commerce, you descend from that elevated position which a statesman and a patriot should ever occupy, who looks upon the whole country as one and united for the purposes of war and defence, and for the purposes of commerce. But, sir, I will ask the question, when and where has there ever been the sum of $1,600,000 expended by this Government which has produced a greater amount of good, which has yielded a richer harvest, than the sixteen hundred thousand dollars which have been appropriated and expended in the construction of these harbors? I have not examined particularly, and therefore cannot state the amount which has been expended on a single work, the Delaware breakwater; but, I believe, I should not greatly err by presuming that as much has been expended on that work alone as all that has been expended for all the harbors on the lakes. I trust, sir, that we shall hear no more of the enormous sums of public money which have been squandered on the harbors. Even the bill which passed the House yesterday, and was sent to the Senate, and which was called so emphatically the "harbor bill," and which contained appropriations, as has been proclaimed on this floor a score of times, of a million and a half of dollars, contained only between five and six hundred thousand dollars for all the harbors on the lakes; and I believe that this is much the largest appropriation which has ever been made for them in any one year.

Mr. Chairman, these lakes constitute the boundary between this country and the country of a foreign Government; they are upon our border; they extend into the interior of the continent to within a hundred or a hundred and fifty miles of the Upper Mississippi, and their waves wash the shores of seven States of this Union, and a Territory which will soon be knocking at your doors for admission. The commerce of a wide-spread, rich, and fertile country is carried on by means of the vessels which navigate the inland seas. Are gentlemen aware of the amount of commerce on the upper lakes? Have they considered the amount of business annually transacted on Lake Erie? Have they watched the enlargement of this commerce from year to year? I apprehend not. The increase of business on the upper lakes has, indeed, astonished those who are and have been many years engaged in it.

Major Brown, an able and efficient officer belonging to the Civil Engineer Corps, and who has the general superintendence of the construction of several harbors on Lake Erie, stated in his report made last fall to the Engineer Department, and which may be found in the Executive documents communicated to Congress, that there were fifty steamboats on Lake Erie alone, and that there were eleven then building on the stocks, which would be launched and ready for business this season. He states that there are about two hundred and fifty other craft, consisting of brigs, ships, and schooners, and that the whole tonnage of the steamboats and vessels exceeds 32,000 tons.

To give some idea of the amount of business, he calculates that the steamboats make a voyage, on an average, once a week, and the other vessels average a voyage in two weeks. Allowing six months for the season of navigation, and from these data, I have calculated the amount of the tonnage for the season at over 400,000 tons. Now, sir, this commerce could not be conducted without harbors. The dangers and risks of navigation would be so great as almost entirely to prohibit the use of the lake for commercial purposes. With an ironbound shore along its southern border, extending in a northeasterly and southwesterly direction, it receives the full force of the winds and waves, which generally come from the west or the northwest. These storms are often sudden and violent, and it would be impossible for a vessel to avoid going ashore if there were no havens of safety to which they might flee. It is a singular fact that there are no natural harbors on the southern shore of the lake, unless Sandusky be an exception. All the rivers where valuable harbors have been made, had, in their natural state, obstructions at their mouths, sandbars which required to be removed. It was necessary to cut across the sandbar, and to confine the discharge of the water between piers or jetties extended into the lake to a sufficient depth of water. The river being thus confined and conducted between the piers into the lake, keeps the channel open; and thus, at a trifling expense compared with their importance, safe and convenient harbors are formed.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] in his animadversions upon the system of constructing harbors, mentioned Cleveland among other cases where harbors had been constructed at the mouths of small streams, or creeks, as he called them. Why, sir, has the gentleman ever been at Cleveland? Previous to the removal of the bar at the mouth of the Cuyahoga, and the erection of piers, no vessel suitable for the lake commerce could enter the river, and there was no more safety for a vessel there than at any other point. Let the gentleman now go to Cleveland, and I will venture to predict that, at the moment I am now speaking, the river for half a mile is filled with vessels and steamboats of various sizes, discharging and receiving freights; passengers are leaving the proud steamer that has just arrived, whilst others are stepping aboard, some bound to Chicago, and thence to St. Louis, or the Rocky Mountains, others for Buffalo, on their way to the Atlantic cities, where it is not unconstitutional to protect commerce. He will see travellers from all parts of the world. He will be welcomed to one of the most beautiful and flourishing cities on the West. He will find her citizens as intelligent, as enterprising, and as hospitable, as can be found any where. He will find them all busy, all employed, and he may then witness something of the commercial resources of a State which scarce twenty years ago was only sufficiently populous to be entitled to an admission into the Union, now with a population of one million six hundred thousand, with cities and villages and towns rivalling those in many of the older States of the Union. Why, sir, is it not as much the duty of this Government to construct harbors for the safety and convenience of the commerce of such a people, situated in the interior far from the seaboard, as it is for the commerce upon the "high seas?" But, sir, I remarked that there were no natural harbors upon the southern shore of the lake; that they all require to be improved before they can be used. And is it not important for national defence, is it not absolutely necessary, that there be safe harbors constructed for the protection of our people and their property in time of war? There was a time when the fate of the whole Western country might have depended upon the existence of one good harbor upon the southern shore of Lake Erie. Are you aware, sir, that there was a time when the whole enterprise of Perry might have been defeated by a single gunboat of the enemy? His fleet was built with wonderful despatch at Presque Isle, or what is now called Erie harbor, a splendid bay formed by a point of land projecting into the lake, and then running for a mile or more nearly parallel to the shore.

The entrance into this beautiful bay was obstructed by a sand bar, over which the ships could not be floated after receiving their guns and equipments. It was, therefore, necessary, as I have been informed, to float them out over the bar into the lake, when they received their guns and equipments from scow boats. Had the enemy approached the fleet at this time with a single armed vessel, we should never have heard of Perry's victory, and one of the most signal and glorious achievements of the last war would not have been recorded upon the pages of American history. This bay is now made accessible for steamers and ships of the largest class which float upon the lakes, simply by the erection of piers or breakwaters across the mouth of the bay, leaving a channel sufficiently wide for the purposes of navigation. And any fleet which it may be hereafter necessary to keep upon the lake for the protection of our commerce and our country may enter this bay, and there ride at anchor with perfect security. Notwithstanding all the benefits which have already resulted to the country from this system of harbor improvements, and the small sums which have been expended, the cry is continually raised against it, and these appropriations are represented as enormous, as a prodigal and wasteful expenditure of the public money. Why, sir, there has been more property lost within three years past upon Lake Michigan for the want of harbors of refuge, to which vessels might flee from the storms, than would suffice to construct all the harbors upon that lake provided for in this bill. There is not now a single port into which vessels can enter in a storm from Green Bay to Chicago, a distance of some two hundred miles. Many vessels have been driven ashore and made perfect wrecks, while others have gone to the bottom with all on board. The whole country is rapidly filling up with a hardy, intelligent, and industrious population, the sons and brothers of our constituents; and do you think that they will remain satisfied that their commerce, their property, and their lives, shall remain subject to such perils? Will they submit to the enormous insurance which they are now obliged to pay upon all the goods which they necessarily import from the East?

But many gentlemen seem to have no adequate conception of the amount and importance of the business on the upper lakes. I wish they would accompany me to Buffalo, one of the finest cities in the United States, where the Erie canal communicates with the lake. The harbor of Buffalo is formed of one of those creeks so often alluded to in this debate. Go there, sir, and you will find this creek for nearly a mile covered with steamers, ships, schooners, and brigs, sending up a forest of masts; some are receiving freight for places in Kentucky, and for other places at the distance of more than a thousand miles. Buffalo is the head or centre of the principal part of the commerce on the upper lakes, and this immense business could not be done at all, were it not for the construction of the harbor. Why, sir, this harbor is itself worth more to the United States than the whole sum which has been expended upon all the harbors on the Northern and Northwestern lakes. Without it, a great portion of the business would never have existed, and should it be destroyed, business would in a great measure be suspended.

Mr. Chairman, comparisons have been instituted to show in what sections of the Union the largest amount of money has been appropriated; and New York, with her forty members, is often alluded to, as though it were an important part of our business here to procure for the State we represent large appropriations out of the public Treasury. Sir, I shall not stop to institute any such comparison or inquiry. But how is the State of New York situated? What is her relative position in the United States? She is situated upon the frontier; her territory extends from the Atlantic to the lakes, and all the expenditures which the General Government has ever made within her limits have been as well for the interests of other States as her own. Have not Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, &c. &c. as deep an interest in having a safe and convenient harbor at Buffalo as any part of the State of New York? Sir, New York does not ask of the General Government to aid her in the construction of her canals, her railroads, her splendid works of internal improvement. All that this Government has ever expended there has been upon the harbors and the light houses along her border and in the Hudson river. And, sir, what are the facts in relation to the Hudson? It is a river of tide water. All the expenditures of the General Government have been made where the tide ebbs and flows. It is a river or an arm of the sea, over which your own Supreme Court have decided that the United States, under the power to regulate commerce, have exclusive jurisdiction. It is a river on which more or less of the commerce of half the States in this Union is conducted; And now, sir, how much do you suppose the United States have ever appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of this valuable and important river? Gentlemen from the South complain that this system of internal improvement is very unequal, and that the South does not receive her just proportion of the public appropriations.

The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. MARTIN,] in his remarks yesterday upon the bill making appropriations for the continuance of the public works, informed us that six hundred thousand dollars had been appropriated and expended to remove the obstructions at the Muscle shoals, in Tennessee river, in the State of Alabama, and the gentleman made a strong and able effort in support of his amendment to the bill to procure a large additional appropriation. I inquired at the time of one of my colleagues near me, who represents a district upon the Hudson, the amount that had ever been appropriated for the removal of obstructions in that river, and he informed me that the whole amount was two hundred and seventy thousand dollars. I have nothing, sir, to say against the expenditure of six hundred thousand dollars at the Muscle shoals; nor have I any thing to say of the large sums which have been annually expended for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Mississippi, the Ohio, Red river, Arkansas, and other rivers which discharge their waters South, except that I believe these expenditures have been generally judicious, and have been productive of great good to the country as a whole. The improvements in these rivers have been of a national character—such as to affect beneficially the interests of States; and, as an American citizen, as a New Yorker, if you please, I rejoice in the prosperity of the whole country, which has been so largely benefitted by these river improvements. But when the finger is pointed invidiously at New York as participating too largely in the appropriations of public money, I will defend her. I will show you, sir, that she comes not here a beggar. She has expended some fifteen or sixteen millions upon her canals, and she is not yet wearied or exhausted in the great work of internal improvement. She is now prosecuting with vigor two new canals—one of them over a hundred miles in extent, connecting her Erie canal with the Alleghany river, which discharges its waters through the Mississippi into the Mexican Gulf. She has decreed that her Erie canal, which connects the tide waters of the Atlantic with the upper lakes, shall be greatly enlarged, and at an expense of twelve or fifteen millions of dollars; and, during the recent session of her Legislature, four millions have been appropriated for the present year for that purpose. And for whose benefit is this enlargement? Is it not for the accommodation of our sister States west of us—for that whole country lying upon the upper lakes? Surely it is, that they may have an easy access to the best markets upon the Atlantic, and exchange the productions of their industry for the productions of other States and other climes—for the cotton of the South, manufactured in the workshops of the Eastern States. The States of the Union are so situated that they are mutually dependent upon each other; and whatever is done to facilitate and render safe and easy commercial intercourse between them, serves to enhance the comforts, conveniences, and luxuries of life, and ameliorates the condition of the great body of the people.

Sir, I trust that the motion to strike out the enacting clause of this bill will not prevail, and that the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, providing, among other things, for the improvement of the navigation of the Alleghany river between Pittsburg and Olean, will be adopted, and that the bill, when so amended, will receive the sanction of the committee.

REMARKS OF MR. DAVIS, OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In Senate, March 8, 1838—Upon Mr. PRESTON'S amendment proposing to receive the bills of non-specie-paying banks.

Mr. RIVES's amendment to the Sub-Treasury bill being under consideration, Mr. PRESTON proposed several distinct amendments, and among them one to receive the bills of non-specie-paying banks for a limited time; upon which

Mr. DAVIS remarked that the Senator (Mr. PRESTON) had proposed several amendments to the bill, and a discussion had arisen upon one which was not under consideration. He would, he said, follow the example of others, and throw out suggestions, though not strictly in order, upon that amendment. The proposition was to take the bills of non-specie-paying banks for a limited time in payment of the revenues. Mr. D. said he could not see his way clear to sustain this measure. The reasoning in favor of it was plausible, and forced itself upon the mind with considerable energy in the present state of things. It would, doubtless, aid the banks in resuming their duties; but, said he, I cannot feel at liberty to yield to that argument, for there is involved in the matter a very important principle; it legalizes irredeemable paper.

Let us look at the facts as they are. The resolution of 1816, authorizing the reception of the notes of specie-paying banks, is now in force; and there is another law requiring the Treasury to pay to public creditors specie. It is, I know, perfectly competent for Congress to alter or repeal these laws.

Now, sir, what has been the practice under these laws? To enforce the first, and disregard the last. To compel us to pay taxes in specie, while creditors have mostly been paid in paper of non-specie-paying banks, and, in some instances, in worthless paper of that kind. There can be no mistake about this matter. Even the postage on all letters is exacted in hard money, while the rights of creditors have been very much disregarded. The Secretary of the Treasury concedes that such has been the practice, and how many can now testify that they hold the paper of the broken Commonwealth Bank because all other money was refused to them?

Sir, I have before me evidence both from the Secretary and other sources, which I am not at liberty to doubt, which shows what the practice has been.

The Secretary estimated that $220,000 would be necessary to pay off debenture certificates, pensioners, and bounties to fishermen, at Boston, for the last quarter. On looking over the account he gives us of this matter, we might conclude that he had made provision for the payment mostly in specie, but a more careful analysis will bring us to quite different results. The provision actually made by remittances to the Commonwealth Bank was about $160,000 in Treasury notes; a draft on a deposite bank (doubtless the Commonwealth Bank) for about $42,000, and the sum of $16,000 in specie, which was transferred from New York, and that is the whole amount of specie provided. Whether any at all was paid out is uncertain, for I have heard of none.

How far payments were made in Treasury notes does not appear, but I have information which declares that the individuals applying for bounties and pensions could obtain nothing but bills at the Commonwealth Bank.

Sir, I have letters before me which assert that the bounties to fishermen in Marblehead, for the year past, amounted to about $20,000; that the fishermen had usually received their demands in checks from the collector of Boston, and many of these checks had been received as cash at the Marblehead Bank, and passed to the credit of the fishermen; that the president of that bank, a little antecedent to the payment of those bounties, called at the custom-house and inquired what would be paid to satisfy those bounties; and was answered, bills, and bills only, at the Commonwealth Bank; and that he immediately gave notice that he should not receive the checks on deposite at the Marblehead Bank, for they were unwilling to receive such paper as would be paid at the Commonwealth Bank. The fishermen were therefore obliged to present their checks at Boston, and what kind of money many of them got the Senate has already been informed.

Sir, what do these and other facts, against which we cannot shut our eyes, prove? That the Government itself, like the banks, has ceased to redeem its promises, and to obey the law which requires it to pay specie. It is worse than the banks, for it exacts specie and pays out paper. The apology for paying out paper is, that men voluntarily take it. Do they? It is in vain to tell me, when men, pressed for the want of money, demanding both specie and Treasury notes in preference to bank paper, take it because they can get nothing else, that they receive it voluntarily. They are compelled to take it because their necessities will not permit of delay, and it is scoffing at them to say it is done voluntarily. The Senator on my left [Mr. BUCHANAN] says there is a wide difference between Treasury notes and the common paper currency; but what is the real difference? One is payable on time, the other on demand. This is all. The Government issues notes on time because it cannot redeem them on demand; the banks, for some time past, have issued notes in form, payable on demand, but every one who receives them knows that, at present, they are not to be paid in specie on demand, but doubtless will be soon. In each case the holder has a promise to pay—a bond, if you choose so to call it—which is esteemed good, but neither the Government nor the banks are good for the specie at present, because neither can pay it. All we have in either case is a satisfactory security, and I cannot perceive that the time named for payment changes its essential character. The Government does as much send out inconvertible paper as the banks—it is designed as a currency. It is issued on time, because it cannot be paid on demand, for the plainest of all reasons—the Government has not the funds to do it. The case of the banks is no stronger. I can see no important difference between the condition of the banks and the Government; and the censure heaped so lavishly upon the one falls necessarily with equal force on the other.

But all this is not much to the point, for we are aiming to make the currency better. The Senator from Carolina wishes to encourage this by receiving for a time the notes of non-specie paying banks. This, I am aware, would make the banks and the Executive more equal. But although we authorize the circulation of inconvertible Government paper, and although the Executive does pay out to creditors the bills of non-specie paying banks contrary to law, yet I would reluctantly sanction it as currency by legalizing it. It would be a dangerous precedent, which I should greatly fear might be abused in future legislation. In pressing emergencies the mind is extremely prone to yield itself to the guidance of even pernicious precedents; at present the public feeling is extremely sensitive on the subject of irredeemable paper, and I am anxious to keep that just feeling alive. It is the greatest safe guard against indiscreet legislation which can exist; and will, if it is not undermined, be at all times a specific against a spurious currency.

The policy of such a measure cannot be otherwise than doubtful. But let us look at it practically. What is the foundation of the credit of a bank? It rests on the fact that it redeems its paper at sight. This raises such a presumption in its favor, that its paper is ordinarily in good credit. On the other hand, if it fails to redeem its paper, the presumption is exactly the other way, and no one will receive its paper without evidence of its ability to pay, and some explanatory reason for its failure to fulfil its promises. Nothing, therefore, can be more obvious than that the great element of credit is a prompt fulfilment of the promise to redeem.

If we agree to receive the notes of non-specie paying banks for revenue, how is it possible we can ascertain the condition of the eight hundred banks, so as to be satisfied of safety in receiving their bills? What kind of investigation can we institute? What means or power have we to reach any thing like a prudent or satisfactory result? I confess I see no way. If they pay specie, then the presumption is in their favor; if not, it is against them. Suppose, then, we receive all paper which circulates for a time; it is plain that weak banks will throw out all they can, and make their circulation large. Such paper is always abundant, and is just that which business men never like to keep on hand, but crowd it off as fast as possible. This is the very money which would find its way into the Treasury in payment of revenue, for the collectors would have no discretion to refuse it. I fear, sir, we should not only set a bad example by sustaining unsound banks, but should greatly suffer by it.

The only recommendation of the measure is, that it will aid the banks to resume specie payments. I cannot deny that it would have that tendency, but that would ill requite us for the evils it would bring with it.

Two things are necessary to a resumption of specie payments. First, public confidence, which gives the banks credit—that much abused thing, credit, which alone can give currency to paper. It is utterly vain for the banks to attempt to do business, if they must keep an amount of specie in their vaults, dollar for dollar, equal to the amount of paper issued. They cannot, under such circumstances, do business without loss. Without public confidence to such an extent as to keep their paper in circulation, they cannot go on at all, nor can they resume and do business till it is restored.

Secondly. Since the Bank of the United States ceased to issue paper, we have had no currency of uniform value in all parts of the country, and with which balances between places in trade could be paid, except specie. The drawing of specie from the banks in one part of the country, and transferring it to another, has just the effect upon the public that a run of banks upon one another has. It deranges business, cripples the banks, destroys their usefulness, and has, with the help of other causes, brought us where we are, and tends strongly to keep us there; because the want of uniformity in currency will always disturb public confidence. The future condition of things will depend on this. If the banks can be left to pursue their way, they will maintain their credit; but if they resume now, and the specie in their vaults some months hence should be required to pay debts in Europe, they would, in self defence, be obliged again to suspend. You may talk as much as you please of the state of exchange with foreign countries. Even if it be below par, it is so because you have no business, and this only proves that one obstacle, the necessity for the transportation of specie in that direction, is for the present removed. If there be no business, there can be no occasion for specie or exchange abroad. But something more is necessary—confidence at home, and a currency in which debts can be paid here in all parts of the country. If we can find nothing but specie which will answer, that, of course, must be kept in motion, and we can have no regular business, no settled state of things; for transferring it from place to place disturbs both the banks and business. We need a paper that has general credit, here and abroad; a paper in which balances between places, remote as well as near to each other, may be paid off without disturbing the specie. Such a paper was afforded by the Bank of the United States, either in notes or bills of exchange, and we see what a state of things the absence of it produces.

But as we have not, and cannot at present have, the benefit of such a circulation, we ought to resort to the next best measures.

If the Government would cease its hostility to the banks, and would receive and treat as circulation the bills of sound specie paying banks; in a word, if it would, in good faith, give the banks its confidence and countenance, it is my sincere conviction that they would at once find themselves able to resume; but they cannot resist the adverse power of the Government. Sir, I cannot doubt that, if the Government would give its support to the proposal of Mr. RIVES, the banks would at once resume, and business would be revived.

But how long things would thus continue, would depend on events which cannot be foreseen. I much fear another suspension, whenever a monetary pressure shall come, or we shall run largely into debt abroad. Any thing that shall set specie in motion, by raising its value above paper, will prove a very disturbing cause. Our present purpose is, however, to get back to specie payments; and believing, as I do, that the Senator's plan will as readily bring that event about as to legalize the reception of irredeemable paper, I much prefer it.

The disturbing cause of which I speak must necessarily recur so often as the course of trade shall create heavy drafts on the banks for specie. This will derange both the currency and business. We need, and have always used, a much greater capital in business than the specie in the country. Of late, the loans of banks alone have amounted to about five hundred millions, while the specie has not probably (with extraordinary efforts to import and retain it) ever exceeded about eighty millions.

Our business, therefore, demands paper, both for its aliment and to preserve it from those disastrous fluctuations arising from the motion of specie. Little occasion would be found for the transportation of specie, if we had some institution, issuing paper in the form of bills of exchange, or any form convenient for commerce, that should have a firm, undoubted credit at home and in foreign countries. While we are without this, we must have periods of a disturbed currency, of great depression in business. We must be visted by severe calamities, in the struggle to pay off balances between commercial places. We have seen recently exchange between New York and Boston and New York and Philadelphia at from two to three per cent. advance. This, doubtless, was because these cities were indebted to New York, and there was no medium of like value in them all. Mr. President, for these reasons, while I am most anxious for the resumption of specie payments, I cannot vote for this measure.

[Mr. NILES argued with much earnestness against the reception of the irredeemable paper of the banks by the Government. He insisted that the state of things was now as formerly, the Government having proceeded in a direct and consistent manner. He expressed his surprise at the sentiments expressed by Mr. DAVIS, coming as they did from a gentleman of so much sense and experience. He insisted that produce was the only proper and sufficient medium of exchange with foreign countries; there could be no need of bills or specie for that purpose.]

Mr. DAVIS said he knew very well that he and the Senator from Connecticut differed in many matters, but he was somewhat surprised that the Senator's zeal should so much outtravel his judgment as to lead him to a contest with those who proposed to vote with him.

Mr. D. said he was astonished that the Senator should charge him with inaccuracy, and, to prove it, allege that things had undergone no change, but remained as they had been before the Administration came into power. Could the Senator be serious in saying the Treasury order did not interfere with the currency? He would refute the declarations of the Administration again and again made, that it had had great influence, and produced great effects. If he will look at it, he will see on the very face of it that it was issued to suppress bank credits and bank issues. It was designed to discourage trade, and both Presidents boasted officially that it had accomplished its purposes. It required the revenue from lands to be collected in specie, while that from customs was left to be collected in bills. What assurance had we that imports would not be included in a like order? The Administration claimed that they had interfered with the currency, and the business of the country. It contended, and, I suppose, now contends, that the panacea for all political evils was, and now is, an exclusive metallic currency. Now, when the Administration adopts a measure designed to work a change in the currency, and claims that it has done it, will the Senator declare here that there has been no interference? Will he say there has been no change? No distress? Sir, if what the Senator sees and hears will not convince him that there has been change and interference, and that there is distress, no argument addressed by me to him will work conviction. Sir, the Senator has spoken hastily, and is mistaken.

Mr D. said that the Senator had contended we needed no currency to pay off balances in the course of trade, for they were paid in produce. What is this but contending that there are no balances? If produce pays all, then there are no balances to be adjusted; for by balances we mean precisely what is left unpaid by the interchange of trade in products.

The Senator's argument proves too much; for if all debts can be paid with produce, then we have no occasion for money; we neither want nor need it. I am sure he is a little too well versed in business to seriously attempt to maintain this ground. We all feel too often the want of money to contend that we have any produce to supply its place.

SPEECH OF MR. UNDERWOOD, OF KENTUCKY,

In the House of Representatives, Wednesday, April 18, 1838.

The House having under consideration the proposition of Mr. UNDERWOOD, to recommit the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road, with instructions to report a bill in lieu thereof, ceding the same to the States through which it passes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that, in submitting the proposition before the House, he had not been influenced by the belief that Congress had no constitutional power to make roads through the States. He entertained no such opinion. On the contrary, he thought it demonstrable that Congress might constitutionally construct roads, with or without the consent of the States, through their territories, for national purposes. He had been, and yet was, in favor of appropriations by Congress for the improvement of the country, provided a system can be adopted which shall do justice to every section, and allow every State to participate in proportion to its federal numbers. There may be objects of such transcendent importance as to claim appropriations for their accomplishment, and which would justify Congress in making them; although the States might not participate in the benefit according to the rule prescribed. Such objects constitute exceptions to the general rule, and may be placed above other works, on account of their great advantages to the nation at large; although some States would derive greater benefits than others from their construction. Such, for example, is the contemplated ship canal around the falls of Niagara, and the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to Pittsburg. While, therefore, (said Mr. U.) I reserve the right to make exceptions, I am ready now to declare ceaseless hostility to all further appropriations for works which, being destitute of great national importance, are chiefly beneficial to the States in which they are located. Yes, sir, I will make war upon such appropriations until favoritism and partiality receive their death blow, or justice is compelled to retreat before political intrigues, to give up the unavailing contest, and to seek a melancholy safety in obscurity and retirement.

The extension of the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, presents, to my mind, no objects of transcendent importance which should give it the preference over all other roads in the country, and make it a national bantling to be taken to our bosoms, and nourished from the general Treasury, while we treat with cold indifference and neglect the roads of Tennessee, Kentucky, and other States. As a military road, it will never be extensively used. Troops and munitions of war will find a more rapid and much cheaper conveyance to points on the frontiers where needed, by steamboats upon the Ohio, the Mississippi, and their tributary streams, and upon the lakes of the North. When transportation by water necessarily ceases from ice, the severity of the weather will likewise suspend military operations. As a commercial road, it is even less important. Look at the map of the United States. You may trace at a glance the great natural avenues of commerce in our rivers and lakes. So far as we are dependent upon art for facilities in aid of trade, the canals constructed and constructing are by far the most important auxiliaries. Land carriage cannot compete with that by water. Besides, the Cumberland road, in its contemplated extension through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, runs nearly east and west, though an agricultural country, producing the same marketable commodities. The similarity of climate and soil throughout the country bordering on the road must always prevent uniformity in the character of the produce raised by the people for market. Their productions will generally find the best market in the South. Water carriage alone will enable the farmer and mechanic to carry heavy, inanimate articles to a distant market. For getting live stock to market, one or more roads through Kentucky and Tennessee would be vastly more serviceable to the people of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, than the extension of the Cumberland road. To and from the points where this road intersects the canals which connect the Ohio river with the lakes, and where it crosses navigable streams, there may, and probably will be much carrying of produce and merchandise in wagons. To this extent the road will aid commercial operations; but such aid will be very inconsiderable when compared with the immense amount of business and property passing on the canals and rivers from north to south, and from south to north. The road, in a national point of view, will be valuable mostly on account of its facilitating and cheapening the transportation of the mails. But in that respect there are hundreds of other roads in the United States, having at least equal claims to the attention of Congress. In what ever aspect I have looked at it, whether military, commercial, or as aiding the transportation of the mails, I do not perceive any good reason for expending million after million in the construction of this road, while no aid is afforded in making other roads of equal, if not greater importance. The contemplated railroads from Boston to the Hudson, from New York city to Lake Erie, from Baltimore to the Ohio, from Charleston to Cincinnati, from New Orleans to Nashville, do, in my opinion, far transcend in importance the extension of the Cumberland road; and yet we hear not a whisper in behalf of appropriations to these, while, year after year, a deafening clamor is raised of, Give, give, give, to the latter! Sir, I would not fear to institute a comparison between the Maysville road and its extension through Kentucky to Nashville, Tennessee, and the Cumberland road and its extension to the Mississippi river at Alton or St. Louis. Indeed, Congress, at one time, thought so highly of the Maysville road as to make an appropriation to aid its construction. At that time it was hoped and believed, by the friends of internal improvement, that Congress designed the execution of a general system, and that in due time every part of the country would receive its share of the refreshing influences of opening the National Treasury to aid in making roads and canals. But there came a blight upon the hopes of patriots and statesmen. A chilling veto arrested the Maysville road appropriation, and struck down all hope of executing any general system; and, from that time to this, immense sums have been appropriated for internal improvements, not with the view to execute any general plan, but under a partial, contracted, unintelligible system, the creature of Executive dictation and misrule, by which thousands upon thousands have been lavished upon rivers and roads in some parts of the country, and not a dollar allowed to other rivers and roads equally deserving in every respect.

A late memorable debate in the Senate has recalled public attention to the leading men and measures of Government in regard to internal improvements shortly after the end of the last war with Great Britain. Mr. Calhoun then presented to the nation a magnificent scheme, broad enough to comprehend all the States. He, moreover, proposed to provide and set apart a fund for internal improvements. Congress, at the instance of Mr. Pickering, of Massachusetts, decided in favor of expending the fund in the several States in proportion to their federal numbers. In these proceedings the nation saw a spirit of liberal justice. The people of every State had a right to expect aid from the General Government in the construction of those works most deeply interesting to them. But, sir, the arm of the late President was put forth, and the system upon which the people had placed their hearts, and their fondly cherished expectations, were prostrated by his power. Instead of indignant resistance to his mandates, the interests of party and the selfishness of politicians brought about a tame submission to his will; and men might be pointed at who glorified General Jackson for the appropriation to the Maysville road, before the veto; and who, as soon as the veto was promulgated, faced to the right about, and glorified louder and longer than ever! The general system by these means was destroyed. It is now defunct. In its place we have a partial and unintelligible system, if system it can be called, dependant upon the existence or nonexistence of ports of entry, and other considerations equally learned and wise; executed greatly to the benefit of the people and politicians of some sections, while those of other quarters are left to comfort themselves by reflecting how much Nature has blessed them, as the best set-off to the stepdame policy of the Government. Kentucky has felt all this deeply.

I am in favor of abandoning this partial system altogether. I saw the general system overturned with regret; but it has been done. I have no hope that it can be resuscitated. There are powerful reasons why it cannot be; and there are not a few why it ought not to be. I will give you some of them. The States, many of them at least, perceiving, after the elevation of General Jackson to the Presidency, and his veto of the Maysville road appropriation, that the execution of a general system of internal improvement by this Government could not be expected as soon as desired, if ever, adopted systems for themselves, and commenced their execution with such means as they could command. The plans of the States now occupy the grounds which the General Government might and ought to have occupied, before the States were forced to take up the business, by your neglect. After permitting this, if you now adopt a general system, and commence its execution independent of the States, you will interfere with and mar their plans. Under this condition of things, the only sensible course, it seems to me, which we ought now to take is, to aid the States in the completion of their plans and works. If a State has already made a road which you should have made, it would be extremely ridiculous for you now to make a parallel national road a few yards only from the State road; or to undertake, by putting a fresh layer of stone on the State road, to convert it into a national road. Such interference, at this time, might produce dangerous collisions between National and State authority. The feelings of the people could not fail to become greatly excited; and consequences fatal to our peace, if not to our Governments, might result. It is the first duty of every statesman, having the superintendence of any part of our complex political system, to be extremely careful in preserving and maintaining the harmonious action of the whole. It is better to abstain from doing that which you may rightfully do, and which, when done, would be productive of good, than to force your measures upon an unwilling, dissatisfied people. For one, I cannot consent, strongly attached as I have been to a general system of internal improvement, and its execution by the nation, to commence operations at this late period, which shall, in the least, interfere with those of the States.

Again: the States (I believe generally, it is certainly true in regard to Kentucky) have wisely united their means with those of individuals in making roads. An act of incorporation prescribes the terms of union. By this course the State secures, in the management of her part of the fund, the energy and economy which invariably spring from the self-interest of the citizen. My experience and observation of human character and conduct have long since convinced me that there are very few, if any, public officers, with fixed salaries, who attend to the business of the community with that care and diligence which they observe in the management of their own private affairs. Tell a public collector, at sunset, that a debtor of the Government is about to abscond, and there is danger of losing the debt; will he lose any sleep in consequence of the information? No, sir. He will creep to bed, and lie as quietly and as snug till morning, as if he had not heard a whisper. Make the same statement to a man in relation to his debtor, and at once he is roused into action; he travels all night; he hunts constables, sheriffs, magistrates, and, as the day breaks, levies his attachment upon the goods and chattels of his absconding debtor. It is legislative wisdom to blend public and private interests together, and to bring in aid of the public, the strong motives generated by individual interests. My State has done this, by uniting with her citizens in making roads, while she has reserved to herself, exclusively, the more important work of improving her rivers. The Executive policy of the General Government is to divorce public and private interests. And we have the natural fruits of such a policy in the vast expenditure, the waste of money upon the Cumberland road. I have taken some pains to look into this matter. I find that Captain Ogden, the superintendent, reported to the last Congress, that $570,363 61 had been expended on one hundred and forty-eight miles of the road in Indiana, and that it would require $1 779,266 55 to complete these one hundred and forty-eight miles It thus appears that each mile will cost a fraction more than $15,875. The same officer reports upon ninety miles of the road in Illinois, showing that $277,591 83 had been expended, and that $939,407 30 would be required to finish, so that these ninety miles will cost upwards of $13 300 per mile. I have not put myself to the trouble of searching documents to prove the cost, per mile, of that part of the road which passes through the mountains. But, judging from the expenditure in Indiana and Illinois, where the labor in grading is inconsiderable, the expense per mile, across the mountains, exceeds $20,000. Does any member believe that the road would have cost as much if individual interests had been combined with those of the Government?

The foregoing considerations have great weight in constraining me to surrender to the States, in future, the business of road-making. There are other important reasons. I cannot omit to mention one of them. Upon the accession of General Jackson to the Presidency, those who attentively considered the political evolutions of his camp could not fail to perceive that while the troops were ordered to mark time in harmony with the notes sounded by the drum and fife of retrenchment, reform, and Democracy, every movement tended to extravagance, destruction, and despotism. The great lever by which he uprooted the foundations of the settled institutions of the country, wisely and beneficently conducted by his predecessors consisted of the increase and unscrupulous exercise of the patronage which appertained to his station. To accomplish his purpose, and to bend every thing to his will, he did not hesitate to make vacancies by his power of removal from office, and then to fill them by those who made his dictation, instead of the laws of the land, their rule of action. Alarmed at these high handed proceedings, the Whig flag of the Revolution was raised, and the friends of liberty invited to rally around it. I obeyed the summons. From the hour I volunteered, to this moment, I have, on all suitable occasions, pointed to the enormous powers and patronage of the Executive as the fortification of an enemy, which must be levelled. It is the despot's strong hold, the world over.

Now, sir, with these opinions firmly fixed, I surrender, without regret, the general system of internal improvement, because it takes from the National Executive one of his sources of patronage. We shall have fewer Government agents controlling and spending their hundreds of thousands, fewer jobs to let, and less ability to reward partisans with political "spoils." If I have not been misinformed, your Government agents and contractors on the Cumberland road have attempted, and succeeded in exercising, a political influence over the laborers in their employment. It has been an object as dear to their hearts to carry an election, as to construct the road; and they have so managed it as to connect the road with politics, and politics with filling their pockets, in a manner equally degrading and corrupt

It will not follow as a consequence that we shall have no good roads, if we now abandon the scheme of having them made by the General Government. Far otherwise. The resources of the States have vastly increased since a system of general internal improvement, to be carried on by the nation, was first conceived. The States are now able to make roads and canals for themselves. Some of them have already completed splendid works. All are busily engaged upon improvements suited to their respective situations and conditions; and, under the change of circumstances, the General Government will promote the interests of the people in a more eminent degree by increasing the power and means of the States, than can be done by leaving the States unaided, and going on, as heretofore, with a partial and contracted system of its own. We can increase the ability, and stimulate the energy of the States, in a manner worthy of statesmen. We ought to do it, be dividing among them annually the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and assigning to each a share in proportion to its federal population. That, sir, is my plan, and which I hope to see substituted in the place of all farther attempts to construct roads by direct appropriations. Do that, and you will find that the States will expend the money more economically and advantageously than you can. You will perceive, likewise, that, if it is done, the people will require their representatives to take care of and to guard the public domain, as a great national fund, instead of squandering it for the corrupt purpose of purchasing the support of voters, in behalf of aspiring politicians, who seek offices, from the highest to the lowest, by flattering and promoting selfish and sectional interests, instead of manifesting those high moral and intellectual qualities which alone can dignify and adorn official station, and make men capable of conducting public affairs with utility and success. Let us divide the money arising from the sales of the public lands among the States, assigning to each a just portion; and then support the General Government by a discriminating tariff, having in view the raising of no more revenue than is necessary to sustain the Government, economically administered, and, at the same time, the protection of those branches of domestic manufacture essential to our independence.

I will now proceed to notice the arguments advanced in the course of the debate in opposition to my proposition. The gentleman from Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, [Mr. MERCER,] gave us a brief outline of the system, by which he was, and the House ought to be, governed in making appropriations for internal improvements. By his system, three things are required: first, a survey by a competent engineer; second, an estimate of the cost of the proposed work, and a report; and, lastly, the action of Congress upon the information thus acquired through the appropriate committees. Now, sir, this is all very well; but the gentleman was himself constrained to acknowledge that Congress would not observe the rules of his system upon all occasions. Sometimes appropriations were made without any previous survey and estimate; and all of us remember, who were here two years ago, when we had many surplus millions in the Treasury, the wild schemes for fortifications, railroads, and lighthouses, which were proposed in one or the other House of Congress, without any previous survey, estimate, or report. Congress, during the overflowing of the Treasury, did not restrict its action to a discussion merely of the wild schemes proposed, but it actually made appropriations in violation of the gentleman's system—appropriations proving, beyond all doubt, the want of rule, the want of system, and the existence of partiality in the action of Congress. To give an instance: During the 24th Congress, $35,000 were appropriated to improve certain rivers and harbors in North Carolina; among them was New river, a little stream, scarcely visible upon the map, from its source to its mouth not more than thirty or forty miles in length; and yet there was no survey, estimate, or report, that I ever heard of; nor was there any port of entry to bring the case within the then President's profound constitutional distinctions. I objected to the appropriation for New river at the time, but without effect. I asked an appropriation to Green river, in my State. My application was scarcely treated with respect. I was then a new member, and was told that I ought not to expect an appropriation for Green river by moving an amendment to any bill; but that I ought to refer the subject to the appropriate committee, to inquire into its propriety. Well, sir, early in this session, I referred the subject by resolution to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and, as yet, there is not even a response of any kind to my resolution. In the case of Green river, your own Topographical Engineers have so far complied with my friend's system [Mr. MERCER] as to make a survey and report; and, notwithstanding this, I cannot perceive that I am any nigher my object now than I was two years ago. You give thousands to remove "oyster shoals" in New river—a spring branch compared with Green river—and will not appropriate a cent to render the latter navigable for hundreds of miles into the heart of a rich country, when the estimates prove than you can accomplish for the benefit of the people as much, if not more, for less money, than upon any other stream in the United States. Sir, my friend from Virginia talks of a system, but in reality we have none; and, what is worse, it seems to me we never shall have. We cannot get any thing like promptitude of action on the part of Congress, which is essential to the successful operation of any system. Members prefer to sit at their desks, and write letters, and read newspapers, to a patient and industrious investigation of the wants of the various sections of our vast empire, in reference to the public works which should be constructed. What do the members of Maine or Georgia care for the rocks and shoals which obstruct the navigation of Green river? They have certainly a national interest, and no doubt feel it, in the prosperity of every part of the Republic; but, sir, heretofore, that sentiment has been too weak to produce energetic and just action upon the subject of internal improvement. Look at the application which my colleague from the Louisville district [Mr. GRAVES] has, time after time, made to free the commerce of the Western States of a tax amounting, in the last year, to $145,224, and as yet he has not been able to get you to hear him on the subject of making the canal at Louisville the property of the nation and toll-free. Your inertness and your miscalled system allow one portion of the country to be heavily taxed in its commerce, for the use of improvements which you should have made, but did not; while, in other portions of the country, you are making free roads, not capable, when made, of benefiting the country a tenth part as much as those works which you have entirely neglected. Away with such injustice!

I have been asked by a colleague who sits behind me, [Mr. MENEFEE,] why I solicit for Green river that which I refuse to the Cumberland road? It would seem that this question has originated in a supposed inconsistency on my part, in asking for benefits which I was unwilling to confer upon others. I acknowledge the obligation of the divine injunction, "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you;" and I should regret very much that my course upon the present occasion should be attributed to no higher motive than that of disappointed, mortified selfishness. Another colleague, [Mr. SOUTHGATE,] after informing us that "it was but yesterday when Kentucky was a unit in opinion in relation to the question involved in this bill," stated, in substance, that I now proposed to abandon this road, "not because we have not the money and cannot get it; not because we are released from the moral and legal obligation to extend this road to the Mississippi; not because the advantages of this road to the commerce and social intercourse of the East and West are not apparent; not because we have not the constitutional power, not because the road is not national; but, strange to tell, because Green river and Big Barren river are not embraced, and have not received the kind and fostering care of the General Government." He then proceeded to say that he would not withhold from other parts of our own West that which, in justice and right, belongs to them, because Kentucky had not got her share. My colleague [Mr. SOUTHGATE] is not less ignorant of the true motives by which I am actuated, than he seems to be of the facts and laws which govern the subject under discussion. Two years ago "Kentucky was a unit in relation to the question involved in this bill." If my colleague will look into the journal of the 1st session of the 24th Congress, page 1143, he will there find that eleven of the twelve members of the Kentucky delegation who voted, opposed the appropriation for the Cumberland road. The Treasury was then overflowing, it is now empty. I should consider it unkind in those then here to impeach my motives for a persevering, consistent course. Those who have subsequently become members may find it more convenient to impute an unworthy motive than to answer my arguments.

I will proceed to satisfy my constituents and the whole country, I trust, of the propriety of calling the attention of this House to "Green and Big Barren rivers." My first object was to contrast these rivers with New river, the spring branch of North Carolina, and thus to show the striking inequality and injustice of your pretended system of internal improvement. My second object was to contrast the same rivers with the Cumberland road, for the same purpose. I selected Green and Barren rivers to make the contrast, because I was best acquainted with them. Any river would have done as well, although situated in a State other than Kentucky, provided it possessed magnitude and importance. James river, below Richmond, would have answered my purpose. Why not remove the shoals and bars, and make a ship channel to Richmond? Has it not the same claim which the overslaugh in the Hudson has? Does it not rise infinitely above the "oyster shoals" in New river? Ay, but Virginia is opposed, on constitutional grounds, to this Government making improvements within her territory. Is that a reason sufficient to deprive her of all aid? Will she rise in rebellion if you commence the improvement of her rivers? The peculiar views of Virginia's representatives, taking them as a mass, should no more prevent us from extending the system to aid her, than the opposition of the representatives of a single county in a State should prevent opening a State road through their county. The construction which Virginia places on the Constitution is to deprive her of a just portion of paternal aid, and Kentucky, without any such constitutional scruples, is to be treated as much like a step-child as Virginia! And these inequalities in the distribution of advantages is yet called a system of justice and liberality! Sir, it is a taunting mockery.

But there are yet other reasons why I might properly press the consideration of Green and Barren rivers upon Congress, and still be opposed to the appropriation for the Cumberland road.

There is a distinction between watercourses navigable by Nature, although not permanently so, and works entirely artificial, which might justify placing rivers upon different principles from those which authorize this Government to construct roads. The General Government has taken jurisdiction over harbors on tide water since its foundation, and it has improved the navigation of tide-water rivers and harbors, by maintaining, repairing, and constructing light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, from the passage of the act of the 7th August, 1789, (less than six months after the Government went into operation under the present Constitution,) down to the present day. The same principle which allows you to benefit navigation by erecting a beacon, a buoy, or light-house, on the seashore or upon tide-water rivers, will equally justify you in making the channel deeper. In looking into the Constitution, I see no power granted over salt or tide-water which is prohibited when you come to legislate in relation to the rivers in the interior of the Continent, and not influenced by the ebbing and flowing of the tide. To whichsoever of the enumerated powers you trace jurisdiction over tide-water, you will find it equally applicable to rivers, no matter where situated, within our territory. As, then, the improvement of navigation began with the first Congress that ever sat under the Constitution, and without objection, so far as my knowledge extends, it may be that Congress will continue to improve rivers for the benefit of navigation, when no new work exclusively artificial will ever be commenced. Now, sir, I am one of those who think we have the same right to make a road that we have to improve a river, whether salt or fresh. But to those who think differently, and who intend to persevere in improving rivers, and to abandon roads, I deem it a duty to keep the rivers in which the people of my district are chiefly interested, before their eyes. If they look, perhaps they will find Green and Barren rivers as worthy of improvement as New river, the ever-to-be-remembered North Carolina spring branch!

Sir, if Congress had a large charity fund to dispense for purposes of education, would my colleagues think they had discharged their duty, to sit by and see the whole of it applied to educating the children of other States, without proclaiming that there were children in Kentucky who ought to come in for a share? No, sir; no. They would be unworthy the State which has honored us, if they did not indignantly resent every attempt to exclude the children of their constituents from a participation in the common fund. I have done nothing more than that. I only ask a just participation in the common fund. My constituents would not tolerate me in asking more than my share, and they would dismiss me with scorn and contempt if I did not demand my rights—no, not my rights—but their rights. 'Tis for them I speak.

But again, sir. It is a well settled principle of international law, that the oceans of the earth are the common property of all nations; and that even rivers which pass through or touch the territories of independent nations are, for all the purposes of navigation to those nations, common property. Under this principle we claimed the right to navigate the Mississippi to the Gulf before the purchase of Louisiana. Under the same principle, we claim the right to navigate the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic. As these principles prevail among independent nations, much more strongly do they apply to the States of this Union, bound together by a common Constitution, with the significant motto, "E pluribus unum," stamped upon its coin and emblazoned on its flag. Consider, sir, that express power has been delegated to Congress to regulate commerce, not only with foreign nations, but with the several States, and that Congress from the beginning, without objection, has assumed jurisdiction over all the interests and natural channels of navigation—an ingredient of commerce, according to the opinion of the Supreme Court; and then ask the question, can any one State legitimately appropriate to itself to the exclusion of other States or their citizens, any navigable river, upon the ground that the river lies entirely within its own territories? Sir, it has been judicially and correctly decided by the Supreme Court, in the case of Gibbon vs. Ogden, that it cannot be done. New York was not permitted to grant the exclusive navigation of the Hudson, by steamboats, to Fulton. If a State cannot make a navigable river exclusively for its own purpose, much less can it be done for all purposes. It becomes, therefore, a question of vast magnitude to the people of my State, how far its Legislature can go in destroying entirely the natural navigation of large rivers, and substituting in lieu thereof a better artificial navigation by dams and locks, and subjecting the commerce of all the States to taxation in the form of tolls. Let me bring this matter home to the mind of every one by giving a few illustrations. Suppose the Legislature of Louisiana should undertake to open a ship canal from the Mississippi to Lake Pontchartrain, and to tax all vessels passing through it, would she have the right to do so? Undoubtedly, because it would be a work entirely artificial, constructed by her means, and for the use of which she might rightfully charge. But suppose she were to go a step further, and undertake to block up the natural channels at the mouths of the Mississippi, with a view to compel all vessels to use her artificial canal, and thus to tax them, could she do it without the consent of Congress?

Suppose Indiana constructs a canal around the falls of the Ohio on her side, can she and Kentucky then combine to obstruct the natural channel, and thus compel all boats at every stage of water to pass through one of the canals and pay tolls? Can Kentucky construct a dam and lock upon the Cumberland or Tennessee river, upon pretence of furnishing an artificial navigation superior to that which nature has given, and thus levy contributions upon the commerce and citizens of the States of Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, or deprive them of the use of these rivers? Sir, in all the cases imagined, I do not hesitate to say that the States could not obstruct the natural navigation, with a view to substitute an artificial navigation, without the assent of Congress. Wherein do these cases differ from those of the Green, Kentucky, and Licking rivers, in which the natural navigation is to be destroyed, and a better artificial navigation substituted by the legislative action of a State, without even consulting her sister States in Congress? It differs in nothing except that two of the rivers which my State has undertaken to improve do not touch the territory of any other State, if that fact is sufficient to change or render inapplicable the principles to which I have referred, so be it. To say the least, I think it a matter of doubt enough to justify me in desiring an appropriation from Congress to aid the State with its improvements on Green river, even if it did not exceed the amount of ten dollars. A portion of the waters of Green river comes from Tennessee. I desire to obtain an appropriation to show the assent of Congress to the State improvements now in progress, if nothing more; and to do away all pretext for the interference of this Government in future times with those improvements. Without such assent, I do not know but the time may come when it will be said that our dams and locks are unauthorised national nuisances, and that this Government is bound to abate them.

I trust that my inquisitive colleagues will now perceive that my motives and my survey of the entire subject are not confined to the suggestions of a narrow selfishness. Selfishness, indeed! Why, sir, from the tenor of remarks which have surprised me in the progress of this debate, it would seem that if you were a partner with certain gentlemen in any mercantile concern, or trade, or corporation, and they were taking to themselves all the profits and dividends, and you should happen to remonstrate against the iniquity, all the satisfaction that you are likely to get would be an impudent look, and the sacrilegious exclamation "Good Lord, how selfish the man is!" What would you think of travellers in a desert, who, in violation of every principle agreed on at the commencement of the journey, should combine to place part of the caravan upon half allowance, while the other feasted sumptuously every day; and who, when complaints were made by the sufferers, should return no other reply than "We regard you very unreasonable and selfish to ask an equal share in the bread and water?"

These, sir, in my estimation, are fit parallels to exhibit the conduct of Congress in relation to internal improvements, as conducted during the last nine years.

My colleague [Mr. POPE] seems to be as much surprised at my course as my colleague, [Mr. SOUTHGATE.] Neither of those gentlemen was here during the last Congress, and neither could have examined the journal to ascertain how I then voted. Had that been done, they would at least have found me consistent with myself. My colleague [Mr. POPE] adverts to the appropriations to send out an Exploring Expedition to the South seas, and the $100,000 voted to the heirs of Fulton, as if they afforded countenance to the grant of $359,000 to the Cumberland road in the present exhausted condition of the Treasury. These precedents have not been set by my consent. I oppose both. In setting on foot the Exploring Expedition, the conduct of Congress resembled that of a young spendthrift, who wastes his estate, rambling abroad in pursuit of pleasures and fancied good, to the neglect of his more important and more profitable business at home; and as to the Fulton appropriation, it was in my judgment a donation, which Congress refused to call by its proper name, and passed it through under the delusive idea of settling a debt.

There is yet, Mr. Speaker, an important argument against my proposition to be considered. It has been gravely urged here that Congress was bound by compact to finish the Cumberland road to the Mississippi river; that the faith of the nation was pledged to do it. Gentlemen have asserted this with as much seriousness as if it was founded in truth; and were it not that the gravity of their countenances rather forbids it, one might be disposed to smile at their errors and credulity on this point. Let us examine it. If my proposition violates any compact or pledged faith, as soon as I am convinced I will instantly withdraw it. The act of 30th April, 1802, tendering terms to the people of Ohio for their assent previous to their entering the Union, and to which they did assent, offers them one-twentieth part, or five per cent. on the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands lying in their State, to be expended under the authority of Congress in "laying out and making public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same."

The act of 19th April, 1816, tendering terms to the people of Indiana, offers them five per cent. on the nett proceeds of sales of land lying in their State, for the purpose of making roads and canals, three fifths to be applied by their own Legislature, and "two-fifths to the making of a road or roads leading to the said State, under the direction of Congress."

The act of 18th April, 1818, tendering terms to the people of Illinois, offers them five per cent. on the nett proceeds of the sales of land lying in their State, "two-fifths to be disbursed under the direction of Congress, in making roads leading to the State." The other three-fifths were given to the State for purposes of education.

The foregoing acts of Congress constitute the basis upon which the obligation of continuing the Cumberland road to the Mississippi must rest, if there be any; and I invite the special attention of my colleague [Mr. SOUTHGATE] to their provisions. I also beg him to notice other acts to which I shall refer, and then ask himself whether "the moral and legal obligation to extend this road to the Mississippi" is any thing more than a created phantom of his own vivid imagination?

It is perfectly clear, from the foregoing acts, that there was not the shadow of an obligation imposed upon Congress to make a road in either of the three States. I admit, however, there was an obligation imposed to make a road, or roads, leading to each of said States, so far as the two per cent. fund would accomplish it. In the case of Ohio, the stipulation is to connect the Atlantic and Western waters; but no such provision is made in relation to Indiana and Illinois. It would be a compliance with the contract to construct roads leading to their borders from Michigan and Missouri, or any other quarter. Congress has, however, undertaken to fulfil its obligation by making the Cumberland road, and thus not only to fulfil it to the letter, by making roads leading to these States, but to give each a greater advantage by likewise making the road in their respective territories. Of this I will not complain, although three per cent. has been allowed two of these States to make roads within their limits whenever they pleased. On the 29th of March, 1806, Congress passed an act for laying out and making the road from Cumberland, upon the Potomac, to the Ohio river. This was the commencement of satisfying the obligation to Ohio, and, in this act of 1806, the sum of thirty thousand dollars was appropriated. But in order to show that it was not bound to expend in making the road more than the two per cent. which had been set apart for the object, Congress carefully inserted in the act of 1806 a provision, making the sum appropriated "chargeable upon, and reimbursable at, the Treasury, by said fund of two per cent. as the same shall accrue." On the 15th of May, 1820, Congress commenced the discharge of its obligations to Indiana and Illinois, by passing an act providing for laying out and continuing the Cumberland road from Wheeling to the Mississippi river. But, as if endowed with the spirit of prophecy, and foreseeing the unfounded pretensions that might be set up, of a "moral and legal obligation" to complete the road after having laid it out and begun it, and intending beforehand to denounce any such claim upon the Government, the Congress of 1820 inserted in the second section of their act the following proviso: "Provided always, and it is hereby enacted and declared, that nothing in this act contained, or that shall be done in pursuance thereof, shall be deemed or construed to imply any obligation, on the part of the United States to make, or to defray the expense of making, the road hereby authorized to be laid out, or of any part thereof."

The road having been laid out under the act of 1820, on the 3d of March, 1825, Congress passed an act providing for the appointment of a superintendent, prescribed his duties, and appropriated one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to begin the work. But the act expressly declares that the money shall be "replaced out of the fund reserved for laying out and making roads under the direction of Congress, by the several acts

* This act was subsequently modified by an act of 3d of March, 1803, so as to require the payment of three-fifths of the five per cent. to the State of Ohio, to be applied to making roads in that State, leaving only two-fifths to be applied by the General Government in making roads to the State.

passed for the admission of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri, into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States." The act of March, 1825, authorized the survey and laying out the road to the permanent seat of Government of the State of Missouri.

It is impossible for the unbiassed mind to read the foregoing acts of Congress without clearly perceiving that the extent of obligation imposed by them requires the faithful appropriation and expenditure of the two per cent. fund in making roads leading to the States mentioned, and nothing more. Now, if it can be shown that we have done that, the obligation is discharged. If we have expended more, the excess is a gratuity.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DROMGOOLE] has caused a thorough examination of all acts heretofore passed, appropriating money to make the road. The result is, that $6,365,083 46 have already expended; of that sum $2,843,942 20 have been expended between Cumberland and the Ohio river, and $3,521,141 26 have been expended between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. How much does the two per cent. fund amount to, and which Congress was under obligation to appropriate in road making for the benefit of these States? I called for information during the last Congress, to ascertain the amounts actually paid to these States—to wit: the three per cent. of the five per cent. fund. By the report of the Register of the Treasury, dated the 29th day of December, 1836, it appears the State of

Ohio	was entitled to, and had received,			$464,366 51
Indiana	do	do	do	388,102 61
Illinois	do	do	do	260,328 96
Missouri	do	do	do	146,929 20
Constituting an aggregate of				$1,259,727 28

The two per cent. retained by Government is just two-thirds of this aggregate, or $839,818 18, which, being deducted from $6,365,083 46, shows that we have, as a gratuity, expended $5,525,265 28 more than we were bound to do. To all this should be added the three per cent. on the sales of public lands, paid to the above four States, which, prior to the 29th day of December, 1836, amounted, as above shown, to $1,259,727 28, and the millions of acres given them for education and other purposes, if we would bring together in a single view the many favors which a bountiful Government has showered upon them. I do not repine at the munificence of the General Government to the new States. I do not envy their prosperity. I rejoice at it. Their citizens are my countrymen, and they give a kind welcome to such as leave the old States in pursuit of better fortues in newer homes. Sir, I have many relations, connections, and friends in the States most benefited by the extension of the Cumberland road. But I am not so blind as not to perceive that Government has more than discharged all its obligations to them and their States; and that, if you could double the quantity of lands yet to be sold in their boundaries, and treble the price, two per cent. on the money arising would never reimburse us the half of the expenditure already made, over and above what any compact required us to expend. Under these circumstances, the people of those States have no just claim to ask from an empty Treasury the additional sum of $359,000, to go on with the work. My motion to recommit, with instructions, is made in order that the road shall be surrendered to them; and, if hereafter the two per cent. fund should ever augment so as to overpay us, which is scarcely a possible event, no one will more cheerfully surrender the surplus than I. Indeed, sir, it may now be provided for, if my motion prevails. In giving up the road so far as it may have been finished, the States should come under the same terms and stipulations in regard to the passage of the mail, troops, munitions of war, &c. as have been heretofore made in relation to that part of the road already finished and ceded to the States. In regard to the parts of the road partially done, I am willing to ask no equivalent in return.

I have shown, sir, that we violate no compact in refusing to make the appropriation now asked. I have shown it by the record; and when the record (your statutes) is examined, it will be seen that this Cumberland road and its extension never constituted a part of any general plan or system of internal improvement; but that it had its origin in compacts with the States to and through which it goes, and the enhancement of the value of the public domain. So far as it depends upon these peculiar grounds, the argument in support of it does not in the least maintain the power of this Government to adopt and execute a general system of internal improvement. On the contrary, by placing this road for support upon the compacts and the proprietary interest of the Government, the argument in favor of a general system is thereby weakened. It is as much as to say, but for these peculiar considerations the road could not have been constitutionally made by us.

One of the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. EWING] gives me a caution upon the subject of breaking down "obligations entered into by solemn compacts," while I "still hold the new States bound by their stipulations in relation to the sovereignty of the soil." The gentleman is wholly mistaken if he supposes I wish to avoid any obligation which the Government has incurred. I am for fulfilling all obligations, not only literally, but liberally; and in this instance we have done it, by giving heaping measure. I can only understand the gentleman's remark in relation to "the sovereignty of the soil" as a threat that if Congress refuse to spend millions more to complete the road, if Congress evince a determination now to stop, the "new States" might justifiably seize upon the public domain within their borders, and appropriate it exclusively to their own use. In a private or public capacity, I trust I shall never fail to perform my duty in consequence of threats of any kind. I will not be alarmed on the present occasion. I will only retort upon my venerable friend from Indiana, (for such I esteem him,) by using his own language, and tell him, "that he greatly overrates his sagacity and intellectual strength, if he thinks he can break down the obligations entered into, and acted upon for thirty years," and excite rebellion in the State which has honored him, even if my motion should prevail. I must tell my friend another thing: I am, in principle, opposed to paying people for keeping quiet. I will give Indiana no bribe to keep her hands off the public lands. I know individuals sometimes make exactions, and the timid sometimes yield in the hope of keeping upon good terms; but I have never known an unjust person to commence this game, who did not increase his exactions until they became intolerable; and, at last, the party imposed on would be driven to resistance. Sir, the manly and best policy always is, to attack imposition at the threshold. Friendships which can be purchased and paid for by gold are not worth having. That ligament binds robbers together. The friendship which is worthy of elevated individuals, worthy of great communities, is based upon sympathy, benevolence, and the principles of eternal justice. It prompts the parties to entertain mutual respect, to give each his share of any common blessing, to rejoice in their mutual prosperity, and to aid each other in every good work. It is this generous and noble friendship which I desire to see Kentucky cherish for and towards all her sister States. On their part I wish to see it reciprocated. I wish to put down, to exterminate every sordid, sectional, partial, and unjust feeling and motive of action. To do this, so far as it is to be effected by a system of internal improvement, you must make it general, or you must give it up entirely. The peace and harmony of families are destroyed, if the father lavishes all his bounty on a favorite son, and suffers the rest to go neglected in ignorance and rags. So with these States; unless justice and equality, according to the rule of taxation, or the rule of federal numbers, are observed, a burning indignation takes possession of the breasts of the neglected, and when the Government tumbles to pieces from its own rottenness they will clap their hands for joy.

Mr. Speaker, several of my Whig friends who differ with me on the present occasion, have ventured, in the course of their remarks, to express their regret that the proposition I have submitted should come from a Whig. What, sir, regret that a Whig should propose to stay the hand of extravagance; to stop expenditures partial and unjust; to claim common funds as common property; and to insist that they shall be used for the benefit of all, and not for a few! Sir, I ought to have received the thanks of every true-hearted Whig, rather than the cold expressions which have been bestowed. There is something wonderful in the amalgamating influences of this Cumberland road. It operates like magic. The Whigs of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois walk as lovingly with their political adversaries on this particular question as if they had always, on all questions, been perfectly agreed! How happens it that even where this road touches the territory of the Old Dominion, it makes the representative a good internal improvement man, and seems to silence all constitutional scruples in voting money for that purpose? I dare not say, when our constituents are getting money, and we, in consequence, are getting their votes, that all so situated have irresistible motives to support appropriations to continue this road. But I will say, there is a wonderful unanimity of sentiment on this particular matter among the representatives of the States through which the road is to be carried northwest of the Ohio river! Sir, I will take leave of my Whig friends in these States, and of the subject, by saying to them, go home, tell your constituents that they have had millions more than they were entitled to under any compact; that Congress has given them the road as it is, and asked nothing in return where it is not already finished, and that they, like a favored son of a kind father, who finds it necessary and just to withhold further donations, ought to return blessings for past favors, instead of curses for the change in the father's conduct. You may tell them all this with truth, if my motion prevails, and they will approve what Congress has done, for you represent a sensible, reflecting, and honest people.

THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

SPEECH OF MR. EVANS,

OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, May 29, 1838—The House having proceeded to the Orders of the Day, and taken up the message received from the President a few days ago, on the subject of the Northeastern Boundary of the United States—

Mr. EVANS said: The topics involved in the message respecting the Northeastern Boundary of the United States were of too great and pressing importance, as well to the State he represented, as to the peaceful relations of the country, to be passed over without some observations. He wished he could impress upon the House, and upon Congress, and, if his voice could reach beyond these walls, upon the other Department of the Government also, the necessity, absolute necessity, of prompt, efficient movement, on its part, for the adjustment, on just, safe, and honorable principles, of this protracted controversy. Farther delay could only result in deeper embarrassment. The legislation of the State whose rights and interests were more directly at stake had precluded much longer delay. The evidence of this is now before us. By a resolution, adopted with entire unanimity at the late session of its Legislature, which I shall presently have occasion to read, (said Mr. E.) it is made the duty of the Governor of Maine, in certain contingencies, to cause the line of boundary on the Northeastern frontier to be surveyed and established, agreeably to the treaty of 1783. Those contingencies are, that the bill introduced by myself some months ago, and since reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, shall not become a law, or that the Government of the United States, either by itself, or in conjunction with Great Britain, or with Maine, shall not appoint a commission to do the same thing; and the period assigned by the resolve for the performance of this duty by the Governor, should the United States fail to undertake it in one of these modes, is the first day of September next. That period is approaching, and the duty devolved upon the Governor will unquestionably be discharged. Let this not be doubted. It will be done. That it will be attended with hazard to the pacific relations between us and Great Britain, there is too much reason to fear. These considerations, I trust, will secure to this subject the earnest attention of both branches of Congress; and in the course of the remarks I am about to submit, I will endeavor to point out the mode in which justice may be done to the State, and, at the same time, the peace of the nation preserved.

The message, which is now the matter for consideration, embraces two objects, the first of which is of comparatively little importance. It relates merely to certain claims of the State of Maine for reimbursement for expenditures incurred in affording protection to citizens of the United States, who had been harassed, arrested, and imprisoned by the Government of New Brunswick, under its pretended claim of jurisdiction and authority over what they denominate the disputed territory. The amount is not large, but is justly due to the State, and the hope was indulged that the President would himself have ordered its payment, without recourse to Congress. Doubting his authority, however, to do so, he has transmitted it here; notwithstanding on a former occasion, in 1828, the then Secretary of State (Mr. Clay) caused expenses of precisely a similar character to be reimbursed, at the request of the Governor of the State, without submitting it to Congress at all. This precedent, however, does not seem to meet with favor at this time, and the subject is presented to us. I shall move, sir, to refer this part part of the message to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. If they see fit to report favorably upon the claim, it will be no more than justice; otherwise, if the injustice will be so light and insignificant, in comparison with the greater injustice we have suffered, that, for myself, I shall hardly bestow a thought upon it. With these remarks, which are all I shall offer upon that part of the message, I submit it to the will and pleasure of the committee solely.

The remainder of the message, and the documents which accompany it, are of much more grave and serious import. It invites no action on the part of Congress. It contains nothing upon which either House can act. It is not necessary, therefore, that it should undergo the examination of any committee. It is communicated only "to shew the actual state of the negotiations with Great Britain on the general question." However unusual it may be for the President to communicate to Congress, and especially to this House, the state or the circumstances of a pending negotiation, I rejoice that he has done so in this instance. But I do not rejoice in the information we have received of the character and purposes of the proposed renewed negotiations. I fear, indeed, it may have a disastrous effect upon the measure we are pressing by all means in our power for running the line agreeably to the bill I have referred to.

"The actual state of the negotiations on the general question," we learn from the documents submitted with the message, to be, that, on the 27th of April last, Mr. Forsyth, the Secretary of State, apprized Mr. Fox, the British Minister, that he was directed by the President to announce to him

"The willingness of this Government to enter into an arrangement with Great Britain for the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration, upon the basis of the original American proposition, and the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government."

The Secretary of State invites the Minister to a conference, with a view "to conclude a convention embracing that object."

It will be seen that very little information is to be gathered from this letter alone of the character of the proposed negotiation. What the "original American proposition" was, and what were the "modifications offered by her Majesty's Government," are not stated, and perhaps need not have been. The reply of the British Minister of the 1st of May says that he is "not at present provided with full powers for negotiating the proposed convention," but will transmit the proposal to her Majesty's Government, and must wait for fresh instructions. The "modifications" he speaks of as contained in his note of the 10th of January last. From this we learn that a proposition formerly made by the American to the British Government, and subsequently modified by the latter, has again been renewed, and that a convention between the two Governments may reasonably be anticipated upon the basis of that proposition, and the modifications of it. In a letter from Mr. Forsyth to the Governor of Maine, dated May 8, he informs the latter that this has been done "in accordance with the expressed wishes of the Legislature" of that State; as he had previously informed Mr. Fox, on the 7th of February last, that it would not be invited "unless the authorities of the State of Maine" "should deem it more likely to lead to a final adjustment of the question of boundary than the General Government deems it to be." It seems, therefore, that the Secretary of State, by direction of the President, has proffered this negotiation upon the ground that it is in conformity with "the expressed wishes" of the Legislature of Maine, who deem it likely to lead to a final adjustment of the question. Now, sir, if this be so, certainly neither the State itself, nor its representatives here, can have any just ground of objection to the proceedings about to be instituted. But I take occasion here to say, what I will more fully show before I sit down, that upon this matter the Secretary labors under some extraordinary mistake. The Legislature of the State have never expressed any wishes, or consent, to such a negotiation as is proposed; nor have any of the constituted authorities of the State; nor have they done or said any thing which can be so construed. But of this more hereafter.

My purpose now is to deal with this "original American proposition," which has been thus renewed, and to show that it was, at the time, in connection with certain concessions and principles coupled with it, and made part of it, and to be observed in the execution of it, highly objectionable and dangerous; and that the British modifications render it still more so; and, if carried out fully, in the sense intended by Great Britain, it will be a surrender of the whole question at issue. What, then, was "the original American proposition?" It was first suggested, but not distinctly offered, by Mr. Livingston, in his letter to the British Minister of the 30th of April, 1833, in these words:

"All the disadvantages of these modes of settlement, heretofore adopted, might, as it appears to the American Government, be avoided by appointing a new commission, consisting of an equal number of commissioners, with an umpire selected by some friendly sovereign from among the most skilful men in Europe, to decide on all points in which they disagree; or, by a commission entirely composed of such men, so selected, to be attended, in the survey and view of the country, by agents appointed by the parties."

This was a mere suggestion, not much pressed, for the appointment, in one or the other modes indicated, of a commission, with an umpire, who should have power "to decide on all points" of disagreement. If this had been all, probably it would not have been very objectionable; although even in its best aspect, it might not have been entirely satisfactory to Maine. But it was not all. The Secretary proceeded to offer, as an inducement to the British Government to adopt the suggestion, a proposition for the employment of a "new principle in surveying," which was subsequently pressed with much earnestness for several years; and that was, a departure from the true north course from the monument called for by the treaty, and a deviation westward, in search of highlands, provided none satisfactory could be found in the first-named meridian. In the same letter, Mr. Livingston, after explaining his meaning, says:

"As this principle does not seem, hitherto, to have been adopted, it appears to the Government of the United States to offer to the commissioners who may be appointed the means of an amicable adjustment."

It is thus plain that, in the very inception of the proposition, it was carried out upon this new principle, and that "the commissioners who may be appointed" were to avail themselves of this mode of "an amicable adjustment."

The proposition, even thus explained, did not meet with a favorable reception from the British Minister.

It was further explained, and strenuously urged by Mr. Livingston, as a means of finally settling the question in a manner that would be binding on both parties. On the 28th May, 1833, he writes to Mr Vaughan that the failure hitherto to ascertain "the true boundary" ought not "To be attributed to any insuperable difficulty, but rather to the inefficiency of the means heretofore resorted to in order to secure such a decision as should be binding on both parties, and to the want of attention, by the commissioners and arbiter severally employed for that purpose, to an established rule in the settlement of boundaries."

The avowal is here distinct and explicit, that the adoption of his new principle of surveying, which he here calls "an established rule," would settle "the true boundaries," in a manner to be binding on both parties, although it should diverge far to the westward of the "due north line" which the treaty calls for. In other words, whatever line should be run from the source of the St. Croix, upon the proposed principle of survey, would be the line of the treaty, the true line, and binding on all.

The British Minister so regarded it, and he repeats, May 31, to Mr. Livingston, that he understands him to say—"That the only deviation, therefore, which can be admitted in tracing the boundary, from the strict terms of the treaty, is an abandonment of the direct due north line from the St. Croix, which has been hitherto followed in search of the highlands of the treaty; and a permission to be given to a joint commission to be sent expressly to examine the country, to follow an oblique line to the westward of the direct north line, until they shall meet with highlands answering the description given of them in the treaty, as dividing rivers falling into the Atlantic from those which fall into the St. Lawrence. A line drawn to them, wherever they may be found, from the monument at the source of the St. Croix, would be such a compliance, with the description of the boundary laid down in the treaty, as to remove all constitutional difficulties in the way of the Government of the United States, and enable it to fix that line as the line of boundary."

The joint commission, suggested as I have already stated, was thus to be at liberty to make "a deviation" "from the strict terms of the treaty"—an abandonment of one of its plainest features; and a line found by such deviation and such abandonment was, by the concession of our Government, to be the line described in the treaty, and to be obligatory upon us.

The subject underwent a good deal of discussion, and continued for some years, almost down to the present time, when it is again renewed. The proposition was distinctly restated by Mr. McLane, March 11, 1834, in these words:

"Now, the proposition of the President is, to find the highlands answering the description of those called for by the treaty of 1783, and to them from the monument to run a direct line; and the President does not doubt that, with the aid of more accurate surveys by skiful persons, on the ground, and freed from the restraint hitherto imposed by a due north line, such highlands may be found; and which either the commissioners or the arbiter might have found had they adopted the rule now proposed."

Here is the most distinct admission that the "restraint hitherto imposed by a due north line" had prevented the umpire and the commissioners from finding the highlands of the treaty; and the "rule now proposed," if adopted, would enable the new commission to find such highlands, and "to run a direct line from the monument" to them.

The British Minister comprehended the proposition perfectly well, as will be seen by an extract from his reply, dated March 16, although he did not even then accede to it. He says:

"The answer of Mr. McLane upon that point is confined to stating that, should a new commission of survey, freed from the restriction of following the due north line of the treaty, find, any where westward of that line, highlands separating rivers, according to the treaty of 1783, a line drawn to them from the monument at the source of the St. Croix river will be such a fulfilment of the terms of that treaty as the President can agree to make it the boundary, without reference to the State of Maine."

I will make but another single citation, though many are at hand, to show that the "original American proposition" was the establishment of a new commission, to ascertain, by surveys, by explorations, not "the northwest angle of Nova Scotia," the starting point of the treaty, but to ascertain "the highlands answering the description of the treaty," that is, highlands which divided the rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean; and, in whatever westward course they might be found, to run a straight line from the monument to them; and this should be the line of the treaty.

Mr. Livingston, as early as May 28, 1833, in the second letter he wrote, explaining and urging the proposition, said:

"The President is willing, in order to simplify the operation, that the commission should be restricted to the simple question of determining the point designated by the treaty as the highlands which divide the waters, to which point a straight line shall be drawn from the monument, and this line shall, as far as it extends, form part of the boundary in question; that they shall then designate the course of the line along the highlands, and fix on the point designated as the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river."

Now, I should like very well to understand what is meant by the phrase "the point designated by the treaty as the highlands which divide the waters." A point, in geometry, we all know, has no magnitude. How a range of highlands, some three hundred miles or more in length, dividing rivers, a dozen or more on each side of it, can be called a point, I am at some loss to comprehend. Well, to this point, (what part of it, I pray?) a straight line from the monument is to be drawn, and then to be continued along this "point." My objection to this, in particular, is, that it concedes more than Great Britain ever required of us. She was always willing we should run due north as far as Mar's Hill, some forty or fifty miles from the source of the St. Croix; and would be entirely willing now that a straight line should be run from Mar's Hill to such highlands as should be discovered conforming to the treaty. If these highlands should be found any where westward of the treaty meridian, a line from the monument would necessarily cut us off from the whole triangle, whose base line should be the space from the monument to Mar's Hill, and which Great Britain has always been ready to concede to us. It would also cut us off from the sources of our rivers, and probably also surrender the military post at Houlton, to which no claim has yet been set up by Great Britain. How soon it may be, under such concessions, is yet to be seen. The idea of a straight line from the monument to the highlands, which may be found conformable to the treaty, goes upon the ground that the point thus reached would be the northwest angle of Nova Scotia; it can rest upon nothing else. And yet Great Britain does not claim it as such. She knows too well where the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is to set up such a pretension. The ground now taken by her is, that the line of the treaty is impracticable; cannot be run; is void for uncertainty; and that there is no northwest angle of Nova Scotia. If so, why need we concede her more than she asks? Why agree to search for highlands westward of the meridian fixed in the treaty, upon the professed acknowledgment that upon such highlands the northwest angle of Nova Scotia may be found.

But, sir, notwithstanding the earnest solicitation of our Government, and the repeated assurances which were given that the mode proposed would lead to results satisfactory to both nations, Great Britain declined to accede to it, unless upon conditions, or modifications, rather, which were at once rejected. They required that the search for the highlands should be limited to the south of the St. John's; that it should be agreed that the St. John's was not a river falling into the Atlantic Ocean; that the bays of Fundy and of Chaleurs were not embraced within the term "Atlantic Ocean;" and they required, also, as a preliminary, an acquiescence in certain opinions or arguments expressed by the King of Holland, in his pretended award, which led him to the conclusion that the line of the treaty could not now be ascertained. I forbear, at this time, an examination of these opinions and arguments, although it would be an easy and an inviting task to show their utter fallacy. Our Government very wisely and very promptly refused to admit these modifications; and, after several years' effort, the proposition for a new commission of exploration and survey fell through. It is now renewed, and it is proper, therefore, to state the objections which originally existed to it, and which have lost none of their force.

In the first place, it presents but a part of the subject in controversy, or, rather, it proposes to adjust the controversy upon partial examination and evidence. The whole case is not presented. It seeks only to find highlands which divide the waters, as the only desideratum. It leaves out of view the great and only matter really worth inquiry, viz: "Where is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia?" It does not offer to find it, nor make any reference to it. And yet, this is the very thing, and, indeed, the only thing necessary to be found, to settle at once the whole question. Establish this, and all the rest follows of course. The northwest angle of Nova Scotia is the starting point of the treaty, and agreed upon as a point readily discoverable, and well understood at the time, to prevent future disputes. Let me refer to it a moment. The first article of the treaty is, "His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, to wit: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, &c. to be free and independent States." If nothing farther had been said in regard to boundaries, there could have been no serious question as to the extent of the limits of the new nation. Massachusetts and the other colonies had plain and definite boundaries, by their respective charters, and all that would have been necessary to fix our line on the northeast would be to find the bounds of Massachusetts Bay, as defined in her charter. But the treaty did not stop here. It proceeds, "and that all disputes which might arise hereafter on the subject of the said boundaries of the United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared that the following are and shall be their boundaries, to wit: From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia." The object of a more particular description of boundary is declared to be to prevent disputes in future. How was this to be done? Undoubtedly by the use of a plain and well-understood definition—one about which no doubt could fairly arise. The starting point is named, "the northwest angle of Nova Scotia." It was taken as a point perfectly well known; and it is remarkable that, upon this identical point, then so clear, then beyond the power of future dispute, the chief controversy now actually exists. The whole question turns upon it. But the treaty is more precise still. It would not leave in uncertainty what was intended by the term, "northwest angle of Nova Scotia;" it defined it, viz: "that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river to the highlands." This furnishes the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. This is the starting point. This is the point first to be sought for and settled. And yet the proposition for a new survey and exploration by commissioners keeps it wholly out of view. It is not once alluded to as among the purposes to be accomplished.

I said, several weeks ago, when I spoke upon this subject, that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was a point easily ascertainable. There is no possible difficulty in finding it. How is it formed? By the intersection of the northern line and the western line of the boundary of the Province. The original grant of the Province of Nova Scotia was made in 1621 to Sir William Alexander. The western boundary was therein declared to be from the source of the St. Croix, "an imaginary direct line, to be drawn or run through the country or over the land to the north, to the first bay, river, or spring emptying itself into the great river of Canada, and from thence running to the east along the shores of said river of Canada," &c. The western line, therefore, of the Province of Nova Scotia, originally, and in the outset, was a north line from the St. Croix to the St. Lawrence, crossing rivers and highlands, and whatever intervened, and stopping nowhere short of the shores of the river St. Lawrence. The northern boundary, at that time, was the river itself. In like manner, the Province of Massachusetts Bay, established in 1691, composed of several prior colonies, extended below Kennebec, or Sagadahock, to the St. Lawrence. That was the northern boundary of the several Provinces on this side of it. The western boundary of Nova Scotia has never been changed. In every public document of the British Government, and they are numerous, the western boundary is always and invariably a line due north, or directly north, from the source of the St. Croix. The northern boundary has been changed. After the cession by France to Great Britain of the Provinces of Canada and of Nova Scotia, by treaty of Paris in 1763, the northern boundary of Massachusetts Bay, as well as of Nova Scotia, was removed from the shore of the St. Lawrence southerly, to the highlands dividing the waters which fell into that river from those which fell into the sea or the Atlantic. This was first done by the proclamation of the King in 1763, and subsequently by an act of Parliament of 1774, from the last of which I will read so much as defines the southern boundary of the Province of Quebec:

"Bounded on the south by a line from the bay of Chaleurs, along the highlands which divide the rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea," &c. to Connecticut river.

Let any one look at the map of the country. The bay of Chaleurs lies far to the north and east. Draw a line from thence westwardly to Connecticut river, so as to divide the sources of the rivers flowing on either side of it. There is no difficulty in it at all. There is but one way to do it. Men cannot differ about it. That line gives you the southern boundary of Lower Canada, or the Province of Quebec, as it was called in the proclamation and act of Parliament already referred to, and, of course, it was the northern boundary of Nova Scotia, now New Brunswick, and also of Massachusetts Bay, now Maine. This new boundary of Nova Scotia was expressly recognised in 1767 and in 1771 in commissions granted to the Governors of Nova Scotia, then appointed. The language in both is—

"Bounded on the westward by a line drawn from Cape Sable across the entrance of the Bay of Fundy to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence TO THE SOUTHERN BOUNDARY OF OUR PROVINCE OF QUEBEC."

We know where the southern boundary of Quebec is. That is beyond dispute. A due north line, therefore, from the St. Croix to that southern boundary, gives the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and it can be nowhere else.

Now, the American proposition abandons this altogether, and abandons all the evidence upon which it rests; and by consenting, in any event, to deviate from a due north line, it admits what Great Britain so audaciously asserts, that there is really no northwest angle of Nova Scotia; that the point which the treaty of 1783 assumed to be so well known as forever to prevent dispute, is, in truth, nowhere to be found. The proposition is, that commissioners shall go upon the ground, and, by observation, by the eye, by exploration, determine where highlands are, from which the waters flow either way, and to such highlands draw a straight line from the monument. This, I say, surrenders the starting point of the treaty, and submits the question upon partial evidence. Our claim and our title stand upon charters, upon royal proclamations, acts of Parliament, commissions to Governors, upon maps, upon history; all speaking one language, confirming each other. Mitchell's map was published in 1755; it is now upon our tables. Let gentlemen look to it. They will see Nova Scotia and Massachusetts Bay both bounded on the north by the St. Lawrence, and the dividing line between them to be a due north line from the source of the St. Croix. This map was before the commissioners when the treaty of peace was negotiated, and upon it the new northern boundary of these Provinces, agreeably to the proclamation of 1763 and the act of 1774, was drawn in pencil, and the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was in fact thus exhibited. Several other maps, published about the same period, and many since that time—maps of British origin—represented it in the same way. Now, if a new commission is to be instituted, it should be clothed with power to examine the whole case, upon all the evidence, and not confined to the mere circumstance of finding highlands in any direction, except an easterly one, which turned the waters one way and the other; and to find them only by observation and examination. Why should not all this mass of documentary evidence be laid before it, to enable it to determine, not the question of highlands merely, but to settle the only really important question—the northwest angle of Nova Scotia? No mere survey can find that; no personal examination of the topography of the country. It does not stand up upon the face of the earth, staring you in the face. It is to be found by a careful study of the evidence, the documents, the charts, which define it, and by running upon the earth agreeably to the directions which these contain. No duties of this sort, that I can discover, are proposed to be devolved upon the new commission. I freely admit, however, that it may not be proper to hold the Government to a very rigid accountability at present, inasmuch as the proposal is yet very vague and indefinite. Possibly all these points may be well guarded and limited in a convention, should one be entered into. My object has been, chiefly, if my voice can reach the ears of the Executive, and, if not from me directly, I hope it may be conveyed by others, to point out the dangerous and the exceptionable features of the original proposition, in order that they may be guarded against hereafter. If this proposed convention is to be entered into, let it be done with a full and distinct knowledge of all the circumstances which attend the case with our eyes open. I speak more for the sake of giving warning in advance, if any thing from me will be received as warning, of the dangers into which we may be precipitated unawares. I say, then, that no commission ought to be agreed upon, with authority to depart, in any event, from the due north line of the treaty. Any other line, however obtained, would not be the line of the treaty. No commission ought to be permitted to determine the case, or any part of the case, but upon all the evidence. No commission ought to be allowed to proceed upon the principle that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is to be abandoned or surrendered as an impracticable point. No commission ought to be agreed upon, to determine, simply and alone, where the highlands are which divide the waters, and from highlands thus found to run a straight line to the monument, because such authority merely would be a departure from the plain language of the treaty, and from the well-known starting point, which it requires to be first fixed and ascertained. These are, briefly and imperfectly, some of the objections to the "original American proposition." Then, what are "the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government," which we are given to understand are to enter into the basis of the negotiation? Is it to be conceded that the St. John's is not a river falling into the Atlantic ocean? Is the definition of the word "highlands" to be previously settled? Are we to acquiesce in any of the opinions or arguments of the umpire, which led him to the conclusion that the treaty line could not at this time be run? These were modifications proposed in 1833 and 1834, and at that time promptly rejected. I trust they are not to be renewed on the one side, nor for a moment tolerated on the other. Mr. Fox speaks of the "modifications" as contained in his letter of January 10th; very little information, however, is gained by reference to that letter. The mode of constituting the commission I pass over, as not being one of the "modifications" suggested. There would be little, if any, difficulty on that score. The power and authority and duty of the commissioners, the object to be accomplished, are the material points.

The Minister states these to be "to explore the disputed territory, in order to find within its limits" ("within its limits". Why not without its limits, also?) dividing highlands, which may answer the description of the treaty; the search being first to be made in the due north line from the monument at the head of the St. Croix; and if no such highlands should be found in that meridian, the search to be then continued to the westward thereof. Indeed! why not also to the eastward thereof? But farther: as a matter of opinion,

"In order to avoid all fruitless disputes as to the character of such highlands, the commissioners should be instructed to look for highlands which both parties might acknowledge as fulfilling the conditions of the treaty."

Is this one of the "modifications" forming a part of the basis? If so, and if the commission is to be constituted accordingly, surrender the subject—abandon the whole question at once—give up—the territory will be theirs, "In order to avoid all fruitless disputes." We once agreed to the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, in order to avoid disputes; but, "in order to avoid all fruitless disputes as to the character of such highlands, the commissioners should be instructed to look for highlands which both parties might acknowledge as fulfilling the conditions of the treaty." This is one of "the modifications of her Majesty's Government." What is the consequence of it? Let us reduce it to practice. The commissioners will commence operations, for example, let us suppose, at the head of Connecticut river. They run along very quietly and amicably, eastwardly, on highlands which both parties acknowledge, a considerable distance, till they arrive somewhere in the longitude of Quebec, westward of the sources of the St. John's; and the British commissioners say, "so far we have gone upon dividing highlands." "Certainly," is the reply; "here we agree the treaty highlands exist." "We do." "Very well, these highlands continue no farther; the other rivers flowing southward are not Atlantic rivers. We can agree no farther, and now we must run a straight line to the monument." If we are coming into any such league as this, I say again, abandon the territory at once, openly and boldly. Why seek for any covert means of surrendering it?

But, sir, I need not spend time in showing the utter uselessness of the proposed commission, subject to the "modifications of her Majesty's Government." The Secretary of State has very fully and very clearly performed that labor already. In his reply, dated February 7th, to the letter of January 10th of the British Minister, he speaks of "The distinctive difference between the American proposal for the appointment of such a commission, and the same proposition when modified to meet the wishes of her Majesty's Government."

And farther:

"The American proposition is intended—and, if agreed to, would doubtless be successful—to decide the question of boundary definitively, by the adoption of the highlands reported by the commissioners of survey, and would thus secure the treaty line. The British modification looks to no such object. It merely contemplates a commission of boundary analogous to that appointed under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, and would, in all probability, prove equally unsatisfactory in practice."

Again:

"The modification of the American proposition was, as understood by the undersigned, so fundamentally important that it entirely changed its nature."

And in conclusion remarked:

"The undersigned, in conclusion, is instructed to inform Mr. Fox that, if a negotiation be entertained at all upon the inconclusive and unsatisfactory basis afforded by the British counter proposition or substitute, which possesses hardly a feature in common with the American proposition, the President will not venture to invite it, unless the authorities of the State of Maine, to whom, as before stated, it will be forthwith submitted, shall think it more likely to lead to a final adjustment of the question of boundary, than the General Government deems it to be, though predisposed to see it in the most favorable light."

Such is the original American proposition, with "the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government." "Inconclusive and unsatisfactory"—entirely changing the nature of the proposition—a substitute for it—"looking to no such object" as an ultimate decision of the treaty line, but a mere commission of exploration and observation and acquisition of topographical knowledge. Such purposes, and such a commission, on the 7th of February last, this Government expressly repudiated. It is now voluntarily proffered and invited. Why the change? What has induced it? The Secretary says it is "in accordance with the expressed wishes of the Legislature of Maine."

Where is the evidence of this? On the first of March last, Mr. Forsyth, in a letter to Governor Kent, communicated very fully, and candidly, and satisfactorily, the history of the negotiation upon the subject of the boundary, together with a lucid statement of the present condition of the subject, with a view of drawing the attention of the State to the emergency in which we are now placed, and inviting its advice and acquiescence in regard to measures contemplated by the Executive of the United States. The Governor, in a very clear, distinct, and comprehensive message, transmitted the whole matter to the Legislature, which finally adopted several resolutions, founded upon the letter of the Secretary and the message of the Governor, the third of which is in these words:

"Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the passage of the bill for the survey of the Northeastern boundary of the United States, &c. now pending in Congress; and that, if said bill shall not become a law during the present session of Congress, and if the Government of the United States, either alone or in conjunction with Great Britain or the State of Maine, shall not, on or before the first day of September next, establish and appoint a commission for a survey of said boundary line, it shall then be the imperative duty of the Governor, without further delay, to appoint forthwith suitable commissioners and surveyors for ascertaining, running, and locating the Northeastern boundary line of this State, and to cause the same to be carried into operation."

It is here, if any where, that Mr. Forsyth finds the authority for saying that the proposed negotiation is undertaken in accordance with the expressed wishes of the Legislature. It says, "if the Government of the United States shall not establish and appoint a commission for the survey of said boundary line." Does that authorize a commission for an exploration and survey of the disputed territory, upon the basis of "the original American proposition," with the modifications of the British Government? The meaning is obvious. If the Government of the United States does not run, mark, define, the line of the treaty, Maine will do so on its own responsibility. The "survey of the line" does not mean an exploration, which can lead to no conclusion, to no definite results. Such a survey was contemplated as should terminate in something; not an examination and report "unsatisfactory, inconclusive, looking to no results." The plain meaning of the Legislature was, if such a survey of the line as contemplated in the bill now pending in Congress should not be undertaken, then the Governor was to proceed to perform the duty devolved upon him by the resolution. Such was undoubtedly the construction of the Governor upon the resolution referred to. In his letter to Mr. Forsyth of 20th April, he says:

"I have no doubt (but upon this point I speak according to my individual belief) that the mode proposed by Great Britain, of establishing the treaty line upon the face of the earth, by a commission composed of impartial and scientific men, to be selected by a friendly power, would be satisfactory, and acquiesced in by this State; but that we should neither ask nor agree that any preliminary points should be yielded by either party."

He is cautious not to commit the State, but to express only his individual opinion; which is, that such a commission as is proposed to Great Britain would be satisfactory, "but that we should neither ask nor agree that any preliminary points should be yielded by either parly;" in other words, that no "modifications" should be admitted. Maine will agree, he thinks, to establish a commission to settle the question, according to the treaty, upon the whole case, and upon all the evidence, unrestricted by concessions, untrammelled by modifications, unembarrassed by new principles of surveying. Certainly, sir, this is going far enough; and probably the Governor is right in the belief that Maine, in the present exigency, would be willing to agree to this. But, I assure you, she would agree to nothing further. She puts enough at hazard, in this view; but she is reasonable, and knows that, in all controverted questions, whatever mode of determining them is adopted, something is necessarily put at hazard. This sentiment of the Governor by no means authorizes the idea that Maine consents to the proposed arrangement, inconclusive and unsatisfactory as it has been pronounced to be; much less does it justify the assertion that "it is in accordance with the expressed wishes of her Legislature." As further proof, I will cite the report of the joint committee of that Legislature, to which the letter of Mr. Forsyth and the message of the Governor were referred, upon this very subject. It says, "to such a conventional line, or to such a commission of survey, we believe the people of this State are not prepared to assent." Certainly, sir, the Legislature did not intend thereey to give its assent to such a commission of survey—the very commission now proposed! I venture the prediction that, ere long, the Secretary will receive from the constituted authorities of the State more decisive evidence than I can give that the State does not assent to the proposition which has been made.

I hope, therefore, if the Secretary has ventured upon the assumption that Maine has expressed its wishes in favor of such a negotiation, he will lose no time in retracting the proffered invitation. He has proceeded upon a false basis. Maine does not desire it; nor does she agree to it. She has not looked to have a commission established which shall have no conclusive powers; which cannot determine the question; which can result only in what Great Britain seems so much to desire—delay, procrastination, putting off the final adjustment of the boundary. It has been already delayed too long. One expedient and another, on the part of Great Britain, has been successfully resorted to, to delay—postpone—evade the issue. We are wearied of delays. We agree to no proposition which looks merely to delay. Now is the time; now let the question be settled. We think we are not unreasonable. We have waited a half century. We have been laboring more than twenty years, since the treaty of Ghent, to procure a settlement of this, to us, interesting and important question. We are as far from it, says the President, as we were at the formation of the treaty of 1783. When shall we be any nearer?

I said, sir, in the commencement of these remarks, that I would endeavor to point out a mode in which this vexed question could be amicably settled. It is by the passage of the bill which, some time ago, I introduced, and which has since received the sanction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Let the Government of the United States move in earnest, and no collision, no difficulty, in my judgment need be apprehended. If Maine is left to stand alone, she will be exposed to meet with opposition and embarrassment, and it may be with force. But she will meet it as becomes her to meet it. If the United States will but unfurl its broad banner there, that flag of protection and security, it will be respected. The purposes of the bill I have named may be executed amicably, if you will but do it. I do not say that that will settle the question of boundary conclusively; I know it may be still disputed It will go far, however, toward such a result. I therefore entreat gentlemen to permit us, the Representatives of Maine, at an early day to call their attention to this bill. I implore them to give it their countenance and support. I demand it as an act of right and justice. The proposed negotiation takes away none of the necessity for its adoption. I have endeavored, sir, to avoid any repetition up on the general subject of what I said some time ago. Much I could say, and much I desire to say, were it a proper occasion, upon the merits of the whole controversy. I speak now, however, only in the language of caution and of admonition, that the rights of the State, committed in part to my charge, may not be rashly and prematurely put at hazard, for the want of some voice to give notice of the danger. If it be heard, I shall rejoice; if it be not heard, I have nevertheless discharged my duty.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

SPEECH OF MR. CUSHING,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, Thursday, April 19, 1838—On the proposition of MR. UNDERWOOD to recommit the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road, with instructions to report a bill in lieu thereof, ceding the same to the States through which it passes; and MR. UNDERWOOD having concluded his remarks—

MR. CUSHING followed, and said:

MR. SPEAKER: The gentleman from Kentucky, who has just taken his place, appeals to the Representatives from Massachusetts, and inquires emphatically on what grounds they support this bill. I cannot answer for my colleagues; but, being thus called upon, I desire to speak for myself, and to explain the inducements which govern my own vote.

It is not, as the gentleman seems to hint, because of the fact that Massachusetts is a frontier and a maritime State, and thus becomes the seat of public works, commercial and military, constructed by the Federal Government, that I favor this bill; but for very different and much higher considerations.

Indeed, I profess myself wholly unable to appreciate the force of the argument on which that gentleman and his colleague [MR. GRAVES] rely so much, of the alleged inequality in the distribution of public expenditures, assumed by them to be implied in this bill. To suppose that each and every branch of the public expenditure is to be apportioned among the several States in arithmetical shares, is an idea that is utterly unsound and impracticable.

But I will not anticipate what I have to say on this point at the proper time. Let us take things in order.

Reviewing the debate on the bill yesterday and to-day, it seems to me that the course of argument in opposition to it has been too broad, and at the same time not broad enough; too broad, since it has been extended, on the one hand, so as to embrace many questions immaterial to its merits; and, on the other hand, not broad enough, since it has avoided the real merits of the measure.

First, the gentleman from Georgia, [MR. HAYNES,] what are his objections? He appeals to the economical propensities of the House, or rather to the slumbering sentiment of economy which he endeavors to awaken. He would have the friends of retrenchment show their faith by their works. But this argument proves too much to prove any thing. It may be applied to any and every bill, by those who dislike the particular measure. Its pliability and its indefiniteness evince its fallacy. I scorn the idea that the Federal Government is to be considered in a state of bankruptcy; and that every appropriation, however just and proper in itself, is to be cut off by reason of the temporary straits of the Treasury. Is the country wasted or depopulated? Have we not the same inexhaustible resources now as heretofore, in the fertility of our soil, in our widespread territory, in our rich mines, and in the industry, intelligence, and spirit of our people? I exhort gentlemen to cease declaiming on the emptiness of the Treasury, and use their influence for the restoration of the commercial prosperity of the country, by which the Treasury will be speedily replenished, as the natural and necessary consequence. Let the Administration abandon its empiricism on the currency question, scatter its chimerical schemes to the wind, sustain the banks in their laudable efforts to resume cash-payments, give back confidence to the business classes, and provide a suitable medium of domestic exchange, and there will no longer be room or occasion to deplore deficiencies in the Treasury. For myself, I mean to vote on this, as on all other appropriations, according to the intrinsic merits of each, and as I may think them to be required or not by the public service and the honor of the country.

Another thing The gentleman from Georgia conceives there is, in some way, a connection between this measure and imposts for the protection of manufactures. On this question, as on so many others, we have the tariff set before us, a sort of stalking horse of all work, a bugbear perpetually held up to the eyes of the House. I deny that protective duties produced the surplus treasure of the last few years. Indeed, that surplus did not arise from the tariff at all. For twenty years past, the aggregate product of duties on imports, though sometimes more and sometimes less, had been at the average, year by year, of about twenty millions. The increase of revenue, which led to the accumulation of surplus treasure, consisted, it is notorious, in the increased sales of public lands: independent of which, I aver that it was not the protective features of the tariff which contributed to the redundancy of the revenue, but the reverse; the encouragement which the provisions of the tariff gave to excessive importations of foreign merchandise, especially dry goods; as injurious directly to the manufactures of the country, as indirectly to all its other great interests, and one of the prominent causes of its existing embarrassments. But all these considerations of the tariff are wide of the merits of the bill, and ought not to prejudice it in the estimation of the House.

Other gentlemen dwell on the objection, that the passage of this bill places additional patronage in the hands of the Executive. So do all appropriations. And for this cause, must we, who are opposed to the present Administration, vote against them? Surely not, if the appropriations are just and proper in themselves. That consequence, the patronage they give to the Administration, is incidental to the Constitution; it appertains to the frame of the Government; and it does not become us to resist ordinary and reasonable appropriations, because of any vague or theoretic jealousy of the Executive.

The two gentlemen from Kentucky treat this measure as an element of the system of internal improvements, so called, and proceed upon such premises to discuss its expediency and constitutionality. I deny the premises. Touching the great question of the expediency and constitutionality of that system, I have no renunciations to make, nor any professions. I stand uncommitted; and I regard this bill as appertaining, not to that great question, but, as I shall presently show, to one greater still, and more vital to the welfare of the Union.

Denying the premises, of course I deny the consequences, of alleged inequality, and of questionable constitutionality, deduced from those premises.

The gentleman from Kentucky [MR. UNDERWOOD] suggests that Massachusetts has no share in this appropriation any more than Kentucky, and in that respect it is unequal towards each. Be it so. I do not contend for appropriations by apportionment.

But then he proceeds to suggest further, that Massachusetts, though she receive no appropriations from the Federal Government for roads, is compensated by her fortifications, naval works, and light-houses, in which, he seems to say, Kentucky has no benefit. Can the gentleman be serious in this? Does the interior of the country derive no advantage from the military defences on its frontier? Is not the country ONE? Yes, he admits at once, that we are one people, having a common welfare and a common destiny. And any advantages which the maritime frontier may derive from the military expenditures upon it, are more than counterbalanced by the consideration, that, in time of war, the frontier is the scene of danger and of terror. The same fortifications, which in protecting the frontier protect the whole country, have the effect, also, of telling the enemy to that particular part of country in which they are situated, and thus fixing upon that, and that alone, all the devastation and horrors of foreign assault. Would the gentlemen prefer to have foreign wars fought on the soil of Kentucky? Of course not; and to prevent this, to guard the whole country alike, is the obvious use of military defences in the frontier States.

In the course of his remarks on the alleged inequality of such measures, one gentleman [Mr. GRAVES] refers incidentally to the light-houses on the seacoast constructed by the United States. I beg the House to indulge me for a moment, while I clear up this point. I deny the supposed inequality of such works. At any rate, it is demonstrable that they are not for the special and exclusive benefit of the seacoast population. Take, in the first place, the case of a farmer in the very interior of the country, say in the heart of one of the Western States. He produces flour, worth on the spot only five dollars the barrel. If the same farmer lived in the interior of the State of New York, with a ready avenue to the sea by her canals, it would be worth nine dollars. The difference is chiefly the difference in the cost of transportation from the two places of production to a great wholesale market. In the city of New York it might be worth ten. If, by any magic art or miraculous power, you could make Indianopolis and Rochester each equally near to New York, you would equalize the value of flour in each. And you approximate to this object, in proportion as, by canals, railroads, or the navigation of rivers, you increase the facilities and the cheapness of transportation; the cost of which, be it more or less, is, in general, so much lost to the producer. Change, now, the supposition, and take the case of a ship-owner on the seacoast, whose capital is employed in the transportation of merchandise. In order to be able to pursue the business, he must derive a profit from it. There can be no profit, unless the freight-money be enough to cover the interest of the capital embarked, and all the current expenses of the business. As maritime undertakings are now pursued, the premium of insurance is a regular and invariable expenditure and charge, just as much so as the wages and provisions of seamen; and the amount of this premium depends on the risk of the voyage. In proportion as you diminish this risk, by the erection of light-houses and other similar aids of navigation, you diminish the premium of insurance, and the cost of transportation; that is, you augment the profits of the producer. The voyage will be made, and the business done, whatever may be the hazards of the navigation. That is not a thing for the hardy mariners of our seacoast to shrink from. Not a man less would seek employment on the ocean, if not a light-house had been constructed from Maine to Louisiana. But the difference would be felt in longer voyages, the more numerous shipwrecks, the augmented premium of insurance, and the greater cost of transportation; that is to say, in the diminished profits of the States which produce the great natural staples of the country, its cotton, rice, tobacco, corn, pork, beef, lead, and coal. Is not this the simple common sense of the light house question? Is there any defect in the proof? Instead of being an example of inequality, does it not show, in a clear point of view, the correspondence and real harmony of interests, which connect togeiher the remotest parts of the United States?

But enough of this. Let us come to the merits of the bill. I have said that I do not regard it as a question appertaining to the general question of internal improvements. To what class, then, does it belong?

On the face of things, it is a part of the land system of the United States; of the policy of the Government in the management of its public domain. There, in that class of questions, the particular measure had its birth; there is its history to be found; there the evidence of its expediency and constitutionality.

Ohio is the oldest of the States constituted out of the public domain. The act of April 30th, 1802, which provides for the formation of that State and its admission into the Union, concludes as follows:

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the convention of the eastern State of the said Territory, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection; which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory upon the United States:

"First. That the section number sixteen, in every township, and, where such section has been sold, granted, or disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto, and most contiguous to the same, shall be granted to the inhabitants of such township, for the use of schools.

"Second. That the six miles reservation, including the salt springs, commonly called the Scioto salt springs, the salt springs near the Muskingum river, and in the military tract, with the sections of land which include the same, shall be granted to the said State, for the use of the people thereof, the same to be used under such terms, and conditions, and regulations, as the Legislature of the State shall direct: Provided, The said Legislature shall never sell nor lease the same for a longer period than ten years.

"Third. That one-twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the said State, sold by Congress, from and after the thirteenth day of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, LEADING FROM THE NAVIGABLE WATERS EMPTYING INTO THE ATLANTIC, TO THE OHIO, TO THE SAID STATE, AND THROUGH THE SAME; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass: Provided always, That the three foregoing propositions herein offered are on the conditions that the convention of the said State shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress, from and after the thirteenth day of June next, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years, from and after the day of sale."

It was afterwards arranged (act of March 3d, 1803) that three-fifths of the reservation for roads should be committed to the custody of the State Government, to be disbursed within the State.

The State of Indiana followed, under the act of April 19, 1816, which contains the following clause:

"Third. That five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the said Territory, and which shall be sold by Congress from and after the first day of December next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for making public roads and canals, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects within the said State, under the direction of the Legislature thereof, and two fifths to the making of a road or roads LEADING TO THE SAID STATE, under the direction of Congress."

Under the act of April 18, 1818, Illinois, as follows:

"Third. That five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within such State, and which shall be sold by Congress, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for the purposes following, viz: two-fifths to be disbursed, under the direction of Congress, in making roads leading TO THE STATE; the residue to be appropriated, by the Legislature of the State, for the encouragement of learning."

Finally, under the act of March 6, 1820, Missouri, as follows:

"Third. That five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sale of lands lying within the said Territory or State, and which shall be sold by Congress, from and after the first day of January next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for making public roads and canals, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects within the State, under the direction of the Legislature thereof; and the other two-fifths in defraying, under the direction of Congress, the expenses to be incurred in making of a road or roads, canal or canals, leading TO THE SAID STATE."

Here, then, upon these successive acts, from 1802 to 1820, is the engagement of the Federal Government for a public road: 1. to and through Ohio; 2. to Indiana; 3. to Illinois; and 4. to the river Mississippi. It is an engagement of the United States. It is an engagement for a valuable consideration, namely, among other things, the exemption of lands sold by the United States from taxation, for five years, imposed upon each of those new States in the several acts for their admission into the Union.

In pursuance of this engagement, we have, in 1806, the act for the commencement of the Cumberland road, which expressly refers to the act for constituting the State of Ohio; as do later appropriations, for instance, those of 1825, 1826, and 1827, to the several acts of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri; thus recognising the engagement for this road to and through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. It is a compact, possessing all the parts and conditions of a contract, binding in strict law as between private individuals, and binding in honor and good faith between political communities.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] speaks of it as an "exploded compact." This expression, I confess, struck me with surprise. How "exploded?" Is it not a good and valid bargain for ample consideration on both sides?

[Mr. UNDERWOOD explained, that he did not mean to deny the existence of the compact, but that the conditions of it were exhausted; that it had been fulfilled on the part of the United States.]

Well, then, it is a compact; and, it must be admitted also, a compact onerous to the State immediately concerned; but fulfilled and exhausted so far as regards the United States. How so? Because the two per centum on the sales of the public lands within those States, conditioned to be reserved to the United States for this object, both present and prospective, has been already expended. Let us examine this point.

In the first place, the three per centum assigned to the States themselves, has that been used by them in good faith according to the compact? We have no official returns, it is true, to prove this, (Exec. Doc. 24th Congress, 2d sess. No. 61.) but I have been assured, by Representatives from those States, that the money has been invested in a proper manner, and, indeed, much more money for the same objects. And, moreover, that the public roads in those States have been constructed in reference to, and upon the basis of, this great avenue from the Atlantic to the Mississippi.

Secondly, as to the two per centum. This, we are told, has been expended, and therefore the work is to stop. But is not this a very narrow construction of the compact? A construction according to the letter which killeth, not according to the spirit which maketh whole? A construction, fit rather for a usurer's bond, than for a stipulation of mutual honor between great communities? And if we come down to close and literal readings of the compact, is it the true construction? The United States explicitly agreed to reserve two per centum of its receipts from the sales of public lands in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, for the construction of a national road leading from the waters of the Atlantic to and through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; the construction of the road is impliedly, if not explicitly, a part of the contract; it has been so understood by the other parties to the compact; and if the per centage, expressly reserved for the object, be not enough, good faith, it seems to me, requires that the means shall be provided otherwise.

If this were doubtful in the words of the compact, it would seem to be rendered certain by other considerations. I have argued hitherto, as if the four States referred to were the only parties to the compact. By name, they are. But, meanwhile, what is the practical fact? The Federal Government is the greatest landholder in the United States. It has a vast public domain for sale and settlement. It has held out inducements to settlers to buy its lands; among which inducements has been the understanding, founded on thirty years of legislation, that the road is to be completed; and more than a million, yes, than two millions, of souls, have planted themselves in the West, opening the forest, building up towns, constructing avenues of interior communication, upon the faith and trust that the Federal Government will comply with its engagements in this matter, according to their spirit and beneficial intent, and with a liberality becoming the national character.

Are gentlemen satisfied with this view of the subject? If not, then there is another view of it, broader, truer, which I desire to present to the House. Hitherto, I have argued it as a question of dollars and cents, upon the land system of the United States; but that, as before intimated, I consider a very superficial way of treating it; and I wish to go beyond and below this, into what is the root of the matter, namely, the policy of the Federal Government, that is to say, of the Atlantic States, towards the younger States growing up in the valley of the Mississippi.

Throughout the proceedings on this bill, I have been struck by the spectacle of so many votes and so many arguments, and those urged with so much zeal and ability, arrayed against the measure from two of the States on the Mississippi; and still more in reflecting that the greater part of these arguments are considerations of local interest. Kentucky and Tennessee exhibiting to the Atlantic States the weak points in the parental policy hitherto pursued by the Federal Government towards the valley of the Mississippi! Treating this question as a question of interest, which the two gentlemen from Kentucky have done, is not this a most suicidal course of argument? Is not the river Ohio the common patrimony of the States of Ohio and Kentucky alike? Giving prosperity to the valley of the Ohio, do you not give prosperity to the State of Kentucky? And though a particular appropriation be more directly for the benefit of Ohio or Indiana than of Kentucky, yet can it be good policy for Kentucky, in the consideration of general profit and loss, to exert herself to thrust away the parental hand of the Federal Government, once and forever, from the entire valley of the Ohio and Mississippi? It is not the first time I have observed the same error. I can point to important works, of undoubted constitutionality, needful to be adopted for the general well-being of all the Mississippi States, which have been lost, year after year, not by opposing votes of the Atlantic States, but by short-sighted dissensions among the Mississippi States themselves as to the proper locality of those works. And I recall to mind that, in the last Congress, a most honorable and estimable gentleman from Kentucky, not now a member of the House, [Mr. C. ALLAN,] applied to the school-fund of the Western States the same course of objection which is now urged against the Cumberland road. Indeed, the school reservations and the road reservations are parts of the same system of policy. And the local objections to such reservations, on the part of Kentucky and Tennessee, spring out of the fact, as it occurs to me, that Kentucky and Tennessee, though Mississippi States, yet were not constituted out of the public domain of the Federal Government. At any rate, this is the origin, and the only cause, that I know, of the inequality, as respects those States, of the appropriations made by Congress. It is not inequality, as between the entire East and the entire West, but inequality, as between the States of Kentucky and Tennessee and the other States of the Mississippi.

In order to explain distinctly the ideas I entertain on this point, I must ask the House to go with me into some few historical details.

On the 1st of March, 1784, Congress accepted the deed of cession by the State of Virginia of all the right of that State to the territory northwestward of the river Ohio, by which, in connection with the deeds of cession of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, and in virtue, further, of the treaty of peace, that territory became the domain of the Confederacy.

Immediately after this, Mr. Jefferson of Virginia, Mr. Samuel Chase of Maryland, and Mr. Howell of Rhode Island, were appointed a committee to report a plan for the temporary government of the Western Territory, as it was then called. On the 23d of April, 1784, their report, after amendment, was adopted, in the form of a resolution, which provided for the future division of the Territory into States; that it should ever remain a part of the United States; that the inhabitants of it should never interefere with the primary disposal of the soil by Congress, nor tax the lands of the United States; and that the States, to be formed in it, should have Republican forms of Government. As originally reported, the resolution also contained a prohibition of slavery, which was struck out; and the resolution was then passed, by the vote of all the States present, except South Carolina.

On the 20th of May, 1785, Congress adopted an ordinance for ascertaining the mode of disposing of the lands in the Western Territory; which ordinance, in addition to the fact that it systematized the surveys and sales, by parcelling out the land into townships each of six miles square, divided into thirty-six sections of 640 acres each, on meridian lines, and thus gave perfect certainty to land grants within the Territory, also provided that there should be reserved the lot No. 16 in every township for the maintenance of public schools within the same.*

Next followed the celebrated and memorable ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, reported by Messrs. Carrington Dane, R. H. Lee, Kean, and Smith, which developed and perfected the ideas of Congress, for the permanent regulation of the territory of the United States northwestward of the river Ohio. This ordinance, it will be remembered, provides for the descent of lands in the territory; it establishes a territorial administration; it secures to the inhabitants freedom of religion, trial by jury, the inviolability of contracts, religious, moral, and intellectual instruction, and the absence of involuntary servitude; and it marks out the future relations of the territory and its inhabitants to the United States. As a part of the United States, and inseparable therefrom, it was made subject to be divided into not less than three nor more than five Republican States; its navigable rivers being made free, forever, to the whole country; and its inhabitants being forbidden to tax the domain of the United States, or to interfere with the primary disposal of the same by Congress.

This ordinance, adopted by the unanimous vote of the States represented in Congress, and with but a single dissenting voice from any State, is the basis of the institutions of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, and of the Territory of Wisconsin. In fulfilment of its provisions, and of those of the two previous ordinances on the same general subject, were framed the acts for the admission of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois into the Union, containing, among other things, the reciprocal stipulations for public schools and roads on the one side, and the immunity of the public domain from taxation on the other side. And the acts of the 15th and 23d of June, 1836, for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, recognise the same principles.

Nor is this all. The United States, by acquisition from the Indians, cession from Georgia, and otherwise, having become proprietor of the territory now occupied by the States of Mississippi and Alabama, did, by the acts of the 7th of April, 1798, the 3d of March, 1803, and the 20th of April, 1818, apply to that tract of country the principles of the ordinances of 1785 and of 1787, except in the particular of slavery; in conformity with which, the act of the 1st of March, 1817, for the admission of Mississippi into the Union, and that of the 2d of March, 1818, for the admission of Alabama, contain stipulations correspondent, in their general tenor, to the compact in the acts for the admission of Ohio and the other Northwestern States.

* As reported by the committee, this ordinance contained the following clause, inserted, it is believed, at the instance of Mr. Rufus King, of Massachusetts, who was a member of the committee, viz: "There shall be reserved the central section of every township, for the maintenance of public schools; and the section immediately adjoining the same to the northward, for the support of religion. The profits arising therefrom, in both instances, to be applied forever according to the will of the majority of male residents of full age within the same."

This clause, after various proceedings in relation thereto, was amended, and, on the final vote adopting the ordinance, 20th May, 1785, stood as follows: "There shall be reserved the lot No. 16 of every township for the maintenance of public schools within the said township."

Furthermore. When the United States had acquired Louisiana from France, and Florida from Spain, we pursued, in substance, the same line of policy, so far as it was capable of adaptation to the particular circumstances. Especially the reservation for schools and roads, and the exemption of the public domain from taxation, in what now constitutes the States of Louisana, Missouri, and Arkansas, and the contemplated Territory of Iowa, are all recognised in the acts of the 15th and 20th of February, 1811, the 4th of June, 1812, the 6th of March, 1820, and the 15th and 23d of June, 1836; and in the act of the 3d of March, 1823, so far as regards the Territory of Florida.

Now, through the whole mass of this long course of legislation, beginning at the very close of the Revolutionary war, and coming down to this time, there runs one pervading idea. It is a beautiful, a noble one. It is not a bare contract of reciprocal advantages, though a contract it is; but it is not a bare contract, to be construed, or construed away, by the nicety of technical arguteness. It is the noble and beautiful idea of providing wise institutions for the unborn millions of the West; of anticipating together the social and the territorial development of the people, by incorporating its principles with the land titles derived from the public domain; and, as it were, kneading them into the very soil washed by the great Father of Waters. Such, I repeat, has been the elevated policy of the Federal Government from the beginning; the school reservations and the road reservations are essential parts of this policy; and, if there was nothing else to bind me, if there was no technical contract in the case, I would still maintain that policy unchanged, as the best in honor, and the truest in wisdom which America can pursue.

This idea, the dedication of the soil of the West to liberty and improvement, has been claimed for Thomas Jefferson, as the author of the resolution of 1784, and to Nathan Dane, as the author of the ordinance of 1787. It is a generous competition. Virginia, indeed, manifested the same patriotic spirit in relation to the public lands, as she did in the other great measures of that epoch. But the honor of this conception does not belong either to Jefferson or Dane, or to any other individual, but is the property of the country. They did but seize, and embody in the legislation of their time, the opinions which surrounded them. And, in illustration of this point, as well as to give a personal reason for my support of measures of this description, I refer not without a feeling of just pride, to the legislative history of the Colony and State of Massachusetts.

In Massachusetts, as elsewhere in the United States, all the land titles are referable back to the Government. England had certain rights of discovery on this continent, under which she claimed the soil, subject to the occupancy, not the fee, of the Indians; and from the Crown, through the colonial corporations and the proprietary or colonial authorities, the soil passed into the hands of individual settlers. The Colony of Massachusetts Bay divided its land into townships, which townships were granted to companies of settlers as they came from England; who took, therefore, subject to the eminent domain of the colony as to roads, taxes for education and civil administration, and the exigencies of war.

The Puritans of New England, like the Quakers, the Huguenots, and the Catholics of other parts of the United States, came hither, not in pursuit of wealth or power, as was the case with the Spanish conquerors of America, but under the domination of an idea. Their object was a moral or intellectual one; a sentiment, a principle: independence, in person and in conscience. To cultivate liberty, civil and religious; to establish Republican institutions; and to instruct, raise, and improve society, by moral and religious means suited to promote those ends—such was the sublime enterprise which they undertook in these wilds of the New World.

In furtherance of this object, the colony adopted the practice of incorporating public improvement into the land titles. For instance, when she assigned a township to a company of settlers, she made a reservation of one lot for schools and another for parochial uses; which practice was pursued by that State, not only in the original grants of her own immediate soil, but also in the disposal of her public lands in the now State of Maine. And in these primitive usages of the Colony of Massachusetts, I think I see the germe of the great principle, which, as I have endeavored to show, characterized the policy of the Federal Government towards the population settled on the domain of the United States.

Now, it was the fortune or misfortune of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee not to have been constituted out of the domain of the United States. It is true, the Government owns land in Tennessee, but it has not been administered according to the ordinances of 1785 and 1787, nor has it been a source of revenue to this Government. Hence, therefore, all the apparent inequality of the policy of Congress in regard to these two States, as distinguished from others around them. Congress may have the power, as proprietor of the domain out of which the other Western States have been formed, and may be under express obligation to do acts for their benefit, which it cannot or ought not to do in or for those two States. Nor is there any thing unjust in this. Kentucky and Tennessee are, in reference to this class of questions, to be viewed as old States, all of which have, or have had, a public domain of their own. Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, succeeded, at the Revolution, to the confiscated estates of Lords Proprietary, or to the original rights of the Crown. They, like the State of Kentucky, have managed their public domain as they saw fit, selling it, giving it away, or making reservations, as they deemed to be for their own interest. If they did not choose to make school reservations, or road reservations, they have enjoyed the equivalent in some other way; and it is no concern of ours. But Ohio, Indiana, and the other States which have grown up on the national domain, have not and never had a domain of their own, to be disposed of in their discretion; nay, they are precluded from taxing the lands of the United States at all, or lands sold by the United States for five years; and therefore it was just and proper that the Federal Government should, in the disposal of its lands, have some consideration for the wants of States thus peculiarly situated.

Is Kentucky alone in receiving nothing from the United States for schools and roads? What has New York received? What Pennsylvania? What Massachusetts? Not a dollar. They have established schools, dug canals, and constructed railroads, works of stupendous magnitude, and truly national in their scope and use, out of their own resources, unaided by the Federal Government.

I do not make these suggestions in any spirit of unfriendliness towards the State of Kentucky. God forbid. On the contrary the suggestions are extorted from me by so many complaints of the imputed inequality and injustice of the legislation of Congress. It is natural enough, I am aware, that, pioneers of the West in common with the people of Ohio as they have been, with gallantry and courage tried in a hardy frontier life even more than the people of the States around them, the people of Kentucky should feel the difference between the relations of themselves and of other Western States to the Federal Government. But, in respect of the trials of a frontier life, and of struggles with savage foes, I may be permitted to observe that the position of Kentucky appears to be peculiar, only because of her trials having been posterior in point of time to the perils and sufferings of the same sort undergone by the old States on the Atlantic.

Without entering very deeply into the question of the difference between the opening of artificial avenues and the improvement of natural ones, discussed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] I think I can perceive the origin of the unsatisfactory and unphilosophical notions of the late President on the subject of river appropriations. It seems to have been assumed—whether rightfully or not I leave out of the question—that the commerce-power is to be applied only to navigation. Hence the suggestion of tide-waters, and of ports of entry, as means of discrimination between river improvements that are local in their nature, and river improvements that are national. Whoever could have imparted such means of measuring the commerce-power of Congress, they are the ideas, not of a statesman, reasoning upon philosophical views of the subject, but of a mere lawyer, his mind filled with words and analogies derived from the laws of England. Our language is English; our laws also are English, much more than they ought to be. England is an island, an island of narrow geographical dimensions, as compared with the United States. Its river navigation is of short tide-water rivers, many of them simple estuaries of the sea. Thus comes the definition of the common law, making tide-water the test of whether a river be navigable or not—a definition which, however appropriate in England, is a mere absurdity, and the source of innumerable contradictions and anomalies, when applied to the rivers of the United States. It is a bad rule in the Atlantic States even, which, straitened as their territory is between the Alleghanies and the ocean, yet have rivers compared with which those of England sink into insignificance. Indeed, it is inapplicable to the tide-water rivers of the seacoast themselves. Thus, in Massachusetts, I am acquainted with streams which I can step across, and which are scarcely navigable in a birch canoe, and which, nevertheless, the law treats as navigable rivers, because in them the tide of the sea ebbs and flows. But if we proceed to the interior of the continent, and inspect that vast valley which expands from the Alleghanies to the Rocky mountains, containing magnificent fresh water rivers, thousands of miles in length, into which all the waters of England might be poured without raising their level a single foot, how preposterous it is to apply to them the test of tide-water or of ports of sea, in deciding the great question of the commerce-power under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus gone over the facts and arguments which induce me to support this bill. It only remains that I revert, a moment, to the consideration of the constitutional right of Congress to pass it. We have contracted to make the road: have we the power? I reply, in the first place, that it is in substance a contract anterior to the Constitution; that it is an old engagement of parental superintendence over the interests of the settlers on the public domain, which the Constitution expressly reserves intact. I reply, in the second place, that it is a contract which the United States has made, in the course of, and as adminicular to, the sale of its lands; and that it has the same power to make, or to engage to make roads, for the improvement of its domain, and the opening of it to a market, and the attraction of settlers to it, as it has to order surveys, or to construct a land office, in the furtherance of the same objects. I am utterly at a loss to conceive how the constitutional power can, in this relation, be denied. The objections to it are so minute that I cannot fasten them between my fingers for examination. As a great landholder, the United States, it seems to me, have the same power which any private landholder has, to make school reservations and road reservations, and to contribute to local improvements, thus augmenting the value of the land, and promoting its sale and settlement.

Sir, it may be, it must, that the relative political consequence of the Atlantic States will be diminished by the prosperity of the West. Be it so. It is the natural result of the development of the resources of the country—foreseen by our fathers, and admitted by them, as it should be by us—to raise up rich and populous States beyond the mountains, dividing with us the national power. But I cannot suffer myself to regard this question in the limited view of mere sectional interests. It involves the greater good of the whole nation, the good of the human race. The surplus population of the Atlantic States will continue, as it has done, to sow itself broadcast over the valley of the Mississippi. Are they not still our own posterity, our brethren, our blood, and Americans like ourselves? I rejoice in the spectacle of the Anglo-American stock extending itself into the heart of the continent, taking the place of the wild beasts and roaming savages of the far West, advancing with, as it were, a preordination of inevitable progress, like the sun moving westerly in the heavens, or the ascending tide on the sea shore, or, in the striking language of a foreign traveller, as a deluge of civilized men rising unabatedly, and driven onwards by the hand of God. I rejoice to see growing up in the West a prosperous and cultivated community, daughter of the East; nor shall I rejoice the less, though she rival the parent in splendor—Matre pulchra filia pulchrior. If, as may well happen, the expanding States of the West be fated to reach the remote shores of the Pacific itself, I desire to see them carry along with them the laws, education, and social improvements, which belong to the older States, so as to combine distant peoples, by the ties of mutual good-will, and beneficial intercourse, as well as of blood, thus overcoming the obstacles of time and space, and worthily fulfilling the great destiny reserved for this exemplar American Republic.

REMARKS OF MR. CAMPBELL, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, April 11, 1838.—The motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD to recommit the "bill making appropriations for continuing the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and for other purposes," to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill ceding the road to the States through which it passes, being under consideration, and Mr. UNDERWOOD having addressed the House in support of it—

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, remarked that, with the opinions he entertained, he would be wanting in his duty if he did not raise his voice in opposition to the bill now under consideration, and in support of the motion just made by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] He congratulated the House and the country upon the motion, coming from the quarter it did, as indicative of a better feeling upon the subject of public expenditure, and hoped, if successful, that an eternal separation would take place between the Government and this favorite object of internal improvement.

He would ask gentlemen whether the Cumberland road is more immediately connected with the military defence or foreign commerce of the country than a thousand others that intersect it in every direction, or whether the appropriations contained in the bill under consideration are not liable to the general objections applicable to appropriations for other objects of internal improvement?

He knew that this road had a sort of prescriptive right to the patronage of the General Government: that as far back as 1806, an appropriation was made for its construction out of the two per cent. fund, received from the sale of public lands, for laying out and making roads to the State of Ohio, under the "Act of 1802, authorizing the people in the eastern division of the territory on the northwest of the Ohio river, to form a Constitution and State Government." Whether it was then supposed that this road would become, what it has long since been, a charge upon the public Treasury, it is not material to inquire. We know that appropriations for its construction commenced in 1806, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, and have continued to the present time.

If this was a Government when constitutional powers were settled by precedents, the frequent appropriations for this road, extending through a period of more than thirty years, would be sufficient to establish the constitutionality of this bill. While, however, he protested against such a construction, he would waive its discussion, and base its opposition upon grounds of expediency.

He did not intend to condemn the policy under which this road was commenced. Arguments at that time applicable, have, from the altered condition of the country, now lost their force. In illustration of this, he would state, that the report of the committee of the Senate in 1805, recommending an appropriation to form a communication between the Ohio river and the Atlantic States, concludes with the following argument: "Politicians have generally agreed that rivers unite the interest and promote the friendship of those who inhabit their banks, while mountains, on the contrary, tend to the estrangement of those who are separated by their intervention. In the present case, to make the crooked ways straight and the rough ways smooth, will, in effect, remove the intervening mountains, and, by facilitating the intercourse of our Western brethren with those on the Atlantic, substantially unite them in interest, which the committee believe to be the only effectual cement of union applicable to the human race."

Sir, [said Mr. C.] these objects have been accomplished. The crooked ways have been made straight, the rough ways smooth, the intervening mountains have been scaled—not by this road only, but by the numerous communications that owe their existence, not to Governmental patronage, but to individual enterprise; to enterprise prompted by enlightened views of commercial advantage, and the strong stimulant arising from the hope of individual wealth.

Other arguments, applicable in 1805, have now lost their force. Formidable tribes of savages at that time hung upon the skirts of our infant settlements on the western side of the Alleghany Mountains, for whose defence it may have been proper to form a communication by this road with the Atlantic border. How changed is the prospect! The magician has waved his wand, and the transitions have been as rapid as the shifting scenes of a moving panorama! Those infant settlements have sprung up into flourishing communities; the extended force that then reposed in the deep solitude of primeval silence is now a cultivated country, whose fields teem with fertility, whose towns and vilages and cities resound with the hum of busy multitudes. Over a country, at that time untrodden save by the foot of the untutored Indian or solitary trapper, independent States now hold sway over a population, numerous, intelligent, patriotic, brave; a population that, except on the extreme frontier, is so far from requiring defence from others, we must look to with pride and pleasure as being not only able but willing to afford effectual assissance to their Atlantic brethren should they ever be invaded by a foreign foe.

The Cumberland road is completed continuously for some distance beyond the Ohio river, and has been worked upon in different places as far west as Vandalia, in Illinois within less than 100 miles of St. Louis, and more than 400 on the line of the road beyond the Ohio river. Mr. C. acknowledged the force of the argument that might be used in favor of appropriations to connect the different parts of the road, and thus to render what has already been expended available. But look, sir, said he, to the condition of the Treasury. The report made a few days since by the Committee of Ways and Means shows that on the first of January last, there was less than five hundred thousand dollars in the Treasury of the United States applicable to public expenditures. In the same report the estimated resources of the present year, including $7,000,000 of Treasury notes, are placed at $31,000,000. Of which $13,000,000 are estimated as the receipts from customs, and $3,000,000 from public lands; both of which resources are admitted, in the present condition of the country, to be uncertain.

Mr. C. had not, nor did he suppose that any gentleman, either in the House or out of it, possessed the data that would enable him to form a satisfactory opinion of the amount of duties that would probably be paid into the Treasury on the importation of foreign commodities; for the experience of former years will afford no criterion by which to judge of the present. It must, however, be obvious to all, that the fever of land speculation, which, under the influence of credits easily obtained, had been stimulated almost to delirium, is rapidly subsiding, and that the purchases of the public land will for the present year be limited almost exclusively to the demand for settlements. This last demand will be diminished at the public sales, from the strong and pernicious tendency of your pre-emption laws to induce emigrants to seize upon the best portions of the public domain not yet brought into market. He observed some of the representatives from the new States smile incredulously at this assertion. But with the most respectful deference to those who advocated this system, he could not but think that it held out an inducement to avarice that operated unfavorably upon the morals of our pioneer population. Mr. C. wished not to be misunderstood; he made no charge against that population, whose hardy enterprise had conquered the wilderness. Among them you will not find the rude unfeeling boor, that "against the houseless stranger shuts his door," but a population as much distinguished by generous hospitality as by a love of liberty and hardy enterprise—a population which, although perhaps destitute of some of those minor advantages that a higher degree of improvement will introduce, are clearing the way for towns and villages, and cultivated fields—a population whose energies have surmounted difficulties and dangers from which almost any other people would have shrunk in despair, that have conquered and are going on to conquer, that have laid and are now laying the foundation for future empires.

Mr. C. would now return to the subject from which, he said, he had somewhat digressed, and admit that the estimated receipts from the customs and the public lands were not exaggerated, and that the available means of 1838 would amount to $31,000,000. Deduct upwards of $16,000,000 not drawn from the Treasury on the first of January, of previous appropriations, and upwards of $2,000,000 of appropriations under permanent laws, and there remains less than 13,000,000 applicable to the appropriations of the present year. Deduct from this amount upwards of $5,000,000 for Indian hostilities, and upwards of $600,000 for the Canadian frontier, and there remains less than seven millions of dollars for the expenditure of the Government, including the civil and diplomatic list, the army, navy, fortifications, armories, the survey of the coast and harbors, the erection of light-houses, and all other expenses. It is true that the report of the committee estimates that there will be $11,000,000 of unexpended appropriations on the 1st of January, 1839, but Mr. C. contended that this did not weaken the force of the argument; for appropriations unexpended this year will remain as a tax upon the next, and the $10,000,000 Treasury notes that must be redeemed either towards the conclusion of the present, or early after the commencement of the next year, is more than equal to any temporary convenience that may be supposed to arise from the estimated unexpended balance of appropriations on the 1st of January, 1839.

We are as careless, sir, as if we were sailing under a clear sky, with propitious breezes, over a summer sea. But do you see no speck on the political horizon? It is no longer a speck; a cloud has arisen, whose dark shadow is thrown upon the prospect before us. Where is the faithful pilot? Why does he not warn us of the breakers on which, with every sail spread out to the deceitful breeze, we are madly driving? Where is the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] or the chairman of the Committee of Claims, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] those faithful guardians of the public treasure? Why do they not warn us of a national debt, as the inevitable consequence of unnecessary and extravagant appropriations?

Mr. C. warned gentlemen of the consequences of a national debt. If we contract a national debt, the "compromise act of 1832," which brought peace to a distracted country, will prove but a rope of sand to an increase of duties. Yea, more, the very next revolution of the political wheel may bring those into power who will not hesitate to direct the duties upon importations, constitutionally imposed only as a means of raising revenue to pay the legitimate expenditures of the Government, to objects of protection.

Scenes would then return, upon which he could not look back without feelings of unutterable disgust. Protection and anti-protection would again become the watchwords of parties divided by geographical lines. Local prejudices and individual avarice would again usurp in the halls of legislation places that should be consecrated to patriotism and virtue. The clamorous importunities of partial interests would again intrude upon our deliberations, and the American Congress be again converted into an arena for the most bitter contests.

If we would avoid this, we must, if possible, avoid contracting a national debt. A debt to some extent, from the present prospects, cannot be avoided. But it is our duty to refuse all appropriations, whether constitutional or otherwise, that are not absolutely necessary to defray the expenses of the Government. No gentleman can doubt that a large national debt will inevitably lead either to an increase of the tariff, or to recalling the instalments from the States. To say nothing of the consequences (of which we have recently had bitter experience) of suddenly diverting, by an act of legislation, a large amount of money from the channels in which it was employed, he doubted whether there would ever be found sufficient firmness in Congress to adopt the latter alternative. Even if the instalments should be recalled from the States, he doubted whether it would not prove to be calling "spirits from the vasty deep." You may, perhaps, recall them, "but will they come at your bidding?" Mr. C. intended to make no insinuation against the honor of the States; but, from the debates at the extra session upon the proposition to withhold the fourth instalment, he thought it probable that many of the States looked upon the deposites that have been made with them as legitimately their own property, and, under this impression, they will not willingly tax the industry of their citizens to comply with what they may believe to be an arbitrary and unauthorized demand.

Within the last two hours we have passed a bill containing appropriations for an exploring expedition, for the employment of naturalists, geologists, botanists, to examine the animals, soils, and plants of distant lands, subjects with which this Government has as much to do as with the "vespertilio homo, or man-bat of the moon." In such appropriations do we give evidence of our sympathies for the condition of our constituents, or afford a revelation of the calamities that await them from our legislation? Do gentlemen not see that, by unnecessary appropriations, they are sowing the seeds of bitterness between the different sections of this Union? That they are digging a mine which, when it is filled, as it will be, with the elements of wrath, a protective tariff, and fired by the collision of separate interests, will produce an explosion that may shake our political fabric? If public opinion does not rise against unnecessary appropriations, and the voice of economy be heard in this Hall, he would not say that the ruin of the country, but he would say that the oppression of the people, so far as an increase of taxes is oppression, will be the inevitable consequence.

The present is an auspicious time to commence a reduction in that system of extravagant appropriations, which certainly received a great accession during the time of a large surplus revenue, and there is no subject upon which we can with more propriety commence than the Cumberland road. It has long been a favorite object of Government appropriations, and, if we recommit the bill, with the instructions proposed, the people will at once be convinced of our sincerity, and that they must rely, at least while the Treasury is in an embarrassed condition, upon their own energies, with the assistance of the States, to effect such objects as an enlightened view of their interests may induce them to undertake. Individual and State enterprise are, indeed, the only legitimate, safe, and economical agents that can be employed in the construction of internal improvements not immediately connected with the foreign commerce or military defence of the country.

He appealed particularly to the public spirit of those gentlemen whose constituents were more immediately interested in the passage of the bill under consideration. No distinction, no honor arising from place or power, can afford to the patriot the consolation that flows from the conscientious discharge of his duty to his country; and no gentleman can discharge his duty who, in the present condition of our finances, will vote for unnecessary appropriations. No one need implicate himself upon the constitutional question of appropriations by the General Government for objects of internal improvement, by voting for the motion to recommit the bill, with the proposed instructions. The condition of the Treasury is surely more than a sufficient excuse.

In 1830, when General Jackson placed his veto on the Maysville Road bill, it was said in this Hall that he had raised to his memory a more imperishable monument than when he won the glorious victory that preserved the queen of our Southern cities from the pollution of a conquering foe, and, with her safety, the honor of the country. And yet, if he was not mistaken, he heard an honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] congratulate the House a few days since that more extensive appropriations by the Government for objects of internal improvement had been made since that time than during any other equal period in our history! Let gentlemen look to this.

As he had before remarked, Mr. C. did not intend to discuss the constitutional power of Congress to make appropriations for the objects of internal improvement, further than to say that the great variety of opinion that existed in relation to it should, if there were no other objection, make gentlemen hesitate to pass this bill. Leaving, however, the subject of constitutionality out of the question, it must be admitted that appropriations by the General Government for objects of internal improvement are partial in their operation, tending to the benefit of particular sections at the expense of the whole, and therefore inconsistent with that equality upon which our institutions are founded. To remove this objection, to make appropriations sufficiently extensive to embrace every section of the country having, or claiming to have, objects worthy of Governmental patronage, would create a vortex of expenditure that would ingulf the diamonds of Golconda and the gold of Mexico—would require a revenue, the collection of which would produce a wide-spread ruin, and, after exhausting the resources of the country, would be insufficient to accomplish the object.

To advocate appropriations for the Cumberland road upon the ground that it will enhance the value of the public lands in those States through which it passes, is almost equally inadmissible: for the same argument will apply in favor of the construction of roads into every wilderness where the Government owns land. Who can suppose that the opening of roads by the Government is necessary to attract the farmer to the virgin soil of the West? Who has not observed the tide of emigration, sweeping in its progress the population of the old States to this land of promise? The temptations are already strong enough to induce thousands to break through those local attachments, originating in childhood, increased by the associations of maturer years, "growing with our growth, and strengthening with our strength," until at last they entwine themselves around the affections with a power that nothing but that love of wealth that springs eternal in the human bosom could sever. A human tide has for years been pouring into the new States and Territories with a rapidity unequalled in the annals of the world, since, perhaps, those immense migrations recorded in history, when whole tribes of barbarians poured in upon and settled the territories of their less warlike neighbors, sometimes bringing with them their own institutions, sometimes adopting those of the conquered race. Whole districts of country in the old States have declined in population, attracted from a soil that in any other country would be considered as yielding a bountiful reward to the cultivator, to encounter the hardships and privations preparatory to converting the wilderness into the garden. Can any one, with these facts before us, contend that additional inducements to emigration are even desirable?

Our Western brethren labored under no peculiar disadvantages in relation to the means of intercommunication. They hold constant intercourse with the rest of the world, not by those majestic rivers only which, uniting their waters with the Mississippi, together pay tribute to the Gulf of Mexico, but by numerous other channels of communication which owe their existence to individual and State enterprise.

He hoped the motion to recommit would succeed: now was the time by its adoption to relieve ourselves of a work whose constitutionality is doubtful, whose benefit is partial, and appropriations for continuing which, in the present condition of the Treasury, must bring on us the reproach of reckless extravagance. Let us surrender it to the States through which it passes; if worthy of patronage, it will be continued under their auspices, sanctioned by the enlightened liberality of their citizens, and paid for by those who enjoy the advantage.

If an additional argument was necessary to show that the General Government should abandon not only this, but all other objects of internal improvement not immediately connected with the foreign commerce or military defences of the country, that argument could be found in the large surplus recently deposited with or paid to the States.

REMARKS OF MR. EWING, OF INDIANA,

ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

Mr. EWING said: I am not much surprised at the tenor of the remarks made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who has just taken his seat. But it was certainly little to be expected that such a proposition as that now before the House would have been made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] It indicates a new state of feeling when this gentleman can be found, upon the subject of internal improvement, acting at this time of day in harmony with the doctrine of South Carolina. True, the reasons which influence the minds of the two gentlemen appear very different, and the sun and the weather might be as well introduced into this debate as some of the topics which seem to have weight with both the gentlemen. Upon the one side discord seems to have arisen on account of the Louisville canal; and the evident desire to withhold this appropriation on account of prospective tariff views has been distinctly announced upon the other.

Now, to the gentleman from Kentucky it may be a pleasant exercise to talk—good for the body and the soul. But it becomes me plainly to tell that gentleman, on this occasion, that the Louisville canal is a State work, not constructed under a compact with the United States; and, further, to tell him that he greatly overrates his sagacity and intellectual strength if he thinks he can break down the obligations entered into by solemn contracts, and acted upon for thirty years, yet still hold the new States bound by their stipulations in relation to the sovereignty of the soil. It also becomes me, on this occasion, to tell the gentleman from South Carolina, with equal plainness, that the liberality and enlightened spirit which once characterized many of the statesmen of the South must have departed, if he thinks the people of the West will allow imposition to prevail forever, and a national treasury replenished, not by a protective tariff, but by sales of the public lands, five years exempt from taxation, to be wasted in schemes of useless fortifications and injurious breakwaters. I had believed that even South Carolina was now entering as a competitor for the Western trade, by encouraging a system of internal improvement; and I had hoped that the policy of her worthy delegation would have expanded with her local interests at home. That gentleman may be assured, if even high protective duties be necessarily resorted to by this Government, it will be because Southern sectional views overlook the wise policy of the ordinance of 1787, and the opinion of the best patriots and statesmen of by-gone days. The gentleman may rely upon it that a disregard of public faith involved in compacts with the new States formed out of the territory northwest of the Ohio, by which the public lands are secured, and the revenues annually coming into the public Treasury immense, will rather counteract than promote his much dreaded protective system.

But the gentleman from Kentucky, without entertaining any of the fears of a protective tariff, which seem to operate upon the mind of the gentleman from South Carolina, denies the validity of the compacts, and would also set them at naught; and, I must say, he thinks he has more wisdom than I believe him to possess, when he thus overlooks the matured action of those who framed the compacts and their binding validity. The gentleman from Kentucky calls the appropriation partial, estimates the amount already expended upon the road over and above the two per cent. fund, and says appropriations for internal improvement should now be abandoned. The gentleman talks of economy and an exhausted Treasury, and appeals to his political friends to arrest all such expenditures. The gentleman says nothing of the equal rights and sovereignty of the States under the Constitution, of the amount of taxation relinquished by the new States, of the fact that the United States, although allowed to extinguish Indian titles, are prohibited from an ownership in property, except for forts, arsenals, &c. to be allowed by the several States wherein they are located, unless by compact. He omits to tell us what, if any thing, Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, though which this road passes, have paid towards its completion, and forgets that this economy would be wild extravagance, if the road west of Ohio were now permitted to go to decay for want of means. His ideas of partial appropriations are most novel. The new States, under existing circumstances, pay a thousand dollars where they receive one, and this road, passing through seven States, cannot interfere with the progress of his Louisville canal, and has nothing local or sectional in it. If the gentleman would apply his arguments to fortifications, which really tend, in many instances, only to exhaust our Treasury, as well as to encourage a standing army, which may endanger our liberties, the Whig party, with an eye single to the good of their country, might then hearken to his admonitions. But this road, as I have already intimated, is not of a sectional or party character, and can in no way minister to party rancor or personal ambition. Earnest as I am to advance the interests of my constituents, and deeply as they feel upon this subject, I should feel myself degraded, as their Representative, by bowing and congeeing to partisans feeling or partisan views, and thus overlooking the great and important question involved.

And here, Mr. Speaker, allow me to remark, in relation to fortifying the seaboard, steam batteries alone can afford security to our coast, and should, in addition to our Navy, receive the aid intended for the defence of the Atlantic States. It may be different for the Western and Southwestern frontier. The Indian neighborhood may require a line of fortifications in that quarter. As to the abandonment of internal improvement appropriations, the gentleman from Kentucky is certainly at liberty to pursue which course he pleases. But the gentleman, I am sure, was of a different opinion when the Maysville road was vetoed, and, therefore, I am at liberty to infer that his present opposition to it arises from the fact, in part at least, that it does not pass through Kentucky.

I hope it is with the gentleman's Louisville canal as it once was with my toothache. I was told not to have the tooth extracted; it was a very important tooth, and a dangerous operation. Somewhat alarmed, I had it extracted notwithstanding, and immediate relief, without inconvenience, followed; and may it not be that the consequences of completing the Cumberland road will equally disappoint his fears, and tend not only to leave all the business necessary to sustain that small excavation, but also to employ the work of much greater dimensions, and much less expense, now about to be constructed on the Jeffersonville side, where a canal should have first been constructed? But let that pass.

But I trust he cannot take the consistent action and good faith of this Government along with him. Nor can he, although the gentleman from South Carolina is willing to repeal Congressional contracts, carry with him the constitutional, obligatory contracts under which this road is to be constructed. He can in no way blend it with appropriations made to effect objects not contracted for. It stands, as I have endeavored to show, upon distinct and different grounds, and no condition of the Treasury, no change of policy on the part of the gentleman, can exonerate this Government from acknowledging its obligations.

If the gentleman from Kentucky, in proclaiming the amount already expended upon the road, had also told us the amount already paid into the Treasury by the States west of the Ohio river, from the sales of public lands, with the cause thereof, through which the road passes; and if the gentleman from South Carolina, in making his appeal to the party with whom he now acts, had told them to cease all unnecessary appropriations, and to redeem their plighted faith, without these annual contests in relation to a matter involving the public faith, and the public good; if they had done this, the views of the one, and the State Rights doctrine of the other, would appear in a better aspect.

As to the policy of my friend from Kentucky in proposing the recommitment of the bill, with the instructions he offers, I can tell this House and this country, that when this road shall be arbitrarily relinquished, or ceded to the States through which it runs, without first being completed, or certain provisions made for its completion, and for bridging the streams over which it may pass, it will be found that the public domain itself will be relinquished and ceded by the same arbitrary act. Then, indeed, the new States, after much trouble, and many partial exactions, will stand upon the equal footing which the Constitution of the United States contemplated, and their State rights will then be defended.

The public domain within these States has been improved by the men who aided you in your Revolutionary struggles; who enabled you to secure the possession of lands without otherwise having paid for them, and who went elsewhere to improve and protect a new country, and paid for the soil; the proceeds of which has enabled you to pay your Revolutionary debt. They fought for your homes before they travelled West, and in the new States they relinquished their sovereignty and ownership over the soil, to enable you to redeem the obligations thereby incurred. Yet, the gentleman from South Carolina has brought the pre-emption bill into this discussion, as though it was an extravagant appropriation, made only for the benefit of the West. This public land topic, involving as it does, the harmony, union and equality of the States, is of too much importance to be discussed upon the present occasion. If the wise system, matured by the pre-eminent statesman of Kentucky, in the other end of this building, and adopted by Congress, had not been vetoed by a President who urged upon Congress to dispense altogether with the public lands as an object of revenue, then the truckling system of his successor, walking in his footsteps, whose financial views the gentleman from South Carolina now in part supports, would never have engendered heart-burnings and dissensions, with speculations and peculations and party subserviency; nor would the laboring settler of the West, seeking a home for himself and his offspring, after improving the soil, and securing, by his industry, the means of future competency, have to come here under the auspices of a specie-paying circular, asking of the Government the first right to buy the land which he himself had given value to by his own improvements. That gentleman may take my word for it, if speculations can follow a pre-emption law in Indiana, the speculators will come from other quarters of the country; the South and the East will furnish them. And, speaking of Southern settlers, although we have a few such visiters to our fertile region, I only lament their numbers have not been more rapidly increased.

It seems to be denied, Mr. Speaker, by both the gentlemen, that the completion of this road is an object of great national importance at this time. For military purposes, one of the first reasons urged for its construction, it is now said to be of no avail. The Ohio river, obstructed by ice for some months each year, the gentlemen think is now sufficient for the transportation of munitions of war. The reminiscences of the last war should better instruct them. But do we want no mail facilities? no facilities for commerce? none for social intercourse? Is every other interest to yield to military considerations? Sir, the paths of military conquest and glory lead but to the grave of our prosperity. Sir, the whole country, in all her relations, moral, social, political, agricultural, commercial, and mechanical, cries aloud for this appropriation, and will no longer be swayed by considerations of vainglory; nor can any considerations of this character be allowed to overlook this call, or trample upon and cast aside the public faith and public welfare upon which it is founded.

Sir, I have no desire, called upon thus unexpectedly by the course of the gentleman from Kentucky, to notice all the oft-repeated and oft-refuted objections urged against appropriations for this road; nor shall I speak upon an implied supposition that this House is unacquainted with the compacts existing, and legislation heretofore had, upon this subject. But there is a report of the Secretary of War upon our table, in compliance with a resolution of the other branch of the Legislature, showing what reductions might be made without doing injury to such parts of the road as have already been commenced, "without violating existing contracts." By which it appears that a bill had been reported in that body appropriating more than double the amount embraced in this bill; and with a view to effect the object which led to the call, a much larger sum is absolutely required than is embraced by the provisions of the bill before the House. The reduced estimates in the report adverted to is, for Indiana alone, $266,000, and this sum should now be allowed.

But at this time I will not trespass upon the urbanity and good feeling of the gentleman who argue against the smaller sum in the bill before us; our after action can remedy this defect.

I could now almost appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky in the language of Colonel Ethan Allen, at Ticonderoga, during the Revolutionary war, "In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress," to withdraw his motion to recommit this bill. If he should not, however, its defeat, I think, is certain. I will point the gentleman and the House, by an amendment which I send to the Chair, to the only equitable and legal mode of transfer which this House can adopt: by moving a proviso to his instructions to the committee, (if the bill be recommitted,) that the surrender of the road to the States through which it passes, shall be accompanied by an appropriation of an equal average amount of money to each mile of said road, west of that portion thereof already ceded to the States in which it lies, to that expended upon each mile relinquished, to be paid in three annual instalments, one of which shall be due upon the passage of the law.

Mr. Speaker, I will now take my seat, appealing to the intelligence and patriotism of this House to reject the proposition to recommit this bill. I am known to be the uniform friend of economy and reform; but I cannot believe in the rescinding of contracts by legislation, nor that the few hundred thousand dollars for a great national object, located in a section of country which enriches your Treasury and pays more than half of your income, would be either economical, just, or politic. Indeed, if there exists any proper rule of action, or principle of constitutional law, or policy becoming this House under existing circumstances, which could impel or justify a cession of this unfinished road, as contemplated by the gentleman from Kentucky, I have nowhere discovered it. The amendment to his instructions, which has been read, I shall insist upon hereafter, unless his motion be, as I hope it will be, in the mean time withdrawn.

REMARKS OF MR. GRAVES, OF KY.

ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

In the House of Representatives, April 13, 1838.—Mr. SOUTHGATE having spoken—

Mr. GRAVES, of Kentucky, next rose, and said: Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this discussion, and should not have risen now, had not the remarks of my friend and colleague, who has just taken his seat, rendered it necessary for me, in justification of my own course on this subject, to correct some of his misapprehensions.

He told us that this system of internal improvement in bygone days was a favorite with Kentucky. That, until now, her representatives here had presented an unbroken front in its support. From these remarks, it would seem that I, and such of my colleagues as oppose this bill, are acting inconsistently with our former votes. My colleague being a new member, and not having looked into the journals, has, unintentionally, fallen into an egregious error on this subject. It was my impression, and, on examining the journal, I find I was not mistaken, that none of the members from Kentucky in this House, with a single exception, have ever voted, since I have been in Congress, for appropriations for the continuation of this road. And, though I have not looked further back into the subject, I apprehend the same state of things existed for some years previously.

[Here Mr. SOUTHGATE rose, and said he was not informed, and did not undertake to speak of the course which Kentucky had taken upon the subject for the last few years, but of her course some years since.]

Mr. GRAVES rejoined. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is true, that, previously to the commencement of the last Administration, when it was proposed to conduct internal improvements as a system, before that system had received its death blow, and before the apprehensions of the nation were aroused upon the subject of Executive power and patronage, Kentucky did favor the system, and no one of her citizens more warmly than I. But, sir, my support to the cause was predicated upon supposing it was to be prosecuted as a system; a system founded upon justice and equality; by which the different States should derive advantages bearing some proportion to the amount which they had to contribute to the general fund out of which it was to be prosecuted. But the splendid system, which was originally contemplated, was defeated; and whatever has since been done by Congress upon the subject, has been partial, and without regard to the mutual advantages of the different sections of the Union.

The leading and most important objection that the original opponents of the system urged against it, was the great increase which it would add to Executive power and patronage. This objection was thought, at the time, to be trivial and invalid, owing to the fact that, up to that time, the Executive power had moved quietly in its own sphere, and had not used the patronage placed in its hands solely for the good of the people, corruptly to buy up power and influence. But, sir, I confess that the history of the last nine years has satisfied me that every thing that adds to the patronage and power of the Federal Executive should be scrutinized most closely; and never, without some very potent and overruling necessity, sanctioned by the representatives of the people. The appropriation and disbursement, annually, of twenty-five or thirty millions of dollars, by the Federal Government, towards works of internal improvement, would swell and increase the already giant power of the Executive in a degree to which I could not consent. The legitimate powers of the Executive, and those that have been assumed, have been growing so rapidly for the last few years, that it has very nearly swallowed up every other power known to the Constitution. Instead of adding to the already overgrown power of the Federal Executive, I feel anxious to see placed elsewhere a counteracting power; and, for myself, I prefer to see whatever accidental surplus there may remain in the Treasury after a cheap and economical Administration, divided among the States, to be appropriated to such objects as they may designate. As far as I can learn, there remains a very small remnant of the old advocates of internal improvements, who desire to see the system revived by the Federal Government. Such works as are about of equal importance to several States, and could not be appropriately accomplished by any one of them—such, for instance, as the improvement of the principal rivers of the country, the navigation of which is equally important to several States; the erection of fortifications, light-houses, and harbors; the building and maintaining a navy to protect the common commerce of the country—must be accomplished, of necessity, out of the common funds of the nation.

The result of the most deliberate consideration which I have been able to give this subject is, that the roads in the different States, and the improvement of the navigation of the rivers, in the commerce of which the States through which they pass are alone or mainly interested, had better be made by authority, and out of the means of the different States. For many of the States, under the impression that the system of internal improvement by the Federal Government had been abandoned, have proceeded to borrow money on their own account, to make their own roads, and some of them also to improve the navigation of their own rivers.

Kentucky, in common with other States, has contracted a heavy debt to improve her roads and rivers, and she feels that she has already greatly increased the resources of her people, and the value of their property. It would be unjust and unequal for similar works to be accomplished out of the Federal Treasury for the benefit of the people of other States.

But is is contended that the Cumberland road has been in progress for a great number of years; that it is a great and a magnificent work; one which has been thus far accomplished by the munificence of the whole nation; an object of which we should all be proud, and therefore we should carry it to the far West. The premises are true, but the conclusion is a non sequitur. The question is not whether this road should be finished to the Mississippi; but it is, should it be accomplished by the Federal or State Governments? That this road will be accomplished is as certain as that the three great States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, shall march on to the great and glorious destiny that awaits them. That the road, when accomplished, will greatly enhance the landed property in those States, to an extent almost, if not quite, as great as the cost of constructing it, is abundantly apparent from the experience of older States, which have finished their roads. It is not right that the money of other members of the Union should be taken to make improvements for the almost exclusive benefit and convenience of these States, without any prospect of having similar favors reciprocated.

Kentucky has been a member of this Union for forty years, constituting about one-eighteenth part of the entire nation, and contributing to the National Treasury about in that proportion; still, for the great national objects of internal improvements, light-houses, fortifications, &c. to which so many millions have been elsewhere appropriated, not one cent has been appropriated within her limits. This, together with the additional fact that Kentucky is the only State in the Union thus situated, appears from a report of the Secretary of the Treasury made in 1835, in obedience to a call from Congress for information upon the subject of the amount of expenditures in the different States from the foundation of the Government.

Still my colleague says that the system of internal improvement is founded in justice, that it is a unit, and that he will support appropriations for it whenever and wherever proposed, though his own State should never get a cent from the Federal Treasury for similar purposes. In this I differ from him. I can never consent to go for a measure because of its bearing a particular name. It is the merits of a measure that commend it to my support, and no misnomer can divert my attention from them.

I have heard the imputation of selfishness, of narrow, penurious and unstatesmanlike views too often attributed to the representatives of Kentucky on this floor, to suffer the charge to go unnoticed. Sir, it is unjust; and gentlemen take a superficial view of the considerations which govern their course upon this and other extravagant appropriations. Am I to be told by statesmen here, that it is selfish and unstatesmanlike in the representatives of Kentucky to oppose liberal appropriations for the improvement and advancement of other sections of the Union, because their State does not come in for a share? Gentlemen surely pay a very poor compliment to the understanding or patriotism of the representatives of Kentucky if they suppose they can be made to abandon the interest of their constituents, and the principles of immutable justice, by such declamation.

The basis upon which is founded our blessed Union is, that its burdens and benefits shall be as equal as in the nature of things they can be rendered. Once establish the principle, that the assessment of taxes, to bring money into the Treasury, is to be equal and uniform upon every portion of the Union, and that all your disbursements are to be made, without regard to equality, for the benefit of particular sections, and you will find the people of the other sections will not submit to it.

Government is formed for selfish and interested motives, but not in the odious sense of these terms. Governments are composed of individuals, who agree to bear the burdens and contribute to the maintenance of Government, for the interested and selfish purposes of making a good bargain; by which they receive in exchange what is of greater value than that with which they part; by which they the better secure to themselves the more important rights of life, liberty, and property, in exchange for the less important natural rights, with which every one emerging from a state of nature into a government of laws must of necessity part.

I greatly misunderstand the people of Kentucky if, from a fear of being considered selfish, they quietly and willingly submit to bear her proportion of the burdens of an extravagant and prodigal Administration, without demanding some participation in the heavy disbursements of the Government. Can it be expected that the State of Kentucky will quietly submit to the state of things that we have witnessed for the last few years? The last Congress appropriated upwards of seventy millions of dollars; about four millions of that sum was contributed by Kentucky. And to what extent has she shared in the disbursements? Very little more than if she had been a foreign Government, except in the general interest which she incidentally receives from appropriations made to objects alike interesting to other States. It is true she has a great interest in the improvement of the Ohio, Cumberland, and Mississippi rivers, in common with the other twelve States that navigate the waters of those rivers. In the appropriations made to those objects she has, I admit, this common interest. It must be recollected the sum appropriated to this object, when the amount of interests involved is considered, was very inconsiderable.

There is a subject, however, in which Kentucky has for some years past felt a deep interest, at least such portions of Kentucky as have given their particular attention to the subject. I allude to the proposition for the Federal Government to purchase up and make free the navigation of the Louisville and Portland canal, which has been for more than four years depending before Congress, but upon which Congress has failed and refused even to act. [Here Mr. MERCER rose, and said that the gentleman from Kentucky had fallen into an error, for, during the time of his predecessor, he recollected the subject was taken up and debated somewhat at length.] Mr. GRAVES said it was true this House, through courtesy to his very worthy predecessor, [Mr. POPE,] had consented to take up the subject, to allow him to address the House, and that the subject was then discussed for a part of one day, but that no vote of this House was ever taken upon it. Although this subject is equally interesting to some of the other twelve States that navigate the Ohio river, the importance of it is very little understood by those who are at a distance, and have not looked into it. In 1831, the first year that the navigation of that canal was opened, it collected tolls amounting to but between twelve and thirteen thousand dollars; but so rapid has been the increase of the commerce of that river, that the tolls of the canal, in 1837, amounted to upwards of $145,000, which enabled the stockholders to declare a dividend of 13 per cent, and I apprehend the tolls collected by the canal during the present year will enable the stockholders to run their dividend up to 18 per cent. the maximum amount which the company can divide under their charter. But this might be borne if it were the highest amount to which the burdens upon the commerce of that river were subject to be carried. Widely different, however, is the case. For a company of enterprising individuals, seeing that the commerce of that river was increasing so rapidly that in a few years it would be sufficient not only to enable the stockholders in the present canal to declare their maximum dividends, but also to supply business enough for another canal to enable its stockholders to declare an equally large dividend on the amount necessary to construct one on the Indiana side of the Ohio, have proceeded to procure a charter from the State of Indiana to construct another canal, and are now proceeding with steps preliminary to the commencement of the new work; and unless Congress shall do something on the subject this session, indicating an intention to make the navigation of the present canal free, they will doubtless proceed with their work, which I have no doubt will cost $2,000,000. Eighteen per cent. upon this sum, and upon the cost of the present canal, will amount to about $540,000, which, together with the sum necessary to keep in repair and pay for superintending both canals, will amount to but little if any less than $600,000 per year. This vast sum will eventually be collected, should Congress persist in refusing to free the present canal, as a perpetual annual tax upon the commerce of that river. The Government, in the last three years, has appropriated $270,000 to deepen the overslaugh on the Hudson river, without ever conceiving the idea of imposing tolls upon its navigation, whilst it is drawing 13 per cent. off the stock it took in the Louisville and Portland canal, which was made to obviate a similar but a much more formidable obstacle in the navigation of the Ohio river. With all these facts before us, can it be just to impeach the Representatives from Kentucky with selfishness, in the odious sense of the term, for resisting extravagant appropriations, whether to the Cumberland road or other objects?

If any other appropriations are to be made to the Cumberland road, it would seem to me to be much more reasonable that it should be extended from some suitable part of it, to which it is already finished, to a point in Ohio, opposite to Maysville, Ky. where it would connect with the Maysville and Lexington turnpike, and the other turnpikes which Kentucky is now constructing to the Tennessee line, and, by means of roads which that State proposes to construct, connect with the States of Alabama and Mississippi, and in this way furnish a land communication, when the Ohio river is closed, between the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, and the Eastern States. For as things now are, all who travel from the South and Southwest eastwardly, in the winter, when the Ohio is closed, encounter more difficulty and greater expense in getting from Maysville, Ky. to the most eligible point on the National road, than is incurred in other seasons of the year in travelling from Louisville to Philadelphia. And although the States of Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana, by means of the roads which the last two States propose making, could connect with the Kentucky roads at Louisville, and thus get on by this track from Maysville to the present National road, I doubt not I should at once be reproached with selfishness, were I to propose it.

Whenever the Representatives from the West and Southwest commence complaining about the great inequality in the disbursements of this Government, we have a learned and able lecture delivered to us to convince us that we are interested to an extent equal to any quarter of the country in the formation of harbors and light-houses in the Atlantic States, because they render the navigation safer, and consequently cheaper. We are told that we who have produce to send East are the very persons most interested in those seacoast works. No man here is so transcendently ignorant on this subject as not to know that every portion of the people of this Union have some interest, to a greater or less degree, in these works, and indeed in the improvement of every river, and in the construction of every road and canal in any of the States, upon the principle that whatsoever cheapens and renders more safe and commodious travel and commerce between the different quarters of our country, is calculated to benefit each and every portion of it. But an Atlantic gentleman might also be told that he should consent to improve, out of the common funds of the nation, by locks and dams, if you please, all of our little Western rivers, because it renders safer and cheaper the navigation of those rivers, and enables the producer of flour, pork, &c. to bring those articles to them cheaper. Each proposition is equally true. But, sir, enough of this; it is understood by all of us. It is known that whilst every portion of the country has a general interest in improvements at distant points, we all feel we have a more particular and special interest in improvements at home.

But to return more immediately to the subject. The advocates of this bill say, are not good roads a great convenience to the people? is it not right and proper that roads should exist? can they be made without money? They answer these questions in the affirmative, and conclude quod erat demonstrandum; ergo, this appropriation should be made. If, from such premises, such conclusions may be drawn, then indeed the other argument, which has been urged, that this appropriation should be made because others have been made to the same object, may also be sound. But for myself, I must be allowed to withhold my vote from giving the money of my constituents to a cause depending for its support upon such grounds. A cause that can only be sustained by such arguments, does surely not commend itself very strongly to the favor of this House. But how, it may be asked, have appropriations to this object been carried year after year since the overthrow of the system of internal improvements? In the first place, there is, and ever has been, a certain very small interest in both Houses of Congress who still entertain a hope and belief that this system will be revived upon a broad and magnificent scale, penetrating every quarter of the Union. There are others who are partial to this particular work from early recollections, and entertain for it a kind of paternal regard. There is, then, another interest, consisting of eight Senators and thirty one members, coming from the four Northwestern States most directly and deeply interested in this work. And then there is another, and much the largest interest, consisting of the representation of the seaboard States, whose policy is to run the appropriations up from the old cheap standard of twelve or thirteen millions to thirty or forty millions annually; for the very obvious reason that the great bulk of the appropriations is in their States. Take from this last and largest interest the thirty-one votes in this House and the eight votes in the Senate before mentioned, and they could not have run the appropriations of last Congress up to exceeding seventy millions of dollars. It is a combination of interests, constituting a majority of Congress, that produces both the enormous amount and great inequality of appropriations.

Already have seven millions been appropriated towards this road, and if it is to be continued, as some propose, through Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana, it must cost perhaps three or four times as much more. If it be not extended so far as this, however, I would inquire where is the point at which we can more properly stop than that to which the road is now extended? We have greatly more than exhausted the two per cent. fund, and I think are under no obligation of implied faith to prosecute this work more than any other great and important road. I cannot, therefore, give my support to this bill proposing to appropriate $450,000 towards the continuation of this road.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

SPEECH OF MR. POPE,

OF KENTUCKY,

In the House of Representatives, Thursday, April 12, 1838—On the proposition of MR. UNDERWOOD to recommit the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road, with instructions to report a bill in lieu thereof, ceding the same to the States through which it passes.

MR. POPE addressed the Chair as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: The assault made on this bill by my colleague [MR. UNDERWOOD] was indeed unexpected, and especially at this stage of the proceeding. I was the more surprised that the opposition should come from one of those who had so long rallied under the banner of the great champion of the American System, to whom a monument has been erected on this great National road. Sir, before I accepted a seat in the Committee of Ways and Means, I consulted most of my colleagues with whom I was desirous to act in harmony about the propriety and policy of participating in the labors of that committee. I acquiesced in the nomination to fill the vacancy with the approbation of my Kentucky friends.

Permit me here to mention that I never was, since I fully explored the subject, in favor of a general diffusive system of internal improvements, such as the States were fully competent to make without the aid or agency of the National Government. Improvements of local character should be left to the local Governments; and those only of a decided national character, as declared by President Jackson, are within the legitimate action of this Government. Neither time nor circumstance have changed my views on this and other subjects of primary importance. I believed, twenty seven years ago, after full and impartial consideration, that a National Bank was a useful and necessary fiscal agent, and the best regulator of our paper currency; and that opinion I have maintained, under all circumstances, through good and evil report. This Cumberland road was commenced near the Potomac river nearly thirty years ago, when I was a member of the other House. I was for that road then, as necessary and proper, and a work of great national utility in a political, commercial, and social view. When I first crossed, in the fall of 1807, the immense body of mountains between the Potomac and the Ohio, and cast my eyes from their lofty summits to the extensive region of the West, and turned them to the States bordering on the Atlantic, I was deeply impressed with the thought that this mountain barrier had been placed there for the mutual defence and security of independent nations; and that, to bind together the people of the East and West, by whose joint counsels and arms liberty and independence had been achieved, it was necessary to cut down this great wall of separation. I could not believe that the old devious and miserable road made by Braddock and Washington, about the middle of the last century, was to remain the only medium of intercourse between the Eastern and Western waters. Pennsylvania had no interest then, nor has she now any special interest in this road. Her local views and policy led her to improvements in a different direction. The plan of making this great road from the Potomac to the Ohio had its origin with the first statesmen of Virginia; and the foundation was laid under the administration of Mr. Jefferson. At the threshold, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that this road does not rest on the general power or policy of making internal improvements, but is based on solemn compacts with Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, and the strongest implied pledges of this Government to those States to make this great National road to the Mississippi river, for which this bill now under consideration makes an appropriation.

The superintendents or engineers employed on this road, through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, made an estimate of more than one million of dollars for the present year; but the committee, considering the present condition of the Treasury, concurred with the Secretary of War in believing this sum ought to be reduced to $450,000, which he thought sufficient to keep the work in progress during the present year, and prevent the loss of materials which had been collected and prepared for bridges, and injury to those parts of the road which had been graded in the three States. To me, sir, was assigned the duty of reporting this bill, and to attend to its progress in the House. It was referred to a Committee of the Whole, where it was expected to be assailed if opposition was to be encountered. It passed through the Committee of the Whole, and was reported to the House with little or no opposition, and, when the question was about to be put on its engrossment, an unexpected assault was made on it by one of my colleagues, [MR. UNDERWOOD,] from whom I least expected such a course. I certainly expected the cordial co-operation of the representative from Kentucky. He opposes it because no general system of internal improvement has been, or is likely to be, established by Congress. Of this objection I can only say that I cannot anticipate what Congress will do, but must be regulated in my support of this bill by the past action of the Government. I certainly did not, Mr. Speaker, expect to be called on to explore this whole subject for the last thirty or forty years, during which this Government has been making appropriations almost every year for this great national work. My colleague lays much stress on the amount this road has cost. I have not made an estimate of the amount, but presume it is large. It is proper to observe, however, that a large portion of the sum has been expended between the Potomac and Ohio rivers, before you enter the territory of any of the States mentioned in the bill, and we should bear in mind that this road was commenced before road-making was well understood, and that the first experiment of paving the road between this and Wheeling in a great measure failed, and a large amount was expended in repairing it and re-making it on the Macadamized plan. On this branch of the subject I do not intend to dwell. It is urged, also, that the condition of our Territory forbids this appropriation. To this I might answer that it has not prevented other appropriations. We granted $100,000 to the heirs of Robert Fulton, about $75,000 more than was ever claimed before either by Mr. Fulton or his representatives. We have appropriated probably a million of dollars or more to send out an exploring expedition to distant seas, which had been authorized by Congress two years ago. Why did not the poverty of our Treasury arrest these appropriations? It was thought that our character as a nation would suffer in the eyes of the world if we abandoned this expedition after having undertaken it; that we, the second commercial nation in the world, and aspiring to become a great naval power, ought to contribute something to make discoveries in other parts of the globe, for the benefit of our enterprising citizens, to expand the theatre of commerce and navigation. It is very true that the condition of the Treasury ought to admonish us to suspend appropriations for new works not commenced, and to reduce them for works now in progress as much as practicable, so as to prevent loss or very material injury.

I was deeply impressed with these considerations in making the appropriation less than half the amount desired by the representatives from the States more directly interested. Sir, we know that if this road is abandoned, it will never be finished by the States. Their local interests will prompt them to expend their funds for very different improvements. They consider it a national work, and, although undoubtedly advantageous to them, less so than other roads and canals in which they are made deedly concerned. It is well known that many have purchased and settled at higher prices on the route designated for this road than they would have done but for the expectation authorized by the uniform and long-continued policy of Congress; and it would seem to me that nothing tends more to lessen the confidence in and respect for the Government than an unstable, whimsical, and fickle course. Another objection is made by my colleague that we ought to refuse this appropriation because Kentucky has not received that justice to which she is entitled. I cannot think this a fair or statesmanlike ground of opposition to this bill. Shall we, because we have not obtained what we desired, violate the solemn compacts and implied pledges of our Government, to the injury of our neighbors and the whole West? Certainly not. I cannot, I confess, perceive the force of this objection. Will it be seriously contended that we ought to wrong our friends and neighbors, and the whole West, because this Government has done us wrong? We are connected with the Western States bordering on the Ohio by the strongest ties, political, commercial, and social; and it is our duty and interest to treat them with justice, liberality, and kindness. After the year 1840 they will be able, by their increased strength and influence, to afford us much aid in obtaining all that justice from the National Government to which Kentucky may have a fair claim. Kentucky is identified, in interest and policy, with the whole West. If making this road directly benefits our neighbors, it must indirectly benefit Kentucky. If it will tend to enrich and populate the Western country, no Western man, it would seem to me, ought to oppose its progress. I am not for expending more money this year on this road than what is necessary to keep the work in motion, and prevent loss and injury. This Government has, in numerous instances, expended money in making roads through her Western lands to promote their sale and settlement, to which no Western statesman has heretofore objected; and of her power to do so no person, the most strict constructionist, has ever doubted. Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. P.) I have said that this Government ought to prosecute this work, in compliance with her solemn compact and implied faith; and I hope to make this apparent by a retrospect of the several continued acts of this Government for nearly thirty-five years.

By an act passed on the 30th April, 1802, Congress authorized the people of Ohio to form a Constitution, and come into the Union, upon certain terms and conditions therein prescribed, the most material of which were, in substance, that Congress would grant to the State of Ohio the sixteenth section in every township, for the use of schools, and that one-twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within the limits of said State, sold by Congress after the 30th day of June, 1802, should be applied to laying out and making public roads from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the States through which they should pass: provided, always, that the propositions aforesaid were offered to the State of Ohio on the express conditions that the convention of said State should provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress from and after the 30th day of June, 1802, should be and remain exempt from any tax laid by or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale. A modification of the terms was afterwards agreed on, by which three per cent. of the land fund reserved was to be applied to internal improvements within the State, under the direction of the said State. Independent of high political considerations, of which I shall speak hereafter, the leading inducement with Congress to grant lands for schools and roads, and to exempt their lands sold from taxation for five years, was to promote and facilitate the settlement and sale of their extensive domain in the northwest.

When Ohio was admitted into the Union, her population was small, the personal property of her citizens inconsiderable, and land had to bear the chief burden of taxation for the support of the new Government, and the effect of the exemption of the lands of new settlers for five years, and to exact the whole revenue from those who resided there before June, 1802, was unequal, unjust, and severe in the extreme; but Ohio acceded to the terms offered, in consideration of the grant of school lands, and the advantages of a good road to be made to and through the State by Congress, to which her funds were inadequate. It was understood, on both sides, that the road would be made, and certainly Ohio considered it an assurance on the part of this Government that the work would be accomplished out of the proceeds of the public lands. The fund was fixed on by Congress according to their estimate of the probable cost of the road; and if Congress was mistaken, and the road is not made, the leading consideration for the concessions on the part of Ohio has failed. An error in the estimate of this Government ought not to work an injury to Ohio, and defeat one of the main objects of the compact.

In 1816 Indiana was admitted into the Union, and with her the United States made, in substance, the same compact, except that the fund reserved out of the proceeds of the public lands was to be applied to a road or roads leading to that State, and not through it, as in the case of Ohio.

In the year 1818 Illinois was admitted into the Union, with a like compact, the land fund to be applied, as in the case of Indiana, to a road or roads to that State, and not through the State.

In the year 1820, March 6th, Congress passed a law authorizing the admission of Missouri into the Union, with a like provision for roads or a road leading to that State, and not through it. Before this period a large amount of this fund had been expended in making the road from the Potomac to the Ohio river, and into the State of Ohio. After provision had thus made for a road through Ohio to Indiana, to Illinois, and to the State of Missouri, which is divided from Illinois by the Mississippi river, Congress, according to their construction of the acts passed, considering that the whole fund arising from the proceeds of public lands in those States were applicable to the construction of a road from Wheeling to the Mississippi river, on the 15th day of May, 1820, passed a law authorizing the President to have a road laid out from Wheeling to a point on the Mississippi river between St. Louis and the mouth of the Illinois river. In the preamble of this last act it is expressly declared that the continuation of the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois will make the lands of the United States more valuable.

On the second day of March, 1820, Congress passed two acts for the continuation of the Cumberland road westwardly of Zanesville, in the State of Ohio, and appropriated $100,000 for Ohio, and $50,000 for the road in Indiana, according to the location which had been made, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which sums these acts provided are to be replaced out of the funds reserved for roads by the several acts before referred to passed for the admission of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri into the Union. A similar appropriation was afterwards made for continuing the road in the State of Illinois, and numerous appropriations have been made from time to time for more than thirty years for this road, without regard to the amount received out of the proceeds of public lands sold in the four States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. Congress has justly deemed the fund reserved in the compact with each State an entire thing, and applicable to the construction of the road from Wheeling to the Mississippi river, and have acted in accordance with that view. This Government, to hasten the sale and add to the value of their public lands, have, by their action, assured the people of the United States that they have not only provided a fund for schools, but a good road for their use, and to enable them to revisit their friends and relations from whom they may have separated by removal to the Western States. New settlers were assured that a stipulation had been exacted from the new States that new purchasers and settlers should be free for five years from the common burden of taxation, and that this road would be made without waiting for the receipt of the fund reserved. The new States, confiding in the implied assurances of the Government, have made their local improvements to a great extent in reference to and in accordance with this great national work. In addition to all this, Congress, by an act approved on the 21 of March, 1831, agreed to surrender to the State of Ohio all jurisdiction and superintendance over this road within her limits, upon the terms and conditions specified in an act passed by that State on the 4th day of February, in the same year, by which act the State of Ohio agreed to take under her care so much of the road as was finished, and such other sections or parts thereof as might thereafter be progressively completed within her limits, and to erect toll-gates on it, not to exceed one on any space or distance of twenty miles, to charge such moderate tolls mentioned in the act, to be applied exclusively, after paying expenses, to the preservation, repair, and improvement of the road. All carts and wagons with broad wheels, exceeding six inches in breadth, to pass the gates free of toll. No toll to be collected from any person passing to or from public worship or musters, or to or from his common business on his farm or wood land, or to or from a funeral or mill, or to or from his common place of trading or marketing within his county, including his wagons, carriages, and horses, or oxen drawing the same. No toll to be collected for the passage of any stage or coach conveying the United States mail, or horses bearing the same, or any wagon or carriage laden with the property of the United States, or any cavalry or other troops, arms, or military stores belonging to the same, or to any of the States comprising this Union, or any person or persons on duty in the military service of the United States, or of the militia of any of the States.

The State of Ohio, in this act, has fixed the tolls far below the tolls on other roads belonging to private companies or States, and for all neighborhood purposes it is a free road as well as for the mails and military purposes of the United States and States. The intent, substance, and object of this act, on the part of Ohio, was to take care of this road, preserve and repair it, free from any charge to this Government after it shall be completed. She agrees to charge no tolls more than necessary to pay expenses and keep it in repair, and to save to the National Government a large expenditure for mails and military purposes, all predicated on the compacts and assurances I have adverted to, and the well founded and authorized expectation that this Government would complete the road. After this law is passed by Ohio, Congress take it into consideration, and give a solemn assent to it. Now, [said Mr. POPE,] I appeal to every candid man to answer whether, according to the true intent and spirit of this arrangement between Ohio and this Government, it does not clearly appear that the United States are to complete the road, and Ohio to preserve and keep it in repair on the terms specified in her law; and would it comport with the honor, justice, or character of this high and magnanimous nation to retreat from her engagement, on the ground that she has not literally covenanted to complete the road? It was never expected, nor was it in the contemplation of the parties, that the States were to make the road, but both parties clearly understood that the road was to be made by the United States. The States have faithfully fulfilled the terms of their contracts; they have paid, and are paying, five years' tax on the lands sold by this Government, which would otherwise have gone into the State Treasuries. All the public lands belonged to the nation; and if they have not reserved enough to make the road, it was a mistake of Congress, and not of the new States, and can furnish no legitimate ground for defeating the object and essence of the compact. We should bear in mind, [said Mr. POPE,] that, independent of the benefits derived by this Government from the speedy sale of their lands at an enhanced price, they will receive, after the road shall be finished, a perpetual annuity of from 50,000 to 100,000 dollars a year in the exemption of their mails and military action, from tolls or hindrance, to which the national purse would have been subjected if this road had been made by the new States or private companies. Arrangements have been made by this Government with Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, for keeping this road in repair between the Potomac and the Ohio, similar to that made with Ohio; and there is an appropriation of nine thousand dollars in this bill for completing the road in Pennsylvania, pursuant to the terms agreed on. There is now paid by the United States for carrying the mails on artificial roads, to companies and States, probably several millions of dollars; for, although first paid by contractors, it is indirectly drawn from the pockets of the people.

I have understood (said Mr. POPE) that the mail contractors on the road from Maysville to Lexington, Kentucky, (sixty-five miles,) pay from five to eight thousand dollars a year. If a daily mail should be run from Louisville to Springfield, in Kentucky, a distance of forty-six miles, the road tolls would amount to near three thousand dollars a year. I have no data (said Mr. POPE) to enable me to make a precise estimate of the cost of carrying the mails from this to St. Louis, a distance of from eight hundred to one thousand miles. The rapid increase of letters and packages to be transmitted by mail, with the amount necessary to be deposited on the road for distribution towards the Ohio river and to the lakes from this Cumberland road, will probably soon require several coaches; and, if run daily from this city to St. Louis, would cost this nation, if not run free, according to the compact with Ohio, from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars a year, exclusive of the expense of the military action of this Government, and this expense would be a perpetual annual tax on the nation. We certainly ought to have some good national roads from the seat of Government to our Western and other borders of our territories, passable at all seasons of the year. Our Western and Southwestern rivers are often obstructed by ice, and occasionally too low to be ascended to Wheeling or Pittsburgh, when, by a circuitous route, the people west of the mountains may reach here by this road. If we have not been able to obtain a good road to Kentucky and the Southwest, let us not, on that account, arrest this work, which will be, in some degree, advantageous to the whole West. This road completed, its benefits will be so obvious that Congress may be induced to make others more convenient to us and other portions of the Union, whenever the condition of our finances will authorize such expenditures. We ought, without engaging in an extensive system of internal improvements, to have several roads of like national character from this place to the extremes of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. POPE,) it may not be amiss to retrospect the period and then state of public opinion when this work was commenced. In 1802 the first compact was made with Ohio about this road, but nothing was done until 1806, when Congress appropriated $30,000 to lay out and make this road from the Potomac to the Ohio river; and, in 1810, $60,000 was appropriated to commence the work, out of any money in the Treasury, but chargeable on the two per cent. fund, and to be reimbursed when received from that fund. Nothing had been done from 1802 to 1806, and the two per cent. fund then received was very inadequate to this great work, and the Administration, with Mr. Jefferson at its head, were prompted by high political considerations to begin the road, and to complete it, without regard to the amount received or the amount which might be received. The price of public land was then two dollars per acre, and the estimated expense of the road was far below the actual cost. The Administration determined to anticipate the fund which they thus supposed would, in time, reimburse the expenditure. It is worthy of remark, that this fund has been since reduced more than one-third by reducing the price of public land to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, without the consent of the States interested, of which certainly I do not complain. It is, however, fair to urge that, if Congress has lessened the fund reserved for the road, this Government is bound, in justice and good faith, to supply the deficiency.

About that period, or shortly before, we had made a large addition to the United States by the purchase of Louisiana, which was opposed on constitutional ground, and because it would destroy the relative influence of other sections of the Union in the Confederation, and because it would, from its great extent, endanger the permanency of the Union. Mr. Jefferson had constitutional objections, but believed that the purchase of this great outlet of the West to the ocean was necessary to the preservation of the Union. He believed also, as did most of the enlightened statesmen of Virginia at that period, that it was all-important to cut down the mountains, and open an easy and convenient intercourse with the Western country, as indispensable to our lasting union. They were also desirous, by a generous and magnanimous policy, to bind the Western States more closely to the Old Dominion. I must be permitted here to remark, Mr. Speaker, that however we may have been amazed by the technical metaphysical doctrines of Virginia about the constitutional powers of this Government, her leading statesmen were never at a loss for authority to do what was necessary to accomplish any great object. About the same period, that profound statesman, De Witt Clinton, conceived the gigantic scheme of uniting the waters of the Atlantic with Lake Erie, and thereby connecting the Northwestern States bordering on the lakes with New York, by commercial, social, and political ties. The rival views of the great statesmen of New York and Virginia in all probability hastened the commencement and stimulated the prosecution of the Cumberland road. It was commenced under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, and carried on through those of Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe, without any regard to the amount received of the fund reserved. And here I must observe that I have never been able to discover that this Government had any more power to make a road from Cumberland to Wheeling than to make a national road in any other direction. A road through the public lands may be maintained on a different ground. I wish, indeed, that the Virginia statesmen could have found power to make a great national road to the Southwest, by Christiansburg, Wythe Court-house, Abingdon, and Bean's Station, thence to the south part of Kentucky, Nashville, Memphis, and Little Rock, and from Bean's Station to Knoxville, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. Another by Richmond, Raleigh, in North Carolina, the seats of Government in South Carolina and Georgia, to the seat of Government in Florida. The condition of the Treasury, besides other considerations, renders it inappropriate to dwell on this subject now; but I think I could suggest a plan for making such roads, which would be free from any constitutional objection, even in the mind of my friend from Virginia, of the Richmond district, (Mr. ROBERTSON.) We now pay annually a large amount for carrying the mail on artificial roads; and if it is constitutional to pay annually, can it be unconstitutional to pay a sum in gross for the privilege of the mail, and for military purposes in perpetuity? Could we not say to Virginia, and the States south of her, that, if they will make a road suited to national purposes, preserve and keep it in repair, and make it free forever to the mail and military purposes of the Union, this Government will pay so much a mile for making the road, would there be any thing unconstitutional in such an arrangement? I should think there could be none with the most strict constructionist. I have crossed the Alleghany mountains in several places, and it has ever appeared to me that much the best route is from here through Montgomery and Wythe counties to Abingdon and Bean's Station, near the foot of Clinch mountain; there it should branch, one passing by Knoxville to Alabama and Mississippi; the other to Kentucky, Nashville, Memphis, and Little Rock. There ought to be mail and military roads in that direction. The States in that quarter have no direct or practicable route to this place in a bad season of the year, and especially when the rivers are very low or frozen. Some suppose there ought to be a national road from this place, through Maryland and Pennsylvania, to the lakes, to which I see no strong objection. This Government ought to have the means of conveying intelligence to all parts of the Union at all seasons of the year.

Mr. Speaker, [said Mr. POPE,] steamboats and railroads answer very well for many purposes; and railroads are useful for short distances, and between cities not very distant from each other, where there is great and constant commercial intercourse; but they are not suited to the agricultural people of the interior as well as Macadamized roads, on which every person can travel on foot, on his pony, in cart, wagon, dearborn or carriage, as fast or as slow as suits his inclination or convenience. I like a road on which every one can carry his own productions to market. I take little pleasure in being whizzed through the country with the speed of a humming bird without time even to get a drink of water on the way. Indeed, I think our public men would do better and learn more of the good sense and public opinion of the people, if they would travel a little more through the interior in less haste, and hold converse with the plain, industrious, and farming classes of the nation, who are at last the salt of the earth and the substratum of our Republican system. If I understand the motion of my colleague, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] it is to recommit the bill, and cede the road to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. These States would not thank us for the cession: Indiana and Illinois certainly would not, as there is little, if any, part of the done in either of those States; Ohio might be willing to accept a cession, provided we would repeal the act of 1831, by which she agreed to make the tolls low and the road free to the United States. If that law is repealed, and the cession made unconditionally, Ohio might consent, because she could then impose a high toll on the United States mail and every citizen of the United States, and derive a considerable revenue from the tolls on the road finished in that State. It would seem to be more open and fair for my colleague to withdraw his motion, and meet the question directly by voting against the bill. Thirty thousand dollars was, I repeat, appropriated in 1805, and $60,000 in 1810, for this road, to be reimbursed out of the 2 per cent. fund reserved and the work has been progressing ever since under the authority of this Government. The people have been led to believe, from the repeated and long continued action of this Government, that the road would be completed; but, if it is not to be done I hope the question will be openly and fairly met. Let us go on with the road or abandon it.

Some allusion, Mr. Speaker, has been made, by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CAMPBELL] to the squatters, or settlers claiming pre-emption rights on the Western lands—certainly out of place here. When the proper occasion occurs, I will endeavor to vindicate that class of settlers on the public domain from injustice, and to place their claims to the liberality of Congress fairly before the House. I have been acquainted with that class of men from my earliest youth, and feel a strong sympathy for them. I cannot, continued Mr. POPE, admit the propriety of introducing the tariff into this debate by the same gentleman from South Carolina. That subject has been solemnly settled by the compromise act until the year 1842, and I feel no inclination to disturb it. I will give no pledge here what I will do then, if honored with a seat in this House, except that I will support no system of policy to aggrandize one portion of the community at the expense of the vital interests of others. It seems to be premature to anticipate what will or ought to be done after the expiration of the compromise act. Mr. POPE said he did not know that South Carolina was more interested in the tariff question than many other States. He believed that Kentucky, Tennessee, and other Western States consumed as much, if not more foreign articles subject to duty than South Carolina.

In conclusion, Mr. POPE beseeched gentlemen not to recommit the bill, but to meet the questions on the engrossment and passage of the bill by an open and direct vote.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

REMARKS OF MR. CLOWNEY, OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, Friday, April 20, 1838.—The House having again resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois;" the question pending being the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Kentucky, to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report, in lieu thereof, a bill to provide for the surrender of said road to the States through which it passes—

Mr. CLOWNEY, who was entitled to the floor, from having moved the adjournment the evening before, arose, and addressed the House as follows:

The anxiety to dispose of the bill upon your table, as manifested by the vote just given in favor of a suspension of the rules, would be sufficient to command my silence, were it not for the importance of the principle I conceive to be involved in the question now before the House. When I reflect upon the indirect interest of a considerable portion of the people of Kentucky in the Cumberland road, and the sympathy which the Representatives from that State must naturally feel for such of their Western brethren as are immediately and directly interested, I am induced to admire the independence and patriotism of the honorable mover of the resolution now under consideration, and of those of his colleagues who have sustained him; while, at the same time, I am encouraged to hope that the day has dawned, if not fully arrived, when the system of internal improvements by this Government is doomed to undergo a radical change for the better, or be entirely abandoned. I fully agree with the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] that the present system of internal improvements, if it can be properly called a system, is unequal and unjust in the distribution of its benefits, extravagant in its appropriations, wasteful in its expenditures, corrupting in its influence, and tending to a dangerous increase of Executive patronage. And, in addition to this, I believe it to be unauthorized by the federal compact. I must, therefore, frankly confess that I am in favor of the entire abandonment, not only of the present system, but of the very policy itself, from an honest conviction that neither the present system can be modified, nor any new one devised, that will remedy the evils of which we complain, and be, at the same time, consistent with the Constitution. It is, however, not my design, at this time, to pursue this inquiry further, as it is not immediately connected with the subject under discussion. The question now before the House is, simply, whether we shall continue to uphold the present system, with all its acknowledged evils, by appropriating moneys, as usual for the last thirty-two years, to this Cumberland road, or commence the great work of reform, by ceding this road to the States through which it passes, and to which it rightfully belongs. Such, then, being the nature of the question, all the sincere friends of justice, economy, retrenchment of expenditure, and reform, as well as every honest advocate of the Republican doctrines of strict construction, so essential to the rights of the States, have now one of the best opportunities that can be afforded, and are called upon by the most powerful appeals of an exhausted Treasury, to prove, by their votes, to this nation, and to the world, the sincerity of their professions.

The resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky has been warmly opposed by one of his colleagues, [Mr. POPE,] and also by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr EWING,] in the commencement of this debate, upon the ground that this Government is bound to make the appropriations asked for in the bill, by virtue of a solemn compact with the Western States, entered into as one of the conditions of their admission into the Union. Other gentlemen, who believe this Government has already fulfilled its engagements with the States of the West, particularly Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, according to the strict terms of the compact, nevertheless contend for the continuance of appropriations for the extension of this road through other of the Western States, and for its repairs through all time to come, upon the ground of the implied faith of the Government to the purchasers of the public lands. Besides these two, there is still another class of gentlemen, who, unwilling to rest their claims to the appropriations in this bill upon the plighted faith of the Government, either express or implied, advocate them upon the much broader ground of expediency—such as the wise policy of this Government, as lord of the public domain, to enhance the value of its lands by works of improvement, and the still higher and more noble consideration of uniting the Western and Atlantic States into one great family of interest and feeling, by levelling the mountain barriers that divide them. Such, sir, has been the character of the arguments of all those who have opposed the resolution of the member from Kentucky, with the exception of one or two gentlemen that have addressed the House, and who seem disposed to vote for this bill, without the least regard to principle or the condition of the Treasury, but merely because such has been the usage of the Government.

I will not undertake to reply to all the various arguments which have been urged in favor of this bill, lest in the attempt I should injure the side of the question I have espoused, by repeating, in a manner less clear and forcible, much that has already been said by those who have preceded me. I shall, therefore, content myself with directing the attention of the House with more particularity to what has scarcely yet been noticed, to wit: the agreement between this Government and the Western States, upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. EWING] relies with so much confidence, and which may be justly regarded as the source of all the schemes of internal improvement by this Government. But before we proceed to notice the terms of this agreement, it will be proper, in the first place, to briefly examine the authority under which we, the Representatives of the people, act, and the extent of our powers.

It will, I presume, be readily admitted that we are here in the character of servants, and acting under the authority of a written compact concluded between the States, as separate, independent sovereignties, and which we, as the servants of those sovereigns, dare not transcend. The object of the people of the States, our respective masters, in forming this alliance or compact, is expressly declared to be for their common defence and general welfare. To effect this object, each State conceded certain powers which were deemed necessary to constitute a General Goverament, which powers are few and well defined in the compact, reserving to themselves, at the same time, all other powers, to be freely exercised by each in the sole management of its own peculiar local interests. Hence each of the State Governments, and the Federal Government, may be justly regarded, as Jefferson happily expresses it, "the coordinate departments of one simple integral whole; the one the domestic, the other the foreign, branch of the same Government." In the operation of this complex system, I hold the States can do all things which they have not by their joint consent parted with the right to do, while the Government of the States united can do nothing which it is not expressly authorized by the bond of union between the States to do. It is by these principles of constitutional law I propose to test the stipulations of the compact with the Western States.

We will now proceed to notice the provisions of that compact. By an act of Congress in 1802, authorizing Ohio to form a State Constitution, and enter the Union on an equal footing with the original States, the following propositions were submitted to the people of Ohio for their acceptance or rejection; which, if accepted, were to be obligatory upon the United States: 1st. To grant to the inhabitants of each township, for the use of schools, every 16th section of each township; the section containing 640 acres of land, and being the one-thirty-sixth part of all public lands within the limits of the State, including the reservations by Virginia and the United States for military bounties, and also the "Connecticut reserve," as well as the lands belonging to the Indians, whenever their title to the same should be extinguished by the purchase of the Government. 2d. To grant to the State, for the use of the people thereof, all the salt springs within the State, together with a section of land including the same; the springs to be subject to the control of the Legislature of the State, with a prohibition to sell or lease the same for a longer period than ten years. 3d. To reserve and apply five per cent. (which is equal to one-twentieth part) of the nett proceeds of the public lands lying within the State, and sold by Congress, to the laying out and making public roads leading from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to the State of Ohio; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the roads shall pass. This last proposition was subsequently modified, and rendered more beneficial to Ohio, by an act of Congress, in 1803, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay over to the State three per cent. of the five per cent. fund, to be expended under the authority of the State in making roads in the State, Congress still reserving two per cent. of that fund, to be applied, under its authority, it laying out and making roads leading to the State. Such were the propositions submitted by Congress to the people of Ohio for their acceptance, and since then to all the other States of the West that have been admitted into the Union; which propositions have been accepted by the people of those States on the conditions proposed; by virtue of which it is now contended that Congress is still bound to make appropriations for the Cumberland road.

It is manifest that these stipulations, on the part of Congress, operate exclusively for the benefit of the new States of the West, unless the States enjoying these advantages have, in lieu thereof, rendered to this Government some equivalent in which all the other States have participated. I contend that, without an equivalent, the value of these benefits, besides other large donations of lands, amounting in all to millions of dollars to each of the new States, may be properly regarded the very same as so much money drawn directly from the Treasury of the United States, and bestowed as a mere gratuity upon a few favored States. The public lands and the money in the Treasury raised by taxation, are alike the funds of the Government, in which all the States are equally interested, and are subject to the same constitutional restrictions in disbursements. This is apparent from the very nature of the transaction, with regard to all the lands belonging to the United States that have been acquired by purchase, and paid for out of the common fund of the States. And it is also no less apparent, from the language employed in the several deeds of transfers, with regard to all the lands that have been acquired by cession from the original States. In the one or the other of these two ways, the United States have acquired all the right they possess to the public domain. As a proof of the fact that the lands acquired by cession were conveyed in trust for the common benefit and support of all the States of the Union, and so received by the express stipulations of Congress, we need only refer to the deeds themselves. In the deed of cession from Virginia of all the lands within her chartered limits lying northwest of the river Ohio, and now embraced in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, the following strong and unequivocal language is used, declarative of her intentions:

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for or appropriated to any of the before mentioned purposes, (reservation of bounty lands, etc.) shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the UNITED STATES as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge of expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

It is true this deed was executed in the year 1784, and has reference in its provisions to the then state of things, when Congress, under the old articles of confederation, not possessing the power to raise revenue by taxation, each State had to contribute its quota to defray the expenses of the Confederation. But notwithstanding this Government has since then undergone, in many respects, a material change, yet the claims of the States, by virtue of the deed of cession, upon these lands as a common fund, and the obligation of Congress faithfully to execute its trust, remain the same, if they are not considerably strengthened by a fresh recognition of their existence and validity in our present Constitution. The only mention made of the public lands in the Constitution, whence we derive our present powers, is to be found in the 3d section of the 4th article, which provides in these words:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the UNITED STATES, or of any particular State."

That the rights of the States and the power of Congress, with regard to the public lands acquired by cession, are the same now as under the old articles of confederation, may be further illustrated by the conditions of the agreement between the United States and the State of Georgia, by which the United States acquired their qualified right to the lands now included in the States of Alabama and Mississippi. In this agreement, bearing date in the year 1802, and ratified by an act of Congress, under the present Constitution, Georgia expressly declares, "that all the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States, Georgia included, shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of the United States, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever." Such is the tenure by which this Government holds all that portion of the public domain which has been acquired by separate deeds of cession from the several States of Virginia, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut.

With these facts, as solemn matters of record, staring us in the face, can it be contended that the compact of this Government with the individual States of the West is not in direct violation of the plighted faith of the Government to the original States of the Union? Can that fund, with any degree of propriety, be any longer called common, which, either by the legislation or contract of this Government, has been rendered, in the strictest sense of the word, special? It can be shown that the single State of Ohio has already received from this Government, in addition to the one-thirty-sixth part of all the public lands lying within her chartered limits, and the one-twentieth of the nett proceeds of such lands as have been sold, donations from time to time of these very lands designated in the deed of cession from Virginia as a common fund; amounting in number to 1,511,555 acres, besides millions of money by way of direct appropriations from the Treasury; and all for the avowed local purposes of her schools and internal improvements. Will any one pretend to call this a faithful application of the "common fund," for the use and benefit of the United States; especially when it can be also shown that some of these United States, of which South Carolina is one, have never yet received from this fund, for these or any other purposes of a local character, the value of one cent, either in land or money? What is true with regard to Ohio is true with regard to Indiana and Illinois, and, to some extent, all the States of the West except Tennessee and Kentucky. Under this state of facts, surely no one will presume to contend that the United States have shared alike of this common fund, unless some one is prepared to demonstrate to the House the absurd proposition that a part is equal to the whole. From these considerations, I am forced to conclude that the course of policy pursued by this Government, with regard to the public lands, has been illiberal and unjust to the parent States; extravagant to the new States, their offspring; and not warranted either by the compact between the States, of which this Government is but the creature and agent, or by the several compacts between this Government and the original States, by virtue of which the public lands have been acquired:

I am aware that each of the Western States, in its engagements with this Government, has provided by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, "that each and every tract of land sold by Congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale." It is contended that this restriction upon the power of the States to raise revenue by taxing the lands, until the lapse of five years after their sale, operates to the injury of the new States, and to the benefit of the United States; which benefit is fully equal to all the advantages they derive from the compact.

I can conceive of no object which the United States could have had in requiring this supulation on behalf of the new States, unless to induce emigration, and thereby effect a more speedy sale of the public lands. Whatever may have been the object, that such has been, to a certain extent, the immediate consequence of this policy, none can doubt. Now, let us inquire which have been most benefitted by this restriction, the new States or the United States.

It may be considered an axiom in political economy, that the power and wealth of any organized community mainly consist in the strength of its population and the aggregate wealth of its citizens. The more dense the population, when labor and capital can be profitably employed in all the diversified pursuits of civilized life, the more formidable is that nation in its military power, and the more abundant are its resources, from the increased productiveness of the industry of its people. These are but the results of the maxim, which the experience of even the rudest savage of the wilds has long since established, that "union is force;" an adage universally true with regard to every effort of man, whether physical, moral or intellectual. Hence the corollary, that whatever encourages the progress of population in a nation encourages that of real wealth and greatness.

According to these views it is manifest that the United States, as one nation, as well as each individual State, are all alike most deeply interested in whatever policy tends to the increase of their population. In this the Western States have been highly favored by the action of Congress, in holding out to mankind the strongest inducements to emigrate; which have been afforded in the mere nominal price of the most fertile lands, the rights of pre-emption, and the immense donations of lands and extravagant appropriations from the Treasury for their schools and internal improvements; to which may be added this very stipulation of these States, in their several compacts with this Government. Hence the rapid growth and prosperity of the infant States of the West, to which no parallel can be found in the whole history of colonization.

Let us now, for a moment, glance at the effects of this policy, so beneficial to the West, upon the United States, considered as one great nation; and particularly upon that portion of the Union whence the tide of emigration has flowed. In this view of the subject, it can be easily demonstrated that the United States have sustained an injury much greater than the benefits derived from the sales of the public lands, whilst the immediate consequences to the old Atlantic States have been most disastrous.

First, as to the United States, I contend there has been little or no addition to their population, as one great nation, by emigration from abroad; while the most important change has been produced in the condition and relative power of the individual States, merely by the removal of the people from one State to another. The superior advantages offered in the West, by the partial legislation of Congress, have forced the stream of emigration to flow thither, from the original States bordering on the Atlantic. Thus, both the strength and resources of the General Government have been greatly impaired in that very portion of our common country where the dangers from foreign aggressions are the most threatening, and where the resources of the Government are most needed, not only in the time of war, to repel invasion; but also in the time of peace, to aid in that commerce with the world from which the chief support of Government is at all times derived, and in which all the States of the Union are vitally interested.

Nor is this all. The strength and resources of the United States have not only been impaired in the Atlantic States, by a mere removal of their people to the West, but also by their dispersion over an almost boundless extent of territory; and the withdrawal of a vast amount of capital from the active business of life, peculiar to a dense population, and the investment of that capital in the purchase of lands, merely with a view to future speculation, which, for the want of means to cultivate, must remain for ages unimproved and unproductive to the country.

While the general interest of the United States has been thus injured, the evil effects upon some of the parent States of the Union have been almost incalculable. This has been the necessary consequence of that rule of loss and gain by which this Government, as the joint agent of a concern in which all the States, as parties, are alike interested, has decreed that one set of the copartners shall enjoy all the profits, while another set, equally if not more meritorious and deserving, are doomed to sustain the entire loss. For a proof of this fact, look at South Carolina thirty-eight years ago, while most of the vast regions of the West, now thriving States, were unmarked by the footsteps of civilized man; and compare her condition then with her condition in 1830, when her last census was taken. You will find, from this comparison, that, during the whole period of thirty years, there has been but a small increase of her population, while the exports of her productive industry in 1830 were less than they were in 1801 by eight millions of dollars. Look at her now, with her houses deserted and falling to decay; her once fruitful fields worn out and abandoned for the want of timely improvement or skilful cultivation; and her thousands of acres of unexhausted lands, still promising a bountiful harvest to the industrious husbandman, lying idle and neglected. Sir, in the interior of the State where I was born, and where I now live, although a country possessing all the advantages of soil, climate, and health, and abounding in arable lands unreclaimed from the first rude state of nature, there can now be found many neighborhoods where the population is too sparse to support a common elementary school for children. Such is the present deplorable condition of one of the oldest members of this Union, that dates back its first settlement as a colony more than a century and a half ago; while other States, only born as it were but yesterday, already surpass what South Carolina was, or ever has been, in the happiest and proudest days of her prosperity. To what cause can these astonishing results be attributed, other than to the unjust and unwise legislation of Congress, by which the sectional interest of one portion of our common country has been fostered at the expense of another? I consider the privilege enjoyed by the purchasers of the public lands, in being exempted from a land tax for five years after the purchase, to be one of these causes. To this may be added the liberal stipulations, on the part of Congress, in its agreement with the new States, on their admission into the Union, besides many acts of partial legislation not embraced in that agreement; such as a reduction in the minimum price of the public lands, and the large donations of lands and appropriations of money, from time to time, for their seminaries of learning and objects of internal improvements. It is evidently to such causes, operating as the most powerful inducements to emigration from the old States to the new, that the rapid decline of the one, and the unrivalled prosperity of the other, are wholly to be ascribed.

If I am correct in the views I have taken of this subject, the conclusion follows irresistibly that this Government has not only exceeded its powers, in its bargain with the several States of the West, but that the effect of its general policy, with regard to the public lands, has proved in the highest degree prejudicial to the common welfare of the United States, and also to the special interest of the old States; and, from considerations of expediency, if from no other, ought to be immediately changed, so as to be more in accordance with the sound principles of common honesty and equal justice.

But admitting the fact, that this Government had the power to make the bargain it did with the Western States, and that each of the parties was solemnly bound to fulfil its engagements, whatever might be the consequences; still I contend that no further appropriations for the Cumberland road can be demanded upon the faith of that compact. The only ground upon which this demand could be predicated is the stipulation of Congress to apply the two per cent. fund named in the compact to the purposes of laying out and making roads leading to the Western States. This is the full extent of the undertaking on the part of Congress with regard to roads, the obligations to perform which have long since been discharged, and again and again re-discharged, especially so far as Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, are concerned.

We have been told by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] who has taken the pains to make the calculation, that the Cumberland road has already cost the Government over $7,000,000. The first one hundred and thirty-two miles of this road, before its cession to the States through which it passes, had cost the Government, according to a statement of the present civil engineer, $2,803,034, which is more than $21,000 per mile. I am not informed of the aggregate nett amount arising from the sales of the public lands lying in the three States named in the bill; but in the Congressional Debates of the 23d Congress, under the head of Cumberland Road, I find it stated by a gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. McKinley,) then a member of the House, what to this day stands uncontradicted, that the whole amount of the two per cent. fund arising from lands sold within the limits of Ohio was only $371,251. If this be true with regard to Ohio, it is reasonable to conclude that the whole amount of the two per cent. fund in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, can never exceed $2,000,000; yet this is the only fund to which the Government can look for a reimbursement of the $450,000 now asked for in the bill, as well as the $7,000,000 already expended.

Mr. Speaker, I feel too much exhausted, owing to the feeble state of my health, to say what I had intended, and must, therefore, draw my argument to a close.

I am free to confess that I cherish a particular hostility to the Cumberland road. I look upon it as the illegitimate offspring of a Republican Administration, whose conception is to be traced to the illicit connection of this Government with the young and beauiful State of Ohio on the 30th day of April, 1802, when she was received into the UNION; while its birth is to be found recorded in the fourth book of the Laws, on the 29th March, 1806, when the first act of Congress was passed, appropriating $30,000 "to the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio." Although this road, for many years after its commencement, was the only important work of improvement undertaken by this Government, and all the appropriations for it were made out of the two per cent. fund named in the agreement with Ohio, yet, in the process of time, it generated a spirit for other improvements, which eventually became too strong to be confined within the narrow limits of a compact.

In 1820 this spirit received a fresh and powerful impulse from the idea, then agitated, of a protective tariff. The advocates of high duties, with the view to foster the manufacturing interest at the North, well knew that the success and duration of their policy mainly depended upon the expenditures of the Government being increased, equal, at least, to the increase of the revenue. Although the public debt might answer as a sufficient pretext for the commencement of the scheme of exorbitant and oppressive taxation, yet they felt well assured that, under its operation, the public debt would soon be extinguished, and their policy necessarily fail, unless some new drain, other than the ordinary expenses of the Government, could be opened from the Treasury, and conducted into channels that would feed and sustain that particular interest. This very spirit for internal improvements, which had long since been engendered and fostered in the West by the Cumberland road, soon relieved the friends of a protective tariff from all fearful apprehensions of an overflowing Treasury, by the important discovery, in the Constitution, of an ample outlet for all the funds of the Government, in the unrestrained exercise of its power over the subject of local improvements in the States. The Republicans of that day, who expected to profit by the scheme of high taxes and heavy expenditures, could easily and clearly discover in the special grants of power in the Constitution, "to declare war, to establish post offices and post roads, and to regulate commerce," the incidental powers to do every thing that a State could do in the line of internal improvements, such as making roads, railways, and canals, and improving the navigation of creeks and rivers. Nor did these new-light Republicans stand alone. They were instantly hailed as brothers by the old Federalists of '98, who were ready to co-operate with them in their new scheme of policy, on the higher and broader ground of an express grant of power "to provide for the common defence and general welfare." Thus was a powerful party formed, based upon the principles of plunder and a division of the spoils. This unholy alliance of sectional interests was soon organized into a system, and called by the imposing name of "AMERICAN." One of the important features of this system was an act of Congress, passed in 1824, authorizing the President to appoint a corps of civil engineers, to be exclusively employed in making surveys, plans, and estimates, of the routes of such roads and canals as may be deemed of national importance, in a commercial and military point of view, or necessary for the transportation of the mail, and report the same to Congress. To give stability to this system, this corps of civil engineers was incorporated by the act of its creation into the very frame of our Government, by its attachment to the War Department, with an appropriation of $30,000 to defray its expenses.

How this system worked, and to what extent it was carried during the four years of Mr. Adams's administration, is too recent and well known to be forgotten. With an increase of the tariff, there was a corresponding increase of expenditures upon works of internal improvements, until, in 1828, they both reached a point of extravagance and oppression that could no longer be endured by that portion of the country that paid an equal share of the taxes, and received nothing in return, either in the shape of a bounty or by the way of disbursements.

To reform these crying abuses, and bring back the Government to the only safe and good old Republican standard of strict construction and economy, General Jackson was elected to the Presidency. At the time of his election, the rage for internal improvements had run so high, under the auspices of the civil engineer corps and the general welfare doctrine of Mr. Adams, that there were then bills reported by the Committees on Internal Improvements, in both Houses of Congress, containing appropriations, exclusive of what related to the Cumberland road, harbors, and light-houses, to the enormous amount of $106,000,000. Independent of this, there were other objects of improvements still under the consideration of the committees, and in petitions and memorials that had not been referred, to have completed which would have cost the Government, at the lowest calculation, another $100,000,000. To these two sums are, at the same time, to be added the estimated expenses of such improvements as had already been surveyed by the corps of civil engineers, and reported to Congress, amounting to $49,000,000. [Here Mr. C. was interrupted by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MERCER,) who said he felt himself bound to correct an error into which the gentleman from South Carolina had fallen, and which he had heard before repeated. As chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, he would undertake to say that at no time have bills for internal improvements been reported containing appropriations any thing like the amount as stated.]

Mr. C. remarked, I do not vouch for the truth of the statement I have just made upon the high authority of President Jackson, in some of his official communications to Congress. That I have seen such a statement in some one of his annual or veto Messages, I cannot doubt, from the circumstance of my having made a memorandum of it at the time, which I still have in my possession. But whether the statement be strictly correct or not, it is no more than what might have been reasonably expected from the prevailing doctrines of that day, when the idea of any constitutional restraint upon the power of Congress to raise and appropriate money was utterly repudiated, while he who dared to deny or even question the right of a majority to do whatever might be deemed for the common defence and general welfare, was esteemed and pronounced "ineffably stupid." We may safely venture to assert, without the fear of contradiction, that, under an Administration acting upon these principles, as much was done in the way of internal improvements and exorbitant taxation as the condition of the country and the state of the finances would allow.

Although I cannot congratulate the country upon the work of retrenchment and reform under the late Administration, yet I am disposed to conclude that some good has been effected by the late Executive, through the exercise of his veto power, in checking the wild spirit for internal improvements that had characterized the former Administration. It is, however, to be regretted that, in his veto Messages on the Maysville road bill and Wabash bill, he has so qualified his constitutional objections as greatly to impair what I regard the true Republican principle. Instead of condemning as unconstitutional all roads and canals, and the improvement of the navigation of all creeks and rivers running through the interior of a State, and adapted only to domestic commerce, he discriminates between what is local and general, State and National, and limits the improvements of navigation to a port of entry. Owing to such distinctions, unknown to the Constitution, and dependent entirely upon Executive discretion, the unjust, corrupting system of internal improvements has still continued to exist; but to how much greater extent it would have been carried, without these restrictions, no one can imagine. One thing is, however, certain; there is yet ample room for retrenchment and reform, and I hope the work will now commence in this House, where most of the evils of misrule have originated, by withholding from the Cumberland road any further appropriations.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

REMARKS OF MR. PICKENS,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, Friday, April 20, 1838—The House having again resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois;" the question pending being the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Kentucky, to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report, in lieu thereof, a bill to provide for the surrender of said road to the States through which it passes—

Mr. PICKENS said he did not rise to make what might be called a speech, but merely to present some practical considerations to the House connected with the finances and the present condition of the Treasury, to show that, as prudent men, we ought, at least, to suspend this appropriation for one year. But before he entered upon that topic, he desired to pay his passing respects to what fell from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CALHOON.] He would call him his friend, for there was no gentleman in the House towards whom he would sooner use that word. But he must be permitted to say that the gentleman had certainly delivered a very extraordinary speech. He commenced by saying that his colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and himself differed widely on many questions. That on this subject his colleague was for some general and equal system, while he was utterly opposed to any general system as unjust, unequal, and corrupting, but very much in favor of this particular system: and he went so far as to say he would be in favor of another which might be proposed to connect the Southern seaports with the interior West. Now, Mr. P. said, he would prefer the vote of his colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to his speech. The one is with us in theory, but against us in practice; while the other gives us the reverse. The one gives us a theory which reverses the old doctrine of the general welfare, and goes in part for the particular welfare, thus turning the Constitution upside down. If his practice were as good as his sentiments, he would have nothing to complain of. The gentleman [Mr. CALHOON] has also very prudently thought proper to declare his sentiments on the tariff—he is utterly opposed to any protective tariff, upon principle, as unjust to others and injurious to Kentucky; and that this is the sentiment of his State. Mr. P. returned the gentleman his thanks for these manly sentiments, and hoped that he should not hereafter find him applying the same theory to that subject that he had done to internal improvements; that he would not be found against all general tariffs, but for any particular one that might be proposed; he hoped he would not retain his theory and then go for any judicious tariff. The gentleman had also alluded to another delicate subject, on which he uttered some high sentiments in relation to Kentucky being a border State, and that she might again be re-christened the dark and bloody land. He defined his position nobly upon this point; but Mr. P. was at a loss to understand the whole meaning when he went on to speak of the people on both sides of the Ohio being bound together in one destiny, which no circumstances could alter or separate; that upon the delicate domestic question to which he alluded, the States north of that river had done all that could be desired, and would always do so. He would leave it to the gentleman to explain how he could reconcile this with his allusion to Kentucky becoming "a border and frontier State," which he called upon the South to rally and defend.

But the gentleman (Mr. P. continued) had given a reason for supporting this bill, which was astonishing: he said that, true, no part of the road would run through Kentucky; yet it ran along, not far from her border, through three States; and it was well known that retail stores would have to be erected to supply the workmen and contractors, and that these would be supplied in part from Kentucky; and thus she would receive the drippings. Now, Mr. P. said he had heard, under the old Constitution, in North Carolina, when her negroes were allowed to vote, that they could be bought with drams; but this was the first time that he had ever heard of a whole State, and such a State, too, with as brave and heroic a people as ever went to battle and to victory in any age or in any country, being dragged up before the shambles of grog shops, and her gallant sons upon this floor acting as auctioneers, where whole States and sections were to be bought and sold. This was doing injustice to his State.

[Here Mr. CALHOON explained, and said he had denied that this motive was to influence Kentucky in her vote, but he had merely introduced this view to show that she was actually interested in the appropriation, as supplies would have to be furnished from Louisville and other towns, &c.

Mr. PICKENS continued and said, perhaps he had used stronger language than the gentleman had used, but that he had expressed his idea. Now upon this point he [Mr. P.] was glad to hear the excellent speech of the Representative from Louisville, [Mr. GRAVES,] who certainly ought to know the interests of his constituents. He returned his thanks to Mr. G. for his well-expressed sentiments, and also for his vote upon this bill. He hoped it indicated a new state of things. But the gentleman [Mr. CALHOON] had voted, and was against the appropriation for this road last year, and now gives as his reason for that opposition, amongst other reasons, that there was then a majority of some thirty votes in this House for Mr. Van Buren, and he then feared that the money would be corruptly spent to purchase favor and support through doubtful States.

Now was the gentleman [continued Mr. P.] aware that by this reason he furnished the most powerful argument that could be adduced against the whole system—that the money might be squandered in a profligate manner for political purposes? Is he aware that, by this reason, he now shadows forth, in no doubtful manner, the views which may now influence too many in their votes upon this bill at this moment? He was against the appropriation last year, and for a certain reason; and now, forsooth, new visions appear; he is against his colleague's Green river appropriation—this runs through no doubtful country—all one side; [but Mr. P said he knew this was no motive with the gentleman himself;] he is against all general systems of internal improvements by this Government; but the Cumberland road runs through three doubtful States! he is for that particular road, but no other appropriation on a general system. Mr. P. then said, gentlemen might be mistaken; they might vote millions in that section, and nevertheless they would have a close struggle with the hunting-shirt men, (he meant it in no disrespect, but as a name derived from the revolutionary followers of General Morgan,) who were the followers of that hero, who had defended their country, and led them to victory in the last war. Judging from appearances, he would suppose appropriations could not control or buy their votes. Mr. P. said he must confess that the gentleman's [Mr. CALHOON'S] speech placed him in rather an awkward situation, straddling as he did the Ohio, with one foot on each bank. It was unnatural to him, and contrary to the general frankness and open integrity of his character. He had not policy enough to be politic, and had not hypocrisy enough to conceal, with even a thin veil, his objects, when he spoke of political influences. The whole speech was a compliment to the artlessness of his heart. But, Mr. P. said, his principal object in rising was to call the attention of the House to the present state of the Treasury, and the embarrassed state of things in many parts of the country. In relation to this point, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had laid down the doctrine that it was of no consequence whether the Treasury was full or empty; it was not worth consideration in the prosecution of a liberal and enlarged policy; the state of the finances was a matter of perfect indifference, etc. Now, Mr. P. thought this was strange doctrine. He said, apply it to private affairs, and no man could act on it without running to profligacy and bankruptcy. He said, let the gentleman have an estate, from which he derived $2,000 income; if he wanted a road for improvement or convenience, which would cost $3,000, would he not consider long before he would execute it, and bring himself in debt $1,000? Certainly. But suppose a gentleman holding another estate, that yields $3,000, and another with an estate yielding $5,000, should be united with the first, and that the whole three should enter into a general compact that the whole should be managed by them jointly for the mutual benefit of each, and that the second, who held the estate yielding $3,000, should likewise desire a canal or drain, that would cost $4,000, which would be $1,000 more than his income. To obviate this difficulty, the first would say to the second, let us come to an agreement that my road shall be opened and your canal shall be dug, although both shall cost $7,000, which will be $2,000 more than our income. We can do this by taking it from the third estate, which has an income of $5,000; and thus, by this operation, the two who have a joint income of $5,000, would get $7,000 in the appropriation.; and the one who had the income of $5,000, would lose $2,000 in the division of the joint income. And this (Mr. P. said) would be nothing more nor less than swindling and plunder, under cover of a joint contract, made at first with the real intention of mutual benefit for all. Yet in the system of collection and disbursements, under this Government, this had been precisely the operation upon this Confederacy. Well may the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) go for an enlarged and liberal policy, without reference to the state of the Treasury. He said, what may be very enlarged and liberal to him, might be the reverse to others, who had to make the payments. He begged to be excused from this kind of liberality.

Mr. P. continued. The gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] had just called upon his colleague [Mr. CLOWNEY] to remember that the able report from the Secretary of War [Mr. CALHOUN] originally was the great foundation of this system of internal improvements. But let it be remembered that that report was made under a special resolution of the House of Representatives, directing the Secre ary to make a report upon some general system. He acted under orders from this House, and reserved the constitutional question as to the power of this Government over the matter. He acted as he was bound to do in his official capacity. But, Mr. P. said, it was immaterial to him who proposed the system; it was a matter of perfect indifference to him; he had seen and experienced its operation; and no authority could induce him to adopt it, or sanction it by his vote. Mr. P. said it was not his purpose to enter into a discussion of its origin, or the powers of this Government on the subject. It was too late in the day to raise up the Constitution from the tomb, and invoke its spirit against the lawless disbursements of this Government. They had progressed too far, and enlisted too great a combination, to be checked by appeals of that kind. He said you might as well attempt to bind down a strong man with cobwebs, as to arrest the course of events on these appropriations. But there was a measure with which he was somewhat identified, which ought to have some influence upon gentlemen in the course they were to pursue. He alluded to the suspension of the fourth instalment under the late deposite law, which would become due on the first of January, 1839. He brought this to view upon the same principle that the hunters on the Western prairies arrest the progress of fire, by firing against it. It would be remembered that the fourth instalment amounted to $9,300,000, and would be deposited with the States for their use under the late law, on the 1st of January, 1839. He contended that it was the interest of most members to husband the resources of the Government, so as to meet this instalment. Here was a bill now proposing to distribute $459 000, in equal proportions, to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. They might go for it. But where was the interest of Pennsylvania, New York, Massachusetts, Virginia, and North Carolina? If they would unite in suspending those appropriations that would bear suspension for a year, they could get their proportion of this $9,300,000. And if they did not unite, they would lose all. He contended that this road might be suspended for a year without any material injury, except perhaps to a few individuals. And so might the Harbor bill, the Fortification bill, and other bills; and, he said, considering the state of the Treasury, and the embarrassed condition of things in many sections, they ought to be suspended for the present; and even gentlemen who supported them might, with great propriety, vote for such a course under present circumstances. He warned gentlemen who were identified with the fortunes of the present Administration to beware how they voted large appropriations. Their opponents would, in many instances, eagerly go for heavy appropriations, even if it left the Treasury perfectly destitute; and then they would denounce you for your imbecility, and treat you with contempt for the very embarrassments they had aided to bring upon you. Mr. P. said the true strength of the Administration, at present, was in real reform and retrenchment, and their weakness was in heavy disbursements, and an embarrassed Treasury. Those who looked for success with the Administration ought to withhold appropriations this year, at least, except on those measures absolutely necessary. Let them make no calls for new Treasury notes—bring the expenditures within the income. Upon this point Mr P. said he was glad to hear the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means explain that he did not intend to ask for any more Treasury notes than were authorized by the law of October last; that he only desired to reissue those which had been received into the Treasury. For instance, $4,000,000 had been received. He desired to give authority to reissue those, if necessary; and, in the contingency that the other $6,000,000 should be received in the year, to reissue them, if there were no other funds in the Treasury.

Mr. P. did not exactly understand the second bill on that subject, but he declared he would not vote for any other Treasury note bill; it was not needed, if this House would only suspend some of the unnecessary appropriations. He said he had not voted for the Treasury note bill passed last session, and did not like ever to vote for any of them. He had no particular objection to carry out the intention of Congress in the act passed at the extra session, and to allow the reissuing of what had been received, so as, in part, to allow the Treasury to anticipate its revenues for the year 1838 to the amount of $10,000,000, but no more. He was induced to allow this, because Congress had extended indulgence on the custom-house bonds, and the revenue from that quarter would not fully begin to come in until the two last quarters of the present year; it was nothing but right that we should provide other means for the present; he somewhat preferred an old-fashioned loan, but it was a matter of no great consequence. He would tell gentlemen there was nothing more unpopular in the South than too many Treasury note bills. If the appropriations went much over $23,000,000 in reality for this year, including the $6,000,000 for the Florida war, there would be confusion, and embarrassment, and weakness. He called upon gentlemen whose hearts were devoted to the support of this Administration to pause in this matter, and unite in withholding expenditures at least for a year, if they wished to sustain themselves. Before he took his seat, Mr. P. said, he would make a motion to lay the bill on the table, with a view to postpone it until next session. He thought some might vote for this course with that view, who might sustain the appropriation, if the finances were in such a state as to authorize it at present. But, taking every thing into consideration, this was one of those works which might bear a suspension for one year. He then made the motion, but said, as he had extended his remarks much further than he had any idea of doing when he rose, he would withdraw his motion, if any gentleman would request it who desired to reply to him, provided he would renew the motion.

REMARKS OF MR. CORWIN, OF OHIO,

ON THE SAME SUBJECT

Mr. CORWIN addressed the House as follows—

Mr. SPEAKER: I perceive the House is unusually impatient of this debate. I am very reluctant, at any time, to lift up my voice in this Babel of confused voices, but especially so now; nor would I delay the final vote for a moment, did I not remember that this bill has been already once rejected, but a day or two since; and from the tone of discussion this morning, I have too much reason to fear it will meet a similar fate by the vote now about to be taken. I may add, also, that I feel unwilling to permit the remarks of the two gentlemen from South Carolina [Mr. CLOWNEY and Mr. PICKENS] to pass to the press, and from thence into the public mind, without an attempt, at least, to correct the erroneous impressions in which, according to my views, they abound.

The bill now under discussion, for the continuation of the Cumberland road, is nothing more nor less than the continuance of a system of regular annual expenditure, begun in 1806, and continued, with the exception of the short period of the war with Great Britain, every year up to the present time. The estimates for this appropriation are as regularly and habitually sent in by the Treasury Department, as are those for the salary of the President and other public servants, or those for the support of the army. If a continued perseverance in the prosecution of any public measure for thirty years cannot be looked to as settling the public utility of such measure, or the fixed policy and duty of this Government, beyond the reach of cavil or objection, then indeed may it be truly said that we are a people without common forethought, a Government without any established policy, a Confederacy without any common end or aim whatever.

The construction of the road provided for in this bill, from the waters of the Atlantic to the Mississippi river, was originated during the Administration of Mr. Jefferson. It has received the countenance of every shade and complexion of political party in Congress, at various periods since, and has been sanctioned by the approval of every Executive from that time to the present. It has thus become incorporated with your policy. It makes a part of the creed of all parties, and, as it advances in its progress, is woven into the texture of those systems of internal improvement going forward in each of the six States through which it passes. A measure thus perseveringly continued so long, sustaining itself, through perpetual conflicts, and every vicissitude of our history for the last thirty years, comes recommended at once to the mind as something necessary: something which has been found indispensable, and not merely convenient. It stands in your policy like one of those truths in philosophy which is not questioned, because it has received the general assent of all reasonable men. Speaking of such a measure, this morning, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PICKENS, richly imbued as his mind is with philological learning,) could find no terms whereby to characterize this bill less odious than swindling and plunder. Then, by a dexterous evasion of the substance, and a strict observance of the letter of the rules of courtesy in debate, the gentleman has been able, by fair inference, to denounce the supporters of the bill as the prompters of "swindling," the aiders and abettors of "plunder." [Here Mr. PICKENS rose and observed that he had not applied the terms stated by Mr. C. to the bill, or those who supported it. He had stated, in argument, the case of a general system of taxation, and an appropriation to partial and local purposes, and denominated that as swindling and plunder.] Mr. C. proceeded. I understand the gentleman as he explains himself. He has made a speech against this bill. He has endeavored to illustrate, in various ways, its inequity and impolicy. He denounces this road as local in its character, and not of general utility. He shows that the money appropriated is a part of the common revenue raised from the whole Union. He then speaks of general taxation, and local appropriations, and calls this last a system of swindling and plunder. It is but the difference between a positive assertion and a conclusion from premises stated. Sir, I desire, when thus arraigned, to submit my defence. If I am not mistaken, the gentleman will find this system, and this road, have been cherished, and heartily supported, by men, living and dead, to whom even he would be willing to defer in such matters; and with whose memories and character he would not associate the folly and criminality which, in his over-wrought zeal, he fancies he has discovered in this bill.
